Among the many glorious names of which Trinity College, Cambridge, can boast, Bacon stands, perhaps, first and foremost. He was entered there a student, as is well known, in the year 1573; and in 1845, almost three hundred years afterwards, a suitable memento of his connection with the College has been erected, in the shape of a Statue—the munificent gift of Dr. Whewell, its present Master. The general arrangement of the figure, of which our Engraving of this week gives a representation, has been taken, by the express desire of the donor, from the old monumental effigy in St. Michael's Church, St. Alban's; but the sculptor (Mr. Weekes) has, by a judicious removal of the hat from the brow, some alteration in the limbs, both as to their form and position, and the introduction of greater freedom in the drapery, managed to entirely remove the quaint absurdities of the old work, and change it from a crude production, into an elegant and most impressive work of art. It stands in the Chapel with Roubiliac's Statue of Newton—another of the celebrated elèves of the College, and forms in every respect a worthy companion to it. Two such names could scarcely be found conjoined anywhere but there. An advantage is, in our opinion, gained by assimilating the Statue to the one at St. Alban's; for, though it may in some respects have cramped the ideas of the artist, the similarity will be recognised, and it will serve to connect them in the minds of posterity, as memorials of one and the same person, independently of any assistance from the inscription.

It may be worthy of remark that, while, up to the present moment, Government has done nothing to mark its respect for this great man, two persons, belonging to different ages, influenced by no other impulse than their love and admiration for his genius, have erected statues to his memory. The former one, at St. Alban's, was executed at the expense of Sir Thomas Meautys, Lord Bacon's secretary; and the present one owes its existence, as we have before said, to the generosity of Dr. Whewell, the present Master of Trinity. But so it always is, and has been, in this country: the vis inertiæ of Government in such matters is compensated by the energy and public spirit of individuals. This stain upon the character of our rulers will, however, in some measure, be removed when the proposed statues for the new Houses of Parliament shall have been completed. It is needless to say that Bacon is included in the list published by the Royal Commissioners.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.

In speaking of the comedy of "The Old School" produced at this house last week, we remarked that although it was not altogether a very entertaining piece, yet that there were two scenes in it sufficiently excellent to redeem the others which were less effective. One of these was that in which Louis (Mr. W. Farren) challenges Chaveuil (Mr. Brindal), and fights with him, finally disarming him, after the most punctilious observance of etiquette in seeing that no advantage was taken on his (Louis's) part.

The other is that in which Louis endeavours to instruct the Duchess of Bloomsbury (Mrs. W. Clifford) in the art and mystery of the waltz—a dance just then becoming known in England. The horror of the lady when she learns that the gentleman is to put his arm actually round her waist, and without any remonstrance on her part, is most amusing.

In each of these scenes the acting of Mr. Farren, as the representative of the "Old School," was admirable. We select one for an illustration.

SCENE FROM "THE OLD SCHOOL," AT THE HAYMARKET THEATRE

GERALD GAGE; OR, THE SECRET.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SUSAN HOPLEY," ETC.

VAST proportion of young women would have been tempted to weep at this rending of the veil; and indeed, there was cause enough; for certain it is, that like the old story of the egg upon the wall, no human power could ever repair the damage, or replace the young couple exactly where they were before this outbreak. The charm was broken for ever. They had eaten of the tree of knowledge, and Gerald saw that he was living in a mean lodging, and he was ashamed; and Emily saw that she had no longer power to make the lodging appear a palace to her lover, which, whilst he was happy, had appeared a paradise to her, and she felt that they were cast out of Eden. But she had been schooled in adversity. She knew that this was no occasion for expostulation and tears; so she shed none. Her heart swelled and her cheeks were for a moment suffused, but she waited to speak till the passion had passed away; and then looking up from her work, with a sweet loving smile, she said, "This is merely a little fever, dear Gerald, that you have caught by sitting near your fine friends. They've infected you with the love of grandeur. It's very natural.

I dare say I should be just the same if I had been with you. But it will go off again. Fortunately, one's happiness does not depend on such matters, as I'm sure we've both felt for the last two months; and although one may occasionally have little fits of this sort, they don't last—we soon cease to pine for things that are beyond our reach. Haven't you always found it so?"

"I don't know," said Gerald, with less irritation than he had spoken before—for Emily's judicious forbearance had sprinkled cool patience on his passion: "I'm sure I have always pined to be rich, which is a desire as likely to be gratified as a child's that cries for the moon—unless, indeed, that old fellow would out. I really think poverty's more stinging when one has such a thing as that in prospect, than if one had no hopes of ever being better off. One would make up one's mind to it then; but the possibility of such a change keeps one in a constant state of restlessness. I wish to my soul I had the fortune, or that I'd never heard of it!"

"I wish you had not, with all my heart," said Emily. "But as that is past wishing for, believe me the next best thing you can do is to forget it, and endeavour to act as if you never had."

But, alas! Gerald could not forget it. The memory that had slept for a time, rocked by Love's zephyrs; the passions, that had been fanned into forgetfulness by his balmy wings; the pride, the impetuosity, the ambition, that had been soothed into stillness by his soft-toned melodies—were awake and abroad again. The last two months seemed a tame dream; the small lodging and the dull street became insupportable; the japanned tea-board and the scanty table-cloth disgustingly mean; and even Emily's pink gingham gown, in which he had often thought she looked so pretty, seemed only fit for her maid. But what was to be done? The commission, even had it been attainable, would not mend the matter; and the curacy, which was attainable, seemed, if possible, less desirable. The former, certainly, if he remained single, might have been a measure; and, as the thought struck him, the profane wish crossed him that he had not engaged himself. What was he to do with his few hundred pounds, and a wife? Where could he go? How advance himself? Poverty is a prison; it shuts a man in, he can neither move to the right nor to the left for it—that is, where discontent and pride dwell with it. Indomitable industry, or the strong energy of genius, may burst the bonds, and set the prisoner free; but Gerald had neither. He was not without ability, but he wanted purpose and perseverance to make use of it; besides, his thoughts were set upon the golden harvest that awaited him—the harvest which another had sown, and which he was to reap, he could not tell how soon; and all the ordinary methods of attaining wealth appeared to him slow, tedious, uncertain, and, in short, insufferable. Trade of any sort he could not condescend to; and studying for any profession was out of the question; nay, his mind was a great deal too unsettled to think of it: and yet Mr. Livingstone persisted in not dying. Gerald thought he should like to see him, and felt a mind to go to London, if only for the purpose of ascertaining what symptoms of decay he could discover about him. Here was an idea—an object—a something to do; and the fancy took possession of him more and more. In fine, he resolved to do it; the advantages were many—movement, variety, the possibility of something happening—for he was in that state in which people are apt to think the sky will fall, or something not less miraculous occur, to relieve them from difficulties they cannot make up their minds to put their own shoulders to—and, not least, was the advantage of getting away from Emily. Not that he had ceased to love her; but she had no communion with his present thoughts and feelings, and was therefore no longer a companion to him: so he told her that he had determined to go to London to see if he could not get a situation, or something to do, that might support them till the old gentleman drops off. Emily sighed over the delusion and the weakness; but Gerald's self-will and impetuosity were not things to be argued down by common sense, and, like a wise woman, she submitted to what she knew she could not amend. Vane and Willoughby expressed great satisfaction at hearing he was going to London; and Madame de Violane offered him a seat in her carriage. So he went to London in a barouche, with four horses, seated beside one of the most beautiful and fashionable women of the last season. It seemed a foretaste of the joys that awaited him hereafter; and, forgetting the embarrassments that entangled him, he became joyous and agreeable. Madame de Violane pressed him to take up his residence at her house whilst he was in town, an invitation too pleasant, as well as too convenient, to be declined. Thus, he became her guest, and as she took care to whisper abroad that he was heir to an immense fortune, he had no reason to complain of the world's want of civility. He was suddenly initiated into all the pleasures of the fashionable life of London, and found it thoroughly to his taste; in short, his present position had but one fault, and that was, that it had no secure foundation—it was not built upon a rock, but upon a quicksand—and there was not a day that he did not feel it shaking beneath him. His money melted, too, with rather an unseemly rapidity; for though he paid nothing for lodging or boarding, he was, nevertheless, led into expenses very disproportioned to his means. He could not dress worse than his associates; nor dispense with a horse and groom; nor decline paying his share of expensive parties to Richmond; nor refuse to play at cards and billiards for high stakes—at least, he thought he could not, which, in its consequences, amounted to the same thing. Thus sped away three months; during which time he wrote repeatedly to Emily, to tell her that he hoped the friends he was amongst would do something for him; but this was not true, he had no such hope. Even if they had the means—and it is not always so easy to do something for people as the lookers for something believe; but, even if they had the means, they were much too thoughtless, and too much occupied with their own daily amusements, to make any serious effort about the matter. Nor was their friendship for Gerald deep enough to make them concern themselves about his interests. It was a mere holiday liking, that answered all the purposes of gay fellowship, but would bear no wear and tear; and he had sagacity enough to be quite aware of this. But what could he do? This was the question he daily and nightly asked himself; but alas! no answer came. In the meantime, Madame de Violane broke up her establishment, and returned to Paris, giving Gerald a warm invitation to accompany her. At first he refused, but the temptation was too great, and, after some hesitation, he consented; resolving, however, only to stay three weeks, and then positively to return to Ruth, and try once more to read and prepare himself for orders.

Whilst these events were happening, Emily kept on her even way, practising the most rigid economy, and supporting herself, as far as she was able, by her needle; though Gerald had left her fifty pounds, and all his letters urged her to apply to him if she wanted more. But she knew that he would have quite enough to do with his money, and she carefully avoided every expense that could tend to render the application necessary. Although she supposed that he believed what he asserted with respect to his expectations from his friends, she had herself little hope of their realisation, and she acted as if no such promises had ever been made: most wisely—for a promise is like money; it should never be anticipated, never be spent beforehand, or be counted on till it is safe in hand. Notwithstanding all his faults, she loved Gerald dearly, and she believed that, in spite of them, he loved her too. He had shown it when he thought he was about to lose her; and, in the first blush of his great fortunes, it had superseded all other considerations. After this, could she doubt him, because his ambition and the impetuosity of his nature unfitted him for a life of dull obscurity? That this was so, was, doubtless, in their circumstances, a serious misfortune; but these are faults or character that do not cure affection. In Gerald they were inherent, and to quarrel with them was to quarrel with himself; she must take him for better and worse, or reject him altogether; and, being just twenty, and in love, it is easy to decry which counsel must prevail. So, she held fast to her besting faith, and hoped that would modify, if not cure, the faults of youth, and that, when once convinced of the folly of relying on hopes that might never be realised, common-sense and necessity would combine to make him do something for himself.

CHAPTER VII.

"Lauk!" cried Mrs. Spike, as she looked out of one of the windows of Maurice's Hotel, in the Rue St. Honoré into the court below, "there he is again, I declare!"

"Who?" said her mistress, half rising from the sofa, where, tired with her morning's sight-seeing, she had stretched herself for a little repose before dinner.

"The young gentleman that I was speaking of, that's to have the fortune left him," replied Spike.

"Where is he? which is he?" inquired Mrs. Graves, starting up suddenly and approaching the window.

"He's just come into the hotel," answered Spike. "Perhaps he's going to dine at the table d'hôte."

"I wish I'd seen him," said Mrs. Graves. "What sort of looking man is he?"

"As handsome a young gentleman as you'd wish to see," answered Spike. "I don't know as ever I see a handsomer. He's got beautiful dark whiskers, and teeth like pearls."

"Where's Miss Graves?" inquired the lady. "Is she drest?"

"Yes, ma'am," answered the lady's-maid; for, by "a fortuitous concatenation of circumstances," the ci-devant Jenny had been elevated into that distinguished position, from which she remorselessly inflicted upon other unfortunate Jennys the scorn she had herself formerly so much resented—"I have just finished her. She's got on her blue muslin."

"Ah!" replied Mrs. Graves, "she looks much better in white. Go and tell her, Spike, that I wish her to wear white to-day." But the entrance of the young lady herself superseded the necessity of this embassage.

Miss Graves was evidently a young lady made up for sale; her wast was contracted to the smallest span; she was dressed in the height of the fashion; she held her head very high, and her gait was something between a wriggle and a twist, which arose partly from tight stays, and partly from the perpetual consciousness of herself and her figure, which she had been persuaded was very fine, and she believed every eye was fixed upon her when she moved. She was insipidly fair, with very light hair, and white eyelashes; her features were heavy, and her face destitute of expression; but to the credit of this exceeding fairness she set up for a beauty, and her mother was satisfied that she was one. Of course, she was extremely accomplished, doing a little of everything, without having the slightest genius, taste, or feeling for anything.

"Rolinda," said Mrs. Graves, "I wish you had worn your white crape or your pink gros-de-Naples to day, you look so much better in them than in this blue muslin."

"La, mamma!" replied Rolinda, "they are a great deal too good to wear at a table d'hôte, where never mind who you are, everybody's worth looking at."

"Yes, my love, but you may may meet somebody you know. I wonder if there would be time to change your dress before dinner. What o'clock is it, Spike?"

"It just wants five minutes, ma'am," answered Spike.

"Oh, no, ma'am," replied Rolinda, "it will make me so red. You know if I have to dress in a hurry, I am sure to get flushed; and then the dining-room is so hot, and there's such a fume from the dishes, that if I go down heated, I shall get crimson. It's all I can do to keep my complexion down there of a day, by drinking cold water and eating ice."

"Well, then, it's better not," replied Mrs. Graves; "but it's provoking, too, that you should have just fixed on to-day to wear that nasty blue muslin."

"Why, mamma, I don't think I look bad in it," said the young lady, surveying herself in the glass, with some anxiety; "do you, Spike?"

"Lauk, Miss, no," answered Spike: "it's just your mamma's idear; never see you look better, to my mind."

"Who is it, mamma?" enquired Rolinda, who had no difficulty in rightly interpreting her mother's anxiety.

"Oh, nobody particular," replied Mrs. Graves, with assumed indifference. "Just go to my bed-room, Spike, and see if you can find my vinaigarette. (Exit Spike.) I'll tell you who it is, Rolinda: it is the young man Spike said she saw this morning; he that is to have your uncle Livingstone's fortune; he is just come into the hotel, and I have no doubt he's going to dine at the public table."

"Did you see him?" enquired Rolinda.

"No; I did not," replied Mrs. Graves; "it's a pity your papa's away, for he could have easily claimed acquaintance, and introduced us; but, however, we shall easily recognise him from Spike's description. He is tall and handsome, with dark whiskers and fine teeth."

"He can't guess that we've heard anything about his prospects, at any rate," observed Rolinda.

"Certainly not," answered the mother; "and so far, it is, perhaps, as well that your papa is away to-day; because, if he should be struck with each other, there can be no suspicion of any ulterior motives."

"I wonder if it is certain Mr. Livingstone will leave him his fortune?" said Rolinda.

"Your papa thinks there is no doubt of it, from what he has heard," answered Mrs. Graves; "and, though I am the last person in the world to wish a child of mine to make a marriage of interest, I must say, that nobody has so good a right to this fortune as yourself. If your uncle wasn't a brute he'd have left it to his own nephew, instead of squandering it all on a stranger, and then it would have been yours, without being obliged to any husband at all."

Here Spike put in her head to say that the dinner-bell had done ringing; and the ladies having taken a last glance at themselves in the mirror, they proceeded down stairs—Mrs. Graves giving her own cheeks a little rub by the way, in order to bring the blood into them, having observed that she looked somewhat pale after her morning's fatigue.

The dinner-hour was always a dull time with Spike. The male servants, both of the house and of the lodgers, were engaged in waiting at table; and, unless she was lucky enough to fall in with some stray English lady's-maid, who was as much abroad as herself, she had nothing in the world to kill the time, but looking out of the window, or trying on her mistress' things before the looking-glass. She was so entirely absorbed in this last occupation, on the day in question, that she had scarcely time to take Miss Graves's last new bonnet off her head, before the ladies entered the room, clearly in a state of less pleasing excitement than they had left it. Gerald had dined there, and had actually sat opposite to Rolinda, and had taken no notice of her whatever—an insensibility which Mrs. Graves attributed wholly to the sinister influence of the blue muslin, and Rolinda to his own stupidity; for she had remarked that he was extremely absent, and appeared much more engrossed with his own thoughts than with the company he was in. She was quite right—every one might be in for since he arrived in Paris, he had been initiated into some of the mysteries of the Palais Royal; and having persuaded himself that by adhering strictly to a certain system, he might win a great deal of money, and could only lose very little, he, somehow or other, in the course of verifying the experiment, had contrived to lose pretty nearly all he had; and what step to take next he was quite at a loss to determine. Another cast of the die might certainly bring it all back again: should he try it, or should he forswear play for ever? But, even if he did, what was he to do? Which way could he turn himself? He was initiated into the most fashionable society of London and Paris, fêted, and caressed, and looked upon as a millionaire in expectation, if not in actual possession; and many even thought that he was in possession—so far had report diverged from the truth—and he had scarcely five pounds in his pocket; nor did he know where to get more when that was gone. It would need more powerful charms than Rolinda's to charm a man out of the recollection of such an embarrassment.

The Graves family were not much better off; and, as nothing is more irritating to the temper than continual disappointment, nor more depressing to the spirits, than the sickness of hope deferred; and as the lives of the mother and daughter were passed in a constant succession of such vexations, no wonder that they vented their mortification on each other, and were constantly quarrelling. Theirs was certainly a more than commonly painful case of fortune hunting. Mr. Graves was Mr. Livingstone's nephew and heir-at-law. During the residence of the former in India, he was known to be amassing a large fortune, and having been the victim of an early disappointment, he had the reputation of being a determined celibataire. The consequence was, that Mr. Graves looked upon his future fortune as his own property, and in general being of the same opinion, he enjoyed, in anticipation, many of the advantages or disadvantages, as the case may be, of the persuasion. Tradesmen gave him credit; he procured access into much better, at least higher, society than he could otherwise have aspired to; and he married a woman of quality with a fortune of ten thousand pounds, and on this ten thousand pounds and the reputation of the great fortune that he was some day to inherit, he had, by one contrivance and another, managed to live luxuriantly ever since. It is true it had long been all spent, but that did not signify—it still; he was a wonderful manœuvrer, always baked very big, and never remained more than nine months in one place.

SCOTLAND.

SELKIRKSHIRE ELECTION.—The nomination of candidates for the county of Selkirk took place at Selkirk on Friday (last week). Two candidates were in the field Mr. Murray, jun., of Philiphaugh, in the free-trade interest, and Mr. Elliott Lockhart, of Borthwickbrae, who may be termed the Tory or Protectionist. The candidates having been proposed and seconded, addressed the meeting; Mr. Lockhart was much interrupted. To some questions put to the latter by the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, he replied that he considered Sir R. Peel's measure as going too far. At the close of the speaking, Mr. Sheriff Dundas, without taking a show of hands, inquired if a poll was demanded, when an affirmative answer was given, and the Sheriff declared the polling to commence on appointed in the usual manner. This course gave great dissatisfaction among Mr. Murray's friends, who protested. After the Sheriff had retired, the Hon. Mr. Elliott asked for a show of hands, which was, of course, very much in favour of Mr. Murray. Mr. Murray subsequently declined going to the poll, being unwilling, it is supposed, to undergo the expense, with a prospect of a general election at hand. Mr. Lockhart has, therefore, been declared duly elected.

POTATO RIOTS AT INVERNESS.—On Wednesday, the 4th instant, an attempt was made to ship some potatoes from Thorn Rush pier, Inverness, which was successfully opposed by the population of the town, and the navigators in his neighbourhood, in spite of the police magistrates and the military. On Thursday evening the navigators marched in from the canal, and, being joined by the town mob, smashed windows, attempted to set fire to the Provost's distillery; and the military, after a brush, succeeded in capturing about twenty rioters, when the mob dispersed. On Friday a fresh attempt was made to ship the potatoes. The mob took up a very strong position close to the place of shipment, and, whenever the attempt was made to ship the potatoes, the shippers were obliged to fly. The soldiers were sent for, but, before they arrived, one cart and its potatoes were sent into the river, and the potatoes carried by another, and no affair similar to the present.—The following is an extract of a letter from Inverness, dated the 8th Feb.:—"We are at present in a state of siege, and our town under martial law, in consequence of several potato riots having been attacked, and many windows broken. Several persons have been wounded from stones, and a few with the bayonet, but no shots have been fired, and, up to now, no lives lost. Although things, at present, wear a gentle aspect, it is by no means safe to be out after dark, for the Sacramental week now terminated, the disturbances will not be resumed."—There has also been a potato riot at Nairn, and at Campbeltown, Inver-gordon, &c. Indeed, it appears that no potatoes can be shipped without a military escort.

THE TRIAL OF CAPT. JOHNSTONE.—In a portion of our impression last week, we were unable to give the verdict in this case. The Jury acquitted the prisoner on the ground of insanity

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT SUNDERLAND.—On Friday morning (last week) about six o'clock a fire broke out in the extensive paper manufactory belonging to Messrs Hutton, Fletcher, and Co., situate at Deptford, within the borough of Sunderland. The whole of the property, said to be worth from £6000 to £8000, was, it, an hour or two, destroyed.

THE MARKETS.

[illegible] business has been transacted this week, yet prices have ruled about stationary. The public sales have gone off heavily, at unfavourable rates.

Sugar.—West India as well as Bengal and Mauritius sugars are sold freely at late rates; but foreign parcels have met a very dull inquiry. Refined goods steady, at 66s for standard Lumps.

Coffee.—The supply of most kinds of coffee on offer in the private contract mart is small, nevertheless the demand for all descriptions is inactive, at barely stationary prices.

Rice.—Dull and heavy, at former Mincing-lane quotations.

Oils.—Linseed is in good request at an advance of 6d per cwt. In other oils, rather more business is doing.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £5 5s to £4 8s.; clover ditto, £4 5s to £5 8s.; oat straw, £1 15s to £1 17s.; wheat ditto, £1 17s to £1 18s per load

WESTERN GATES OF THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.

This magnificent specimen of British iron casting has just been completed for the Western or Principal Entrance of the New Royal Exchange, by Messrs. Grissell, at the Regent's Canal Iron-works. The extreme height from the crown of the arch to the footway is 22ft. 6in., and the width 22ft.

The design is appropriately Elizabethan; for, from great Eliza's golden reign, we date our possession of an Exchange. Our Engraving conveys a precise idea of the well harmonised effect of the compartments. On the flanks and around the semi-circle are the shields of the Twelve Great City Companies; in the crown of the arch are the arms of Sir Thomas Gresham; in the circle beneath is a bust of Queen Victoria, upon a large crown, backed by the civic mace and sword. In the lowermost panel, too, is the unique monogram of Gresham. The panels above bear the arms of Queen Elizabeth and Queen Victoria. The whole gates are bronzed, and have a remarkably handsome appearance.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

TANGMERE CHURCH.

This interesting but small church of parish of Tangmere, near Chichester, was, till lately, in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, but has recently, by an Order in Council, been placed under and made subject to the authority of the Bishop of Chichester, by the Queen. The church is a good specimen of the early English style of architecture: it consists of a chancel and nave, and has a well-proportioned wooden spire. The structure is dedicated to St. Andrew.

The chancel is in the decorated style of architecture. The windows in the chancel are of stained glass, and are from designs of Mr. Wailes, of Newcastle. The floor has been entirely fitted with open seats, with poppy-headed ends.

In taking up the old floor in order to replace it, was found the stone which had been formerly the altar, bearing the well-known mark of five crosses. A similar one may be seen on Chichester Cathedral: but these are rare specimens, as most of the stone altars were broken in times of great popular excitement. The stone now forms part of the pavement under the communion-table.

The drawing in the "Book," and in our Illustration is shown part of one of its patriarchal denizens—a yew-tree, of extraordinary age and size.

THE DEBATE OF THE WEEK.

The debate on the proposition of Sir Robert Peel will be in its effects one of the most interesting that has occurred for many years; but it has not been so startling in its character as, from the greatness of the interests involved, might have been anticipated. Up to Thursday evening, the speaking, as if by some tacit understanding, was almost wholly from the Ministerial side. With the exception of Lord John Russell, no leader of the Liberals had addressed the House. For this reason the debate at some periods rather languished. The arguments being all denunciations of the plan or avowals of the "change of opinion" which led the speakers to support it. The Ministerial party is evidently much divided. The best speech from the Protectionists was that of Mr. S. Herbert. It was ably answered by Mr. Sidney Herbert. The best defence of the Ministry yet given was by Sir James Graham, who was called up by Lord Worsley. We give two Portraits of the leading members of the Agricultural party.

A. STAFFORD O'BRIEN, M.P.

Mr. Augustus Stafford O'Brien is the member for the Northern Division of the county of Northampton. He is a young man, but has more of the old Tory principle in him than many of his seniors, and moreboldness, too, in avowing it: he doubts much whether the party has gained anything by dropping its old name, and taking that of Conservative, which, in these days of Ministerial abolitions, remissions, concessions, and changes, seems somewhat of a misnomer.

Though one of the party thus designated, Mr. O'Brien's speeches have been much more frequently directed against the policy of the Premier than in support of it. On the Maynooth Bill, he protested against the measure, as a departure from the principles of the party, which was calculated to shake all confidence in public men. "The destruction of public confidence," he said, "was one of the most dangerous evils that could befal a State, for it at once benumbed those who ought to be vigilant to guard, and stimulated those who were ever ready to destroy."

But the question with which Mr. S. O'Brien is most closely identified, is that of the Corn-laws. He is an advocate of the principle of Protection; and, it may be added, a very able one: he has several times had occasion to address the House on this subject, and always with increasing credit to himself. Whether, when he looks at the tendency of past and present legislation, he does not sometimes think he has come too late to the rescue, may be a matter of speculation. Certainly the principle of Protection seems to be "a creed outworn" in the opinion of the leaders of the two great parties, and he may regard himself as the champion of a fallen cause, for whom, says the poet, Fame has no crown. But we have no doubt he will cling to the sinking deck, and stand by his flag to the last. He is bold and direct in his language, and decided in his principles; speaks ably, and defends zealously; in him the agricultural interest has an advocate with every requisite, except the prospect of success. He has won the good opinion of the House, and he will no doubt maintain it. He has good natural advantages: in figure he is rather tall and commanding; has a clear voice, and a very distinct delivery—of the importance of which many honourable members do not seem so fully aware as they ought to be. He was returned for the county at the general election of 1841: he had previously, but unsuccessfully, contested Limerick in 1837.

He, of course, has taken part in the present debate; in his speech he avoided the arguments of detail, and rested his case mainly on the violation of public and party faith which would be committed by a Government and Parliament repealing the Corn-laws, which were avowedly elected and placed in power on the principle of Protection. We give the peroration of his able address:—

A few months ago a farmer came to him, and said, "I have got a fortune left me." "Take your good land, then," was the reply. "and farm it for yourself." "Why," said the farmer, "there are the gravestones of four generations of my race in the churchyard—father, grandfather, great-grandfather, and great-great-grandfather. I will not invest my money anywhere else; I shall stick to the old farm." To his mind, the heart of that old fellow was worth a very heavy volume of political economy. And (continued the hon. gentleman) it is hundreds of thousands of men like that—of men, not with such fortunes in their pockets, but with such hearts in their bosoms, whom you are driving forth, by your legislation, with broken hearts and ruined families. Neither is it too much to say that when—feeling the effect of your policy—they take a retrospect of the past, their keenest associations, their bitterest recollections of the period from which they will date their blighted hopes and broken fortunes, will not be with the name of Cobden. We will not aid you in your triumph over those old men. We do not envy a triumph which we do not participate; and, small in numbers, yet it may not be without some influence, we will raise our voices against the injustice you are about to perpetrate. You may exult in your triumph over a body of men who are reading that table with petitions and who see ruin staring them in the face. Moderation in prosperity, and patience in adversity, were their virtues and their greatest fault was that they trusted you, and you are prepared to triumph over them (I can give it no milder term), in strange coalition with men who, true to their principles, can neither welcome you as friends, nor respect you as opponents: of whom, I must say in conclusion, that the best and most patriotic of them will least rejoice to witness the ruin and downfall of a great constitutional party, and will most deplore the loss of public confidence in public men.

TANGMERE CHURCH, SUSSEX.—(SEE PRECEDING PAGE.)

MR. P. MILES.

Mr. Miles has led the force which resists the encroachments of the Prime Minister on the principle of Protection. He has moved an amendment, on the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair, that the House go into Committee that day six months, and on this the division will be taken. Mr. Miles is a firm and staunch adherent of the cause, though he cannot be ranked among the most prominent members of the

MR. P. MILES, M.P.

House. His position, and the confidence felt in him, supply the place of greater abilities; his speech was a recapitulation of most of the familiar arguments against Free-Trade. We separate from these passage in which he refers to the great number of members who have changed their opinions on the question, though he does not seem to think with Jaques, that

"Out of these convertites
There is much matter to be heard and learnt."

Had he, three months ago, asked many of those hon. gentlemen who were now sitting on the Treasury benches, whether they were prepared to vote for the repeal of the Corn-laws and the principle of Free Trade, he should scarcely have expected an affirmative answer. Even the hon. member for Wolverhampton must be surprised at the miraculous accession of numbers to his party. Were those hon. gentlemen watching the country's progress towards Free Trade, and did they hasten to accomplish the popular wish? Were they prepared to act in concert with the hon. member for Stockport? What were the opinions they were elected to support, he could not say. He left them to settle that with their constituents; but he could only say, that if his opinions had undergone such change, he should have been prepared to follow the example of the noble Lord the member for Dorsetshire, and resigned his seat. His chief objection to the measures of the right hon. Baronet was, that he saw no termination to them. Every session would bring an additional change. It was proposed to effect great changes, and greater still must follow. The more he considered the question, the more was he convinced that those measures ought not to be allowed to pass through Parliament before the deliberate opinion of the country had been taken on the subject by an appeal to the constituencies.

Mr. Phillip William Skinner Miles is member for Bristol, and brother of Mr. William Miles, the member for East Somerset.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 199.—Vol. VIII.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1846. [Sixpence.

THE WESTMINSTER ELECTION.

There are some events which, from time to time, repeat themselves; but they do not appear in the same manner. Let a generation pass, and the same scene that was a kind of legalised riot, a political saturnalia, will be a tame, common-place affair, scarcely making more than a slight ripple on the surface of society. The Election for Westminster has just terminated, and though it has occurred at a great crisis of public affairs, has but little resembled those famous contests of which a seat for this constituency was once the object in the days when Fox and Sheridan were names of power. Then an election fixed the attention of all England; it had even a more popular and general interest than the struggle within the walls of Parliament; in the Metropolis it was a great event, it roused every political and personal feeling and antipathy; it was long in its duration, and ruinous in its expense It was a battle of parties for men, whose names awoke more enthusiasm, deeper personal attachment, and, we may say, a livelier political faith, than we are now accustomed to see exhibited. This zeal and enthusiasm form the brightest part of the picture of the times, for human trust, sacrifice, and energetic exertion, always have in them something noble, and to be admired. But, on the other hand, the violence and licentiousness with which the display of those qualities were accompanied, were something beyond the conception of the present age. The scenes they gave rise to furnished abundant materials for the condemnation of our representative system, which once abounded, more than at present, in the writings of Continental apologists for, or flatterers of, despotic government. They more readily saw the external rudeness and violence of party zeal, than the inward and better admiration of worth, talent, and public services, on which that zeal was grounded; and the licence of a mob was confounded with, and taken to be a necessary consequence of, permitting a free choice of their representatives to the people. In fact, there was much in the occurrences of the time of which we speak, that could be seized by a clever opponent of popular institutions, for the purpose of turning them into ridicule, or making them objects of fear. Attacks on personal character, drunkenness, bribery, fights (individual and en masse); lampoons of the most atrocious falsehood; caricatures, remarkable more for ugliness than wit; and a rough treatment of the very men for whom all this excitement was got up, in the name of friendship, but which was almost as bad as hatred—all these abounded.

The ordeal of the Hustings was then a test of the strength of nerves, if not of principles, in the candidate; he was assailed with other weapons than questions as to his future votes on the Corn-Laws, the Ballot, or the Extension of the Franchise; the shouts of his own party built no bulwark against the peltings of his opponents, nor was it an indemnity for bruises and filth to know his party had made reprisals in the same way, and balanced accounts with the "hon. gentlemen on the other side," with the same currency. It was at the Covent-garden Hustings in particular that the pelting of Candidates, at first an abuse, no doubt, was elevated into an established usage; the vicinity of the vegetable market, helped this on greatly, by at once suggesting the temptation and furnishing the means of gratifying it. Old pictures of the front of St. Paul's Church, on such occasions, are now worth looking at as showing what an election was in the "good old times." The Candidates and their friends are all but hid by an avalanche of vegetable productions, in which turnips, which might in size rival those of Sir C. Napier himself, "as big and as thick as the heads of most hon. gentlemen in the House," play a conspicuous part, with accompaniments that we do not choose to describe. The people, used to the practice at the pillory, acquired a love for the custom, and an expertness in it, unknown, we hope, to this generation, the zest of the thing being heightened by the feeling that the objects of this rough sort of homage were men with whom they would never afterwards come in contact but on the terms of Member and Constituent—which are very different from those of Candidate and Elector.

The tradition is now dying out; but a quasi-riot, and an actual pelting of the leaders in the contest, were long considered almost inseparable from a due and satisfactory election—just as the Gallery at our Theatres invariably insist on the Clown in the Pantomime singing "Hot Codlins:" it used to be comic once, we suppose, or it would not have established itself; but the effect of it now, as given by our successors of Grimaldi, is lamentably the reverse of funny: still it is one of "the ancient institutions" of our Theatres, and the true Conservative Benches are in the Gallery—they permit no innovations. In the same way, the Hustings had its traditions; pelting the candidates was one of them—it was a privilege of the occasion: even the Turks are permitted to curse the Sultan and his officers, when there is a great fire in Constantinople. All nations have their peculiar usages.

The change that has come over us—and it is one for the better—has arisen, first, from the improved intelligence of the people, that enables them to exercise a right without abusing it; more sober habits may have also done much towards it; and, lastly, the changes in the mode of taking the votes, and the limit placed upon the time of election, have done much more. What was good-humour and joke on the first day of a contest, might become ill-natured and earnest enough on the seventh or eighth. But here is yet another cause, and it is not wholly one to congratulate ourselves upon; there is more political indifference and distrust of men now than twenty or thirty years ago. More than half the constituency of Westminster have not voted at all in this Election! Formerly such luke-warmness would have been impossible. The fact, too, that on the great question of the day, the Whig and Tory Candidate were of the same opinion, is a very significant one, of the levelling of party distinctions. Such an identity of sentiment in the rivals of a Westminster contest, is almost unprecedented. Then much of the excitement which used to explode at the Hustings in the choice of men, is now turned into the continuous and quiet energy which is carried into leagues and associations for the advancement of measures. Here we argue, explain, and advocate, till policies and changes are forced on Governments and Ministries more effectually than by the week's riot and extravagance of an Election. The great constituencies were once, too, the only open ones; in them was expressed, as in a centre, the popular feeling of the whole nation,—no wonder that it was done violently and fiercely; now the close boroughs are rather the exception, the open constituencies numerous. All this may satisfactorily account for the great difference between the present and the past as seen in Westminster Elections.

GRENADA.

Grenada, one of the most beautiful of the West India Islands, is situated between 12 deg. 20 sec and 11 deg. 58 sec., latitude; and between 61 deg. 20 sec. and 61 deg 33 sec., longitude. It is about twenty-five miles in length, and twelve in extreme breadth. The island is traversed from north to south by an irregular ridge of mountains, which, at the highest points, are nearly 3000 fast above the level of the sea.

Grenada was originally discovered by Columbus, but not settled until taken possession of by the French, in 1650. It was captured from the French by the British, in 1762; and retaken, but ultimately ceded to the British

At the present time, the principal harbour of this island (St. George's) is well known as the great rendezvous of all the vessels belonging to the splendid line of Royal Mail Steam-packets, that ply between the mother country and the West India Islands

One of these superb steam ships is shown in our Illustration, from a sketch by a Correspondent.

Though small, the harbour is of great depth; and affords safe anchorage for ships of any size.

This harbour has also the advantage of a plentiful supply of excellent fresh water, which is brought by means of pipes to the end of a small pier, from whence ships fill their tanks with very little labour

A large supply of coal (about 1600 tons per month) is brought to Grenada every month, for the use of the steamers. The negro women of the island are employed in the trans-shipment of this article from the lighters to the wharf, and back to the steam-ships; about 200 women being thus employed, at the rate of one shilling and sixpence per day. The population of Grenada is at present 28,000. The exportation of sugar in the time of slavery was about 23,000 hogsheads; at present it is about 5000.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

A private letter from Palermo dated Feb. 2, says:—"The health of the Empress of Russia has been wonderfully benefited by her residence in this climate. Indeed it may be said that her Imperial Majesty is under convalescent She drives out daily for hours together, and has given some beautiful soirées dansantes The Earl and Countess of Shrewsbury, who are passing the winter here, are frequent guests at the palace."

The following is an extract from a private letter dated from the seat of war in India, Dec. 23, 1845:—"30,000 men advance guard, with 70 guns, are now marching upon Ferozepore, where are stationed only 6000 men and 20 guns No reinforcements can by possibility be brought up in less than three days, by long forced marches. No quarter is to be given to the 'white faces' Although our men will smash the Sikhs to the mud, yet the odds are fearful, and we have to fight against men well trained by Allard, Ventura, Avitabile, and other experienced French officers. 30 new regiments will be required, at least, to hold the new country.

A letter from Saxe-Coburg of the 6th, says:—"The new elections having resulted in the return of all the members of the last Chamber, M. de Lepel, the Duke's Minister, who advised the dissolution, has given in his resignation, which is accepted."

The Constitutionnel publishes a petition presented by the wife of the unfortunate Ricmi to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, three weeks before he was delivered up by the Government. It is extremely affecting, and is said to have moved the Grand Duke to tears; but the stern laws of state policy prevailed over the feelings of humanity, and on the 24th ult. the Ministers of the Grand Duke overruled his desire to grant the petition, and gave up Ricmi into the hands of the officers of the Pope

From Berne on the 19th instant we learn that in the sitting of that day the Grand Council had adopted, by a large majority, the proposition of the Executive Council and the Senate, that the people should elect a Council for the Revision of the Constitution

A letter from Oran, of January 31, says:—"The losses experienced at the beginning of the insurrection by the civil convoy, proceeding from Mascara to Oran, have been fully paid by the tribes of the territory on which the attack took place. The sum thus given amounts to 60,000 francs."

The Frankfort journal publishes a Cabinet order from the King of Prussia, dated from Charlottenbourg, the 23rd of December, 1845, wherein it is provided that all Prussian subjects who for the purpose of avoiding serving in the army become Catholic priests in foreign countries shall be declared incapable of exercising their functions in their own country, seeing that no greater punishment can be inflicted upon them.

The Journal des Débats mentions that the parricide Dubarry, lately condemned to death by the Court of Assize of Tarbes, was ordered for execution on the 12th of February. The criminal records show that one of his ancestors of the same name (Jean Marie Dubarry) was accused of a similar crime on the 19th of February, 1746. "Is there not something extraordinary," remarks the Journal des Débats, "in this party of crime, name, and date."

The King and Queen of Prussia have taken up their residence at the Royal Palace at Berlin for the season. Their Majesties recently honoured by their presence an amateur theatrical representation, got up under the direction of the officers of the Alexander Grenadier Corps

The Augsburg Gazette announces, that at the last Consistory held at Rome on the 19th ult., the Pope, after giving his sanction to the appointment of a number of Bishops, declared that the Emperor Nicholas had promised him to put a period to the religious persecution that the Catholics of his empire.

Accounts have been received from the Caucasus to the 18th of Jan. Gen. Freitag continued ill. the 6th Jan. the operation of cutting down and burning the forest in the Tschetschenzen, and then set out on his return. The formidable forest which has for so many years served as a bulwark is no more. The Russian troops had constant skirmishes with the enemy, yet had only one officer killed, six wounded, two received contusions, eight privates were killed, sixty-two wounded, nine received contusions. On the 16th of Dec. there was a sharp action, at the beginning of which the Cossacks were led into an ambuscade, and sustained some loss; but the Jesaul Semiatnoy, they rescued the enemy, who left behind a great number of cattle taken from the Nogaze. The Russians had 37 killed and wounded. The enemy had above 100 wounded; besides killed who were carried off, they left 15 dead on the field

A letter from Norkopung (Sweden) states, that on the 19th ult., about nine in the morning, the waters of the Motala suddenly fell, and continued to decrease so rapidly that, at four in the afternoon, the neighbouring population were able to descend into the bed of the stream and catch the fish, which lay nearly without water. The next day the river began to rise, and in two days attained its usual height During the year 1838 this river had also twice fallen suddenly, but never so low as on the present occasion

We learn by letters from Stuttgardt, that nothing can exceed the magnificence of the new palace which the King is erecting there for the residence of the Prince Royal of Wirtemberg and his consort, the Grand Duchess Olga of Russia. Works of art, in painting and sculpture, of immense value, are to adorn this splendid edifice, and a refined taste is said to have presided over the whole arrangement

Letters from Coblentz state that 48,000 bushels of flour had been withdrawn from the military stores of Wesel, Cologne, Juliers, and Coblentz, and placed at the disposal of the President in Chief of the Rhenish provinces, to be divided among the inhabitants of the most distressed districts, who will pay for the supply at the rate to be fixed after the next harvest.

The affiancing of the Grand Duchess of Olga and the Prince Royal of Wirtemberg was published officially at St. Petersburg on the 4th.

The Augsburg Gazette states, from Teheran, that the Shah of Persia remains dangerously ill, and there being reason to fear that at his death his brothers and uncles would dispute the succession with his son, who is only sixteen years of age, the Grand Vizier was endeavouring to strengthen the cause of the legitimate heir by an alliance with Russia, in favour of which country he was daily making concessions of importance.

We hear from Naples, that a tournament is shortly to be held at the Palace of Caserta, in honour of the Prince, who takes a lively interest in preparations for the splendid fete, which are to be conducted on a scale of unusual magnificence. The costume are to be in the style of the middle ages.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS Monday.

Repeal of the Corn-Laws. Petitions were presented for and against the repeal of the Corn-laws. The Duke of Richmond presented 200 of the latter. He said that all these petitions were in favour of Protection, and against the bill which had been introduced on account of the distress of many individual classes in another place; and they hoped that their Lordships would force the Minister of the Crown to appeal to the constituencies, in order that it might be seen whether they had made as short a turn on this matter as he appeared to have done.

Northern Union Land.—Lord Beaumont moved that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the burdens on real property, and into the impediments to agricultural transactions caused by the present system of Excise duties, Poor-laws, and local taxation The motion led to a rather discursive discussion upon agriculture and the Corn-laws. In the course of it, Lord Stanley said, he wished it to record his firm opinion, that the question of the maintenance or abolition of the Corn-laws rested upon something far above the individual interests of the agriculturists, or of any other class in the country, and that question ought to be weighed, not by any pecuniary consideration, which was the lowest point, but by the effect which the maintenance or the abolition of these laws would have upon the great social, moral, and political interests of the whole community. (Cheers.)

Lord Montagle moved an amendment, extending the inquiry to the legislative exemptions and pecuniary advantages provided by law in respect to taxation as affecting landed property. The motion, in this amended, was agreed to.

The Administration of Criminal Justice Bill was read a third time and passed. The House sat till half past ten.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. Monday.

New Member.—Mr. Finch took the oath and his seat for Rutlandshire, in the room of the Hon. Mr. Dawney, who had accepted the Chiltern Hundreds

The War in India. In answer to Sir R. Inglis, Lord Jocelyn said the Government had not received any official account of the invasion of the British territory in India by the Sikh troops; but a private letter was received from the Governor of Bombay addressed to the noble Lord at the head of the Board of Control, enclosing a private communication received by express, dated Ferozepore, Dec. 23. In that letter it was stated that on the 15th of that month large bodies of the Sikh troops, in violation of the treaty of 1805, crossed the Sutlej and entered Ferozepore; that on the 18th the advance guard of the British army was attacked by the Sikh forces; that attack was vigorously repelled and the enemy pursued upwards of three miles, when, owing to the darkness of the night, the pursuit was relinquished. On the 21st the main body of the British army, the centre commanded by the Governor-General, and the right by the Commander-in-Chief, attacked the enemy in a fortified encampment, in front of which they had thrown up double entrenchments and screened the position with armed bodies of men. The first entrenchment was carried that evening, and the following morning, in the course of half an hour (the centre of the British troops being led by the Governor-General, and the right by the Commander-in-Chief), the second entrenchment was taken; the batteries swept, a large proportion of the guns captured, and the communications of the army opened with Ferozepore The enemy were beat back upon a village called Sahabkhanewala, where it was the intention of the Governor-General and the Commander-in Chief to attack them. Such was the position of affairs when that letter left Ferozepore; there can be little doubt that before now the Government will be enabled to congratulate the House and the country on the complete success of the British arms. (Hear.)

THE ADJOURNED DEBATE UPON SIR R. PEEL'S PROPOSED COMMERCIAL CHANGES.

The adjourned debate was commenced 1.

The Earl of March, who opposed the measure, as being neither just nor necessary, and as being likely to prove detrimental to all classes of the community.

Mr. M. Gibson supported it, but he argued strenuously that the repeal of the Corn-laws should be immediate, even for the benefit of the agriculturist, and he was in the sense of the House would be taken upon this part of the case. If they wanted to judge of the tendency of public opinion on this subject, they should look to what the right hon Baronet was doing. He was an admirable barometer of public opinion, for he was moving with it wisely and prudently, and from what he was doing, they might know what the public were thinking.

Mr. Halsey opposed the measure of the Government, insisting that it was impossible for the public to give its confidence to a Ministry which had no shadow of claim to consistency. He considered the proceedings of the Anti-Corn-law League as dishonest, and he believed illegal, and feared they were not without their influence in bringing about the present measure.

Mr. Duncuft spoke in support of the measure.

Lord A. Churchill, who addressed the House for the first time, spoke energetically against them

Mr. L. W. Buck offered his strenuous opposition to the plan proposed by the Government

Sir W. Clay, Lord H. Vane, and Mr. James, spoke in favour of it.

Sir J. Tyrrell, in reference to some remarks that had fallen from Sir R. Peel, and announced, as one reason for his opposition to the measure, that it would not really settle the question: "So far from this being a settlement of the question, not many months ago the right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Treasury would come forward with a proposition for the abolition of the differential duty on sugar. And upon what ground could it be resisted? It was the necessary consequence of the present measure. He could not help thinking that the noble Lord the member for London, and the hon member for Stockport, seemed to have been seized with a kind of delirium tremens. The hon. member for Stockport, who acted as a sort of crutch for the right hon. Baronet to lean on, must have surprised all by his boldness. The hon member had shrunk from carrying out his own views when offered office. But the views of that hon. member were intelligible. After preaching, as he had done, for half an hour, he could not state what was his object you should make allowances for those who were charged with the duty of providing for the public safety; and, in case of this failure, we must be aware that within three or four months this disease would be followed with traces of famine; and under these circumstances was it not our duty to the country, as well as to the party, not to neglect the taking due precautions? (Hear) I wish that my anticipations may not be fulfilled; but it is of the last moment, it is absolutely necessary, before coming to a final decision on this question, that we should understand the Irish question. (Cheers.) I cannot consent to confess that I entertain any feelings of regret at the course which I then took; so far from it, that I declare to the House that that day is among the most happy of my life, as well as of my past station and pride, was that on which I was ready and prepared to take upon myself the responsibility of issuing an Order in Council for the opening the ports, and trusting so far as such an act of authority can, to the energy and particular object was to increase the supply offood in the country, and thus make provision against famine, and there might also have been other collateral advantages which would follow; but I thought, I say, that the best course to have taken was to have opened the ports. (Hear, hear.) Suppose that my anticipations proved incorrect, and that I had fancied a false estimate of the danger which threatened, I believed that even the generosity of Parliament would have made allowances for the motives that had actuated me, and would have granted an indemnity, (cheers) even if my anticipations were not fulfilled by the result. (Hear, hear.) But what are the facts? There was, during the latter part of December, and the beginning of January, said to be something like a lull—a suspension of the potato disease. I never shared in the prophetic feeling as to the amount of the potato crop, and that the potato disease had vanished, but the opinions on the subject which I had received from most able men of science, who had been directed by the Government to investigate the matter. But I ask, what were the facts of the case? I hold in my hand one of the papers which will throw a light upon this subject. I shall read them, not so much for a vindication of the Government, but as I conceive that it is right that I should say that the information which I had received at the time I know the measure before the House is not a really for opening the ports, but it is almost equivalent to that step, for its object is the immediate admission of maize, and other articles of grain, free of duty, and the reduction of the 4s. duty on wheat to 4s. the quarter. Some persons, I know, say that it would be better at once to reduce the duty to nothing. (Hear, hear.) But still, this is a virtual removal of the duty on all descriptions of corn, with the exception of wheat. Before, then, you finally decide on rejecting this measure, I ask you to look well to the circumstances of the case. You affect to doubt the accuracy of these official reports, but this can only be on the assumption that official men would deceive in such documents. But I will not depend on statements from our official men, but I will refer to letters which have been received from Ireland, by the two last mails, and the accuracy of which, I think, will not be doubted, when I state from whence they come.

Sir Robert Peel then read various communications from Ireland, giving lamentable accounts of the potato crop, and stating that great distress, if not famine, in the ensuing summer. Upon these grounds, he urged the House to agree to the propos is submitted to it. He then proceeded:

"It may be quite true that a different time for following the course I advised has passed away, and that the last of November would have been a better period for opening the ports than the 15th of February; but, admitting that to be true, I tell you, at the same time, that the necessity existed for the early adoption of the measure on the 1st of November, is, on February 16, only increased (Loud cheers.) It is true that the supply might have been more ample, and the area of our supply more extensive, had you not put a stop to corn coming in; but some one make some other proposal; but, I say, you must choose between the alternatives—either maintain the existing Corn-laws, or make some proposal for increasing the facilities of procuring food by the importation of corn. (Cheers.) It be admitted that, on account of temporary and unforeseen necessity, the present system should be relaxed, all reason is in favour of the suspension of the existing law (Hear.) Let us assume that the law is not suspended, and I have to consider the second question, from which I assure the House I should not shrink. After the suspension of the existing law eight months would elapse what would you propose to do with the present Corn-laws? This is a question which I advise the House to consider. My conviction is as strong as it possibly can be, that it would be as utterly impossible, after establishing freedom of trade in this country, for a single session—at permitting the free importation of grain for that period, to the end of it to permit the existing Corn-laws to come into operation, as it would be impolitic and impracticable." (Loud cheers.)

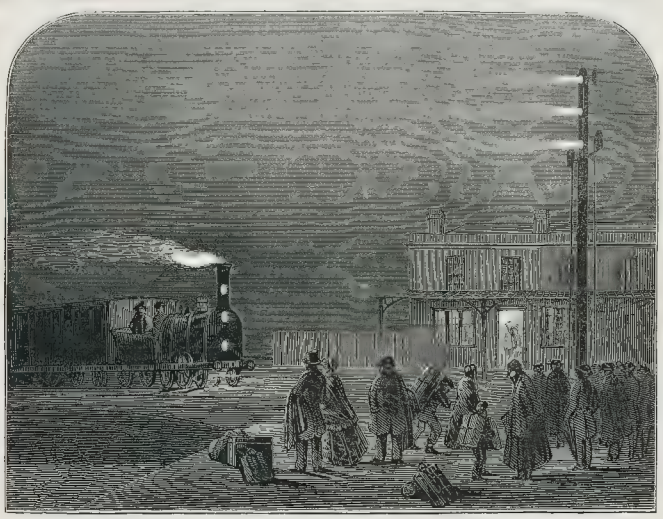
Sir R. Peel then went into the arguments of several hon. members who had argued in favour of protection. In reference to Mr. Colquhoun he said "As to the honourable member for Newcastle-under-Lyne, he tells me hereafter and for ever from this time he withdraws his confidence from me (laughter), on the ground that I establish no great principle as to the Corn-laws. If ever there was a man to whom a Minister ought to be recommended because he does not establish a great principle, it is the honourable gentleman in question. (Laughter.) He has fought by the side of the honourable member for Wolverhampton and has voted against him—he is an advocate for a fixed duty, but he has done all he could to defeat it. I do not know whether he is so far scared at so much of my measure as to have read the pamphlets of a Mr. J. Colquhoun (great laughter), but I doubt not but that he will agree with me, in so far as I can understand them, that the author is an advocate for a repeal of the Corn-laws. The honourable gentleman has voted with the honourable member for Wolverhampton and against him in his the determined advocate of a fixed duty, and has done all that he could since 1842 to undermine a sliding scale. I should have fared well, indeed, if the honourable gentleman I wonder what he would have said, after having carried a motion for the suspension of the Corn-laws, if at the end of that time the Government were to propose their existence on the repeal. I venture to say, then we would not have been a mere scrambling combatant of such a proposal." (Hear hear.)

Sir R. Peel announced his adherence to the proposal of future, rather than immediate, repeal. "Some have made the proposition to be a bribe to the landed interest, also; that it was more for the advantage of agriculture—I, on the part of her Majesty's Government—I made that proposal (cheers); and it is my intention to use all legitimate means I can for the purpose of giving effect to it." (Cheers)

Sir R. Peel next argued that agricultural prosperity had no necessary connection with that of trade, defended his proposed reduction in the duties on articles of foreign produce generally, and argued that relaxation of duty had been productive of advantage. He instanced timber: "Show me one relaxation, one removal of duties, which has not contributed to the advantage of the large and great body of consumers. I will go further. Show me one relaxation, at a very early period, which contributed to the welfare of the producer. I say, I will show you that those principles of prohibition have contributed—not merely to the general weal and advantage of the consumers (which is sufficiently apparent) but that they are perfectly consistent with the permanent benefit and increased wealth of the producer. (Hear, hear.) Why, I am ashamed when I read some of the notions. Here is one presented from the shipowners. ('Hear, hear,' and laugh:) It says, your petitioners are deeply interested in the prosperity of British navigation and the British colonies, and this is the prayer with which it concludes: they implore the wisdom of Parliament to check all further rash experiments on British navigation. And, as an earnest of its sympathy with the interests of commerce—so inseparably connected (with paternal defence—they implore you honourable House at once to reject the proposition for the reduction of the duty on foreign timber from 25s. to 15s., as proposed by the measure before you ('fear, hear.) This is from the shipowners: the builders of ships ('hear,' and laughter) —praying you to check all further rash experiments. Why, what is the basis of the 'rash experiment' you made in 1842? You found a discriminating duty of 25s. on foreign timber, and you reduced it to 25s. And how far can you destroyed the Canadian trade? Has that rash experiment been injurious to the shipowner? (I don't speak of the Baltic shipowner) Let us see. In Liverpool, the average tonnage employed in the British American trade (for I will take the Baltic timber trade), during the eleven years preceding the reduction of duty, was 153,000 tons. This was with the discriminating duty. Now that you have removed it, in the last two years the tonnage of ships engaged in the trade from Liverpool is 194,500 (Loud cheers.) This was the shipping employed in the Canada trade. The quantity of pine timber imported into Liverpool, on an average of seven years, before the reduction of duty, was 5,749,000 loads. In 1844, the quantity of pine timber brought into Liverpool from British North America increased, after the reduction of duty, from 5,749,000 to 6,311,000. (Cheers.) In 1845, the quantity was 6,857,000. (Loud cheers.) The shipowners pray you to reject the proposition for reducing the discriminating duty still further to 15s. What is the state of things at Liverpool under the existing law? One branch of the timber trade, this year, been very sensibly supplied with timber and woods adapted for the construction of ships of the first class. So trading has been the supply, that, at the present moment, this, one of the greatest maritime ports in the world, is in the anomalous condition of not having in stock a single log of foreign wood suitable for building ships that will last for twelve years time. (Hear, hear.) We propose to give increased facilities for the importation of Baltic timber, in order that, with it, good ships should be built. We have done away to some extent already, and, concurrently with it, there has been an enormous increase in the consumption of Canadian timber."

Sir R. Peel pursued this argument very much to various articles of foreign produce, and concluded his speech, (which lasted three hours), in these terms.

"It is not strange how gentlemen can forget historic facts, and ally themselves to their own habitations? Look at the state of your trade at this moment, and challenge you to point out one single instance where either consumer or producer was injured by relaxing the prohibitory system. Oh, let me implore of you to approach the consideration of this question with feelings of calmness and importance. View it, I implore you, by the clear, calm lights of reason , not mistaken—be not led away. This is not a question of confidence in her Majesty's Government. Reserve that, if you please, for a separate vote. The question which you have now to decide is, will you advance on your path or retrograde? (Hear, hear, and loud cheers.) I do not want to sweep away all duties from these things: I want to impose a duty of 4s. upon French brandy, whereas the English article is only subject to a duty of 9s.; and I want to impose upon French silks a duty of 16 per cent., instead of the present duty of double that amount. I put it to you whether it is not worth your while to endeavour to prevent the evil of smuggling. For my part I confess I think it is a most desirable object. I would cut up that trade root and branch, and would substitute a legal for an illegal traffic. This, to be sure, is but one of a thousand considerations which should weigh with you in determining on the course which you will pursue. Again I would remind you that this is no party question. The question you have to decide is simply this.—Will you in this enlightened age advance or recede? Remember, the eyes of the world are upon you. On, act a part worthy of yourselves and of your country. Will you advance or recede? When is the policy best suited to a great commercial empire? Remember your position—remember your great national responsibility. (Hear, hear.) Look to the advantages which God and nature have bestowed upon you. Look to your geographical position, on the confines of Western Europe, the connecting link between the northern and southern continents of Australasia. Look, I remember that the improvements of navigation and the applications of science have brought you within ten days of Petersburgh, and within ten days of New York Look to your physical advantages—the rivers and streams of manufacture—iron and coal—which abound throughout your country. Look to your acquired advantages, possessed as you are of a capital ten-fold greater than that of any country in the universe. Look to the mechanical genius and mine of wealth that is to be found in the unwearied perseverance, the indomitable skill, of your people; look to their talent—their ingenuity—their great mental power. Look, too, to your free institutions, your unshackled press, your glorious Constitution, which, under it permits licentiousness, affords rational liberty to all; look, I say, to all these things—think of the glory England has acquired from the Equator to the Pole, and tell me, is your's a country to dread competition with any country on the face of the earth. What have you to fear? Why is it that paper-hangers and silk-weavers are to be turned out of employment when protecting duties are proposed to be modified? What is to be your motto? Is it to be advance or retrograde? Other countries are now watching your example—other countries are wishing to know what is to be the result at the close of this debate. It is not a fact that every country is determined to meet you with hostile tariffs. (Hear, hear.) But there are countries which you, perhaps, least expect, and to which I did injustice, perhaps, by not naming before—as Sardinia, which has already set the example of a free importation of your goods and manufactures. (Hear, hear.) Naples will shortly follow the example of Sardinia. (Hear.) And Prussia, I can tell you, is already shaken (Cheers.) France is desirous of following these examples. These countries have been controlled by the arbitrary views of their manufacturers and commerce, which exercise a preponderating weight in their chambers; but the opinion of sensible men, not interested in protection, is bearing upon willing Governments; and they are desirous of following your course, and of reaping the benefits you may offer to them (Loud cheers.) Then the United States have already made considerable steps in advance in a liberal commercial policy. (Hear, hear.) I believe you will give, by this measure, an encouragement to that party in America which is in favour of commercial intercourse with this country. But even if you do not—If you fail to this—still I repeat again, don't punish yourselves because others choose to impose restrictions upon their own commerce. This night, or whensoever this debate shall close, you will have to decide what are the principles upon which your commercial policy is to be regulated. (Hear.) Most earnestly—from a deep conviction for the good of the country—from a sense of my own duty, and upon the experience of every relaxation of restriction and prohibition—I advise you yourselves to retain example to other countries, by persevering in the course you have begun. (Cheers.) It is no unmanly course on your part—it is a perfectly consistency with the course you have authority taken. Add to these measures, and you will take a Government security for the preservation of peace —you will take an additional guarantee for the contentment, and happiness, and prosperity of the great body of the people. (Cheers.) You may fail. All human precaution are necessarily precarious. After you have adopted the measures, there may be assumption of that party in America which is in favour of commercial intercourse with this country. But even if you do not—If you fail to this—still I repeat again, don't punish yourselves because others choose to impose restrictions upon their own commerce. This night, or whensoever this debate shall close, you will have to decide what are the principles upon which your commercial policy is to be regulated. (Hear.) Most earnestly—from a deep conviction for the good of the country—



FORSYTH'S PATENT RAILWAY SIGNALS.

FORSYTH'S PATENT RAILWAY SIGNALS.

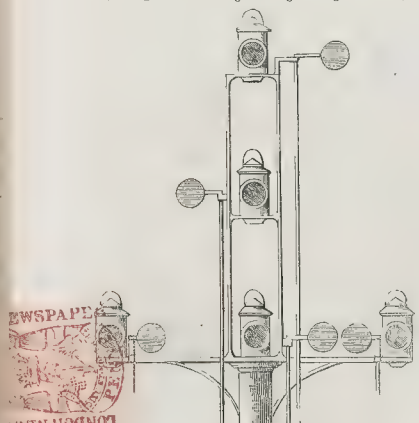
The frequent recurrence of serious accidents on railways renders the necessity for improved methods of signals more and more painfully evident. Several plans have been proposed within the last few months; but they mostly lack the simplicity requisite for their application in cases of danger; or the object cannot be accomplished without interfering with other operations connected with the efficient working of the trains. We have, however, to record another plan, which combines simplicity with efficiency.

SIGNAL DIAGRAM.

Mr. Forsyth, of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, has lately made some experiments on the Liverpool and Manchester Line, to prove the comparative value of coloured lights for signal purposes; and purposes only to use the red light in cases of danger. He suggests that each engine should carry a different diagram of lights; and, by a signal post, with lamps arranged as shown in our Engraving, should make corresponding signals, to be done by closing one or more of the lamps. Thus, the engine-driver knowing what diagram of lights he carries, and seeing a corresponding signal at the station, would conclude it to be especially intended for his guidance; whilst persons at the station would be apprised of the particular train which is coming. We have shown in the Engravings three of the different forms in which the lights will be arranged.

SIGNAL DIAGRAM.

This new system of signals has been secured by patent; and, we are persuaded, will be extensively adopted.



SIGNAL LAMPPOST.

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.

ST. ANNE'S, LIMEHOUSE.

The first stone of this noble parish Church (one of the fifty churches ordered to be built in the reign of Queen Anne), was laid in the year 1712; and the building was completed in 1724, at a cost of £35,000, which was raised by a tax on coals, in the Port of London, generally. The Church stands not far from the banks of the Thames, as the reader may perceive on reference to the large Panoramic Picture (No. 210 in the plan), prefixed to vol. 5 of the Illustrated London News.

The architect of this Church was Nicholas Hawksmoor, who executed many buildings of note in the early part of the last century, and at the age of seventeen became the pupil of Sir Christopher Wren: he was an honour to his master, for many of Hawksmoor's designs have been attributed to Wren himself. Hawksmoor's finest work is St. George's, Bloomsbury (Engraved in No. 104 of our Journal); this is one of the most original, picturesque, and graceful steeples in the metropolis. St. Anne's, Limehouse, is an inferior work, but it deserves much more praise than has fallen to its share. "With much that is incorrect," says a judicious critic, "and very little that is positively beautiful, its ensemble has an air of grandeur very frequently missed where it seems to have been more studiously aimed at." The main feature of the design is the fine tower, terminating in four angular turrets, with a more lofty one in the centre. These, and portions of the belfry, are original and picturesquely effective. At a height of 130 feet is placed the clock, being the highest in or near the metropolis, not excepting St. Paul's: it was put up by Messrs. Moore, in 1839: it is a splendid piece of mechanism, with four faces, each 13 feet in diameter: the hours are struck on the great bell (38 cwt.), which bears the following inscription:—

At proper times, my voice I'll raise,
And sound to my subscribers' praise.

There are only two bells in the tower.

The interior has a fine organ, built by Richard Bridge, in 1741. Here is, also, a painted window, by Backler, of "the Sermon on the Mount."

The parish of St. Anne was formerly a part of the ancient parish of Stepney, and was separated from it in 1729

The present venerable Rector of the parish (nearly 100) is the Rev. J. Radcliffe; Perpetual Curate, Rev. R. Rawlings; Assistant Curate, Rev. J. Hillmer.

Limehouse is a healthy parish; the mortality being less than in seventy-two districts of the metropolis, and less than the average of the metropolitan districts.

MR. GALLY KNIGHT.

In our Obituary of last week we recorded the death of this accomplished archæologist. We annex a Portrait of Mr. Knight, in travelling costume, from a private plate, engraved many years since. As a pendent, we quote the following from the Athenæum:—

"Mr. Henry Gally Knight was educated at Eton, where he had Mr. Milman, the poet and historian, for one of his schoolfellows. From thence he was moved, if we remember rightly, to Trinity College, Cambridge, a little before Lord Byron was admitted of Trinity from the school at Harrow. Smit with the thirst of travel, he visited in 1810-11, in company with the Hon. Frederick North and Mr. Fazakerly, the most interesting provinces of the Turkish Empire. Here he would appear to have renewed his acquaintance with Lord Byron; and, warmed with the spirit of the poet of 'Childe Harold,' conceived a series of Eastern tales, illustrative of the manners and customs of the countries he had travelled through. Mr Murray transmitted the manuscript of one of the tales to Lord Byron for his opinion, without, however, communicating the name of the author. 'There are many beautiful passages in the tale you sent me,' Lord Byron writes in reply, 'and an interesting story. It must have been written by some one who had been on the spot, and I wish him, and he deserves, success.' Speaking of the Eastern tales in question, in a letter to Mr. Moore, Lord Byron writes: 'He (Mr. Gally Knight) sent to me last summer, and I advised him to write one in each measure, without any intention at that time of doing the same thing. Since that, from a habit of writing in a fever, I have antedated him in the variety of measures, but quite unintentionally.' These tales—('Iderim,' in four cantos; 'Phrosyne,' a Grecian tale; and 'Alsakhar,' an Arabian tale;)—do not appear to have attracted any very great attention at the time. Lord Byron played upon 'Iderim,' in verses to his friend like these—

I read the 'Christabel,'
Very well,
I read the 'Missionary,' Pretty nearly,
tried at 'Iderim,' Ahem

MR. GALLY KNIGHT, M.P. IN TRAVELLING COSTUME.

As his circle of friends increased, curiosity carried his tales (his new Persian Tales, as they were called) into a fourth edition and many years after 'Iderim' had been 'Ahem'd' by Byron, he published a dramatic poem called 'Hannibal in Bithynia,' conceived, he tells us, at Brussa, many years back, and only of late remodelled and retouched. He could not, however, dignify from himself that he had failed in achieving a reputation as a poet, and foreseeing the future fate of 'Iderim' and 'Alsakhar' (feeble attempts in the manner and measure of Byron,) he dropped the poet, and turned his attention to the study and origin of our Mediæval Architecture. In 1831, he began his tour in Normandy. Resolving not merely to trust his own judgment, he engaged an architect by profession (Mr. Richard Bussey) to be his companion in the tour, 'that he might have,' to use his own words, 'the assistance of a practised eye to examine the construction of the buildings, and a practised hand to delineate their outline.' He published, on his return, a small octavo volume, with plates, called 'An Architectural Tour in Normandy,' exhibiting a conscientious and diligent endeavour to arrive at the truth, and considerable nicety of observation. His next work was 'The Normans in Sicily,' a kind of sequel to his 'Architectural Tour in Normandy,'—a valuable work, for here he had again his architect by his side, sparing no expense to arrive at truth. His next great work and, unhappily, it has proved his last was his 'Ecclesiastical Architecture of Italy, from the time of Constantine to the Fifteenth Century,' accompanied by a clever introduction (the work on which his fame will rest), and eighty-one lithochromatic plates, by Mr. Owen Jones.

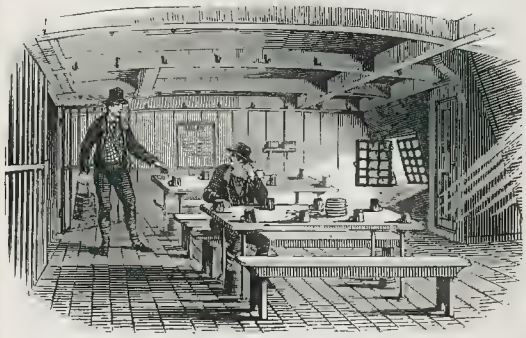
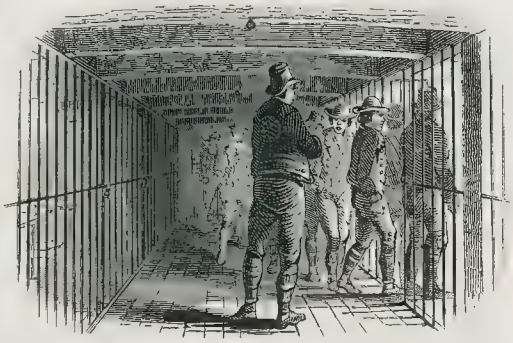
ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

THE CONVICT SYSTEM.—ECONOMY OF THE HULKS.



CONVICT WARD.



GALLERY.

The subject of Prison Discipline, but more especially of Secondary Punishment, is now occupying so large a share of the attention of the benevolent and humane, that we purpose to illustrate in our pages the general subject of Transportation, in the hope of fixing, by our graphic details, the attention of the reader upon the economy of this penal system. We commence with that branch of Secondary Punishment known in England as "the Hulks," and contemplated merely as an intermediate establishment between the common gaols and the penal colonies, for prisoners sentenced to transportation; though, in fact, in many cases, they prove a substitute for that punishment.

Hulks, (Hulk, Dutch; hulc, Saxon, the body of a ship,) used as places of confinement and punishment for offences, corresponds with the galea of the Italians, the galere of the French, and our own English word galley.

The plan of confining offenders on board hulks was first adopted in England in 1776; but so early was their management abused, that in 1778, it was inquired into by Parliament; and in 1785, reported to have singularly improved the practice of villany. And, although several minor improvements have been made, from time to time, in the discipline pursued on board the hulks, we are led to conclude, from the various evidence given before Parliament on the subject, that no material change has been effected in the system.

The stations at which hulks are maintained in England are Portsmouth, Gosport, Devonport, Chatham, Woolwich, and Deptford. We have selected the Warrior convict-hulk, stationed at Woolwich, as a fair specimen of the several vessels; and the large centre Engraving shows it to be not altogether an unpicturesque river-side object.

There are in this ship three decks, or floors, called the upper, middle, and lower decks. They communicate by two large openings at the centre and in the foremost end; and, as these openings in each deck are placed above those in the deck below, they form a kind of tube, reaching from the hold to the atmosphere above

The main hatchways are all 4 feet 8 inches square. The fore-hatchway, upper deck, 4 feet 6 inches by 3 feet 6 inches. Middle deck, 4 feet 6 inches by 3 feet 6 inches. Lower Deck, 4 feet 9 inches by 4 feet 4 inches. The upper and middle decks also open into the chapel, at the after end of the passage; this chapel being 42 feet wide, 29 feet long, and 14 feet high.—(See the Engraving.)

The habitable part of the upper deck is 84 feet long by 38 feet 6 inches wide; and is divided into two lateral portions by a central passage; the inner boundary being a partition, consisting of iron bars reaching the full height of the deck. These are also called Galleries; and we have engraved one line of them. Each ward is subdivided by three transverse bulkheads of wood, forming eight classes, but not crossing the passage.

Near the bow of the vessel are two small rooms appropriated to the sick, and an open space for the ladder and hatchways. There are four ports in this space that ventilate the passage. There is a room in the after end of each ward, called the guards' galley, in which fires are kept till nine in the evening. These also adjoin the chapel.

The prison on the middle deck is 79 feet 6 inches long, by 40 feet wide. There are seven ports on each side, four bulkheads, and, in all, ten classes; and the dividing passage opens into the chapel. Two small rooms are set apart as workshops; they have two ports, and four large hawse-holes, and open into the space forward. The clear space for the ladder and hatchways is 19 feet 6 inches.

On the lower deck, the prison is 115 feet 6 inches long, by 43 feet 6 inches wide; number of ports, fifteen on each side, varying in size, and all smaller than the ports above The bulk-heads are six, forming fourteen classes. Width of the passage, six feet. The space left forward is twelve feet, with four hawse-holes opening into it. From the after bulk-head to the stern-ports, is a space occupied by the dark cells and store-rooms, leaving the passage free.

The floating prison is rated to hold 600 men. Of these 124 are disposed on the top deck; 192 on the middle deck; 284 on the lower deck; and this is effected without crowding.

Beneath the lower deck is the hold, a large, and almost unoccupied space, divided into store-rooms, divided by a passage. The openings from the hold are

1. The Main-batch. 2. The Fore-scuttle. 3. The After-scuttle. 4. A small scuttle in one of the classes.

The discipline and employment of the Convicts may be thus briefly detailed

On board each hulk, a book is kept by the Overseer, in which are entered the names of all convicts; and, on the first Sunday of every quarter, they are mustered, and the character of each convict, for the previous three months, is marked against his name, as follows:—e. g. very good; g. good; m. indifferent, b. bad; v. b. very bad.

The convicts, after they are classed, are kept in separate compartments on board the ship, and are not allowed to mix with any other class than that to which they belong, after the hours of daily labour. Every prisoner is required to serve two years certain as a period of punishment without any reserve earnings, and after that time is eligible to commence a period of probation, which invariably commences when the prisoner has mustered eight times, i. e., two years, either good, or very good. This and his subsequent character determine the duration of his period of probation. On his entering this, his reserve earnings commence, and continue until his ultimate liberation, subject, however, to be withheld for misconduct.

The cells throughout the hulk are numbered consecutively, beginning from the lower deck upwards; and prisoners of the worst character, or during their period of punishment, are classed in the lower deck, and rise upwards as they progress in character, from the lower to the middle, and from the middle to the upper deck; so that the highest number, containing the men of best character, is on the upper deck

Whenever any convicts are allowed to earn a recompense from their labour, one-third of the earnings, that is, one penny per diem, is expended for them in the purchase of bread and vegetables, but on no account is any convict allowed to have money in his own possession; and such reserved earnings only given to convicts who have passed two years of their sentence, and not misconducted themselves.

In cases of convicts' misbehaviour, mild and persuasive means of correction are first tried; if such fail, the punishments are reduction of allowance of provisions, or confinement in a dark cell with no other food than bread and water, for not more than seven days; or by inflicting carnings; or moderate whipping, which, in any case, is not allowed to exceed twenty-four stripes.

"The overseer or officer in command is required to make a minute in the occurrence-book of the name of the convict, the name of the complainant, the nature of the crime, and the punishment inflicted. No convict is allowed to go without an iron upon one or both legs; and those employed on board are locked up and clothed in the same manner as those employed in the yards. An overseer is required to be on the watch all night in the dormitories. Chaplains are appointed in connection with the different vessels, who are required, besides reading prayers and preaching on the Sabbath and the holidays of the Established Church, to attend to the religious wants of the prisoners individually, to distribute according to their discretion the books or tracts provided for the use of the prisoners, and to take a general superintendence of the schools for their instruction. A surgeon is employed in connection with the vessels, who is required to attend to the health of the convicts, inspect their provisions occasionally, and see that the wards are properly ventilated. The employments of the convicts consist of shipbuilding and painting, carrying timber for this purpose, in removing chain-moorings, in cleansing the rivers on which they are employed, and in different descriptions of hard labour, and a limited number in keeping the vessels clean, preparing the food of the convicts generally, and making and repairing their clothes. Their periods of labour are from eight to nine hours and a half hour daily, according to the seasons of the year.

"The total expense per man in the hulks in England is £18 12s. 11d. The average value of labour per man is estimated at £10 18s. 9d., making the average annual expense per man £7 14s. 2d. The total cost per boy in the hulks is £14 9s. 6½d. The value of the labour performed by the prisoners in the hulks of Bermuda is so great as to leave an estimated annual profit for each of £13 8s. 6d."

If to these details, we add the following "Daily Routine" on board the Warrior, he reader may form a tolerably correct tides of the Economy of the Hulks:—

5 A.M. "All Hands" are called by the officers on watch; sufficient time being allowed to dress, and lash hammocks, the wards are then unlocked, and prisoners passed under the forecastle, in regulated numbers, to wash troughs being there permanently fixed, and supplied with fresh water for that purpose. They then re-enter their respective wards, and return with their hammocks, which are stowed in appropriate places, ranged along side the main deck, and constructed so as to admit of free ventilation. Breakfast is now served, under the immediate superintendence of the steward and officers, and the empty vessels returned to the galley, and washed by two prisoners, appointed as "Inspectors" of Weights and Provisions for the day. A thorough cleansing of the ship, including decks, poop, and forecastle next takes place, as which prisoners continue employed until 7 30 A.M. When a general muster is taken, and "All Hands" are summoned to labour in Dockyard, at the various duties assigned them, in divisions, each superintended by a guard connected with the establishment, who is responsible for their conduct and safety when on shore.

Noon. Prisoners return on board to dinner, being allowed one hour: a portion of which time is daily devoted to a minute examination of bedding and clothing, under the inspection of officers alternately appointed

1 P.M. Dockyard duties are again resumed, and continued until

5 30 P.M. When the labours on shore close for the day, and prisoners are received on board; washed; and mustered, to ascertain that "All is Right." Suppers are forthwith served; at the conclusion of which the men are again employed cleaning the interior of the ship, and the various utensils used by them during the day, until WASHING-ROOM.

THE CHAPEL.

5 P.M. At which hour all duties finally close; hammocks are handed into wards, and unlashed; water is again taken in; and "All Hands" retire to rest.

9 P.M. An appointed officer visits the decks, examines the lights, bolts, and locks of each ward; interrogates the guard on duty as to the observance of general silence; and reports "all safe and secure" to "Officer in Command."

Should any prisoner complain of indisposition previous to mustering for labour he is retained on board, and ordered to the "Sick Ward," awaiting the arrival of the surgeon, who daily visits the ship.

Divine service is performed in the Chapel every sabbath; and evening prayers are read every Thursday by the Chaplain.

Prayers and portions of Scripture are also read in the respective Wards daily during the week; and a schoolmaster is appointed to instruct those prisoners who cannot read, every Monday and Friday evening. They are visited by the Chaplain, who notes the progress each prisoner makes in reading, spelling, and catechism.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1846.

The advocates of a moral improvement find it difficult enough to advance it when they are met simply by the indifference of the mass of the public to anything that does not immediately touch their interests; that difficulty is increased during periods of great excitement upon some social and material question, which through years of violent agitation has not only created strong parties for and against it, but has brought those parties themselves to a crisis. Nearly all the energy which we have to bestow on public affairs is then absorbed by the great topic of the day; we then attend to nothing else; no voice that speaks of anything but the engrossing subject of discourse can be made audible through the noise of the tempest; if it does pierce through it at intervals, it is weak and faint, and runs great risk of not being listened to. Society is often afflicted with this malady described by Falstaff, as the disease of not marking, when the subject matter of the lesson is the reverse of pleasant or flattering. The "old Lord of the Council," who "spake very wisely—and in the street too," was but a type of all public advisers, who lecture society on its short comings and wrong doings; "he spake very wisely yet I regarded him not;" the following of good advice seems as much beyond the strength of the community at large, as of the fat knight in whom Shakspeare has embodied so many general failings.

But the conscience of the most hardened is liable to some compunctious visitings, and by dint of continual reiteration, and the somewhat terrible exhibitions we have had of the consequences of neglect, society is beginning to awaken to the necessity of dealing with that mass of youthful ignorance and destitution which is always hovering on the threshold of the prison, with no hand to lead it away from the fatal vicinity, but many ready to drive or seduce it within the portals of crime, from whence once passed there is no returning. In a great city like London —we should rather call it a nation, for it is rapidly growing into one—there will always be an immense amount of poverty, and with it ignorance; no arrangements that can be made will ever reach these human evils. But that is not a reason why we should make no effort to lessen them; it is folly to ignore their existence, and shut our eyes to their results. If we wished to do so, they will not suffer it; they will intrude their ghastly presence into the midst of prosperity and splendour. They are unwelcome and repulsive guests, but they come, and as they cannot be crushed, must be dealt with in another manner.

From several, and from distinct authorities, we have recently heard frequent complaints of the want of some means of arresting juvenile crimes, that should not place it on the same level, or confound it with old and hardened depravity. The police-offices abound with cases, in which it would be very possible to rescue the criminal at the first step upon the downward path; but, at present there is nothing provided for, save the punishment that, in nine cases out of ten, turns the offender loose on society with all that was bad in him confirmed and sharpened, and the little good that might have existed utterly destroyed. The few attempts that have been made have answered sufficiently to warrant their being multiplied and extended. But, unfortunately, the qualification for admission to the few reformatory establishments we possess, must be the perpetration of actual crime. Thus, in the prison at Parkhurst, only those boys are received who have undergone sentence of transportation. For minor offenders there is nothing but the common gaol—in which no reformation is to be expected, no teaching, save that of greater expertness in crime is possible. A defect in our arrangements on this subject manifestly exists and should be supplied as soon as possible. We are glad to see some prospect of this being done; attention has at least been drawn to the question, and this, at such a time as the present, is no small advantage gained. The City authorities, the Bishop of London, and more than one legal functionary are engaged upon it, and we have no no doubt something beneficial will be the consequence of their exertions, if at all seconded by the public.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE AND THE ELECTORS OF NOTTINGHAMSHIRE.

The following remarkable letter has been addressed by the Duke of Newcastle to the inhabitants of South Nottinghamshire

"Clumber, Feb 17, 1846.

"Gentlemen In addressing you on the present occasion, I am quite aware of the unusualness of the proceeding. For the last few days I have noticed what has been passing in our country with indescribable pain and annoyance. It seems to me that the time has more than arrived when a period ought to be put to the discord which now agitates us. I deeply lament that any member of my family should be the cause of this most unnecessary agitation. I have most deeply to lament it for still more serious reasons than because it creates odious quarrels, feverish convulsions, expense, and extreme inconvenience among yourselves.

"Lord Lincoln is the decided victim of bad counsel, and in no instance more conspicuously than in the course which he has pursued upon the present occasion

"Under this influence he has been induced to accept an inferior office, that his seat may be vacated, and a desperate experiment attempted. He suddenly appeared among you before you could be aware of the treasonable plot in which he is said to be engaged, and at once made an appeal to the Protection meeting to the whole constituency. By this surprise he has been enabled to ascertain the undisguised and almost universal feelings and opinions of this important county.

"Doubtless it was expected that the constituency would be found to possess many consciences, and that the public voice would be raised in favour of Free Trade, and the other newly disclosed enormities of Sir Robert Peel's Government, although we have neither asked for nor desire Free Trade nor any other vicious and revolutionary system. But why should any one from authority be sent as a Government emissary to force upon you opinions which you hate, and the country hates with indescribable indignant hostility—and why should any one fortified with Government means, presume to operate the disgraceful seductions which are said to have been used upon this honourable county—and why are you to be insulted upon this insufferable occasion by the dogmas and fatal doctrines at which you now naturally shudder and recoil? Our worthy farmers are sturdy and clear-sighted, and your phalanx is not to be broken by bold axioms, artful assertions, or any other evil appliances

"Still, however, the move has been made; and although we may justly condemn it as a very great mistake, there may be some shadow of pretence for it, if it were intended by the experiment to test the public opinion. Now, however, that it has been in a course of most diligent trial for ten days, that the fullest proof has been elicited, and the result known to be totally adverse to the new doctrines, and unsuccessful to the deceived advocate of them. In the sincerity of my heart, and as a member of the constituency, I suggest to Lord Lincoln the propriety of withdrawing from an useless, and, to all, most painful struggle against a long-tried and approved principle and policy, and at once to restore tranquillity to the county, and the undisturbed possession of its unquestionable convictions.

"In the anxious hope that this address may meet with your approval, and that the appeal may not be made in vain,

"I remain, Gentlemen

"Your sincere and faithful servant and,

"NEWCASTLE."

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO PARIS.—A letter from Paris of Wednesday, says: "There can be no longer any doubt of the intended visit of Queen Victoria. Apartments have been prepared for her at the Tuileries and at Neuilly. At what place she will have a state bed-room, fitted up in the most splendid style. It is said that towards the end of May, or early in June, the Duke and Duchess de Nemours will go to London, and accompany the Queen to France. Active preparations are going on also at the Hotel de Ville for a banquet and ball on the occasion of her visit

ELECTION FOR EAST SUFFOLK. On Thursday, Mr. E. S. Gooch was elected at Ipswich without opposition, for the Eastern Division of Suffolk, in the room of Lord Henniker. Mr Gooch is a staunch advocate of agricultural protection.

DORSETSHIRE ELECTION. The election in this county, on the resignation of Lord Ashley and Mr. Sturt, resigned, took place at Dorchester, on Thursday. Lord Ashley declined to contest the representation, and H. K. Seymer, Esq., and John Floyer, Esq., were therefore declared duly elected.

ADOPTION OF THE OVERLAND ROUTE TO INDIA, VIA TRIESTE.—At a meeting of the Syra-Egyptian Society, held on Tuesday evening, a very interesting and important paper was read by Dr. Plate, Foreign Secretary, demonstrating the practicability of forming a continuous railway communication with India, through Germany and Central Turkey, thus bringing the Indian Mail in much less time by many days than it is at present occupied in its transmission. Lieutenant Wa.. horn, who was present by invitation, briefly stated to the society that her Majesty's Government had that day determined on the route to India, via Trieste.

ACCIDENT ON THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.—On Monday morning, an accident of a serious nature occurred on the Great Western Railway, between Box and Middlehill tunnel, by which the lives of several persons were endangered, and one poor fellow was killed. It appears that the up-mail on leaving [illegible] and an open truck, containing several workmen, attached to the train; and when between Box and Middlehill tunnel, the tire of one of the leading wheels of the truck flew off, which caused such an oscillation, that either, through fear, a number jumped out, or were thrown from the truck by the motion. Neither the [illegible]-driver nor the guards were cognisant of any accident until, entering the tunnel, the echo of the screams of those in the truck alarmed the engine-driver, who instantly stopped the train; and, on going back, it was discovered that nine persons were on the line so seriously injured, that it was considered necessary to take them to the Bath Infirmary. One of the unfortunate men died, as above stated. An inquest was held at Box, on Tuesday, on the body of the man who was killed, [illegible] a verdict of "Accidental death" was returned [illegible] HER MAJESTY'S STEAM-YACHT "SPITFIRE." This steamer was [illegible]day, at Woolwich Dockyard, in the presence of Sir Francis [illegible], K.C.B., Commodore Superintendent of the establishment; the Marquis of Clanricarde, the Russian Consul-general, and several officers of the Russian service; Captain [illegible]ith, of the William and Mary; the heads of the civil and military departments, and a great number of spectators, including a considerable sprinkling of the gentler sex. The ship went off the stocks in gallant style. She was named by Miss [illegible]tock, a friend of the master shipwright.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

CURIOUS ACTION AGAINST EARL FERRERS FOR BREACH OF PROMISE OF MARRIAGE.

The Court of QUEEN'S BENCH has been occupied several days with an action brought by a Miss Smith against Earl Ferrers for breach of promise of marriage.

Mr. Symons, in opening the pleadings, said the plaintiff was Miss Mary Eliza Smith, and the defendant Washington Earl Ferrers, and the action was brought to recover compensation in damages for a breach of promise of marriage which he (defendant) had made to the plaintiff, since which promise he had married one Isabella Chichester. To this declaration the defendant had pleaded, first, that he had never promised in manner and form as set out, that he was not of age at the time when the alleged promise was made. To which the plaintiff replied, that the promise was repeated after the defendant came of age.

The solicitor-general said the case of the young lady on whose behalf it now became his duty to address them, was one that he was sure would excite the deepest interest in their minds, and to which the Jury would pay the deepest attention. The plaintiff is now about twenty-six years of age, but at the period which he should presently have to call the attention of the Jury she was not more than seventeen. The defendant was a nobleman of very considerable landed possessions in Leicestershire and some other counties. He was very young, having but very recently attained his majority. His grandfather, the late earl, died in the month of October, 1842. He was placed at an early age under the care of a gentleman who had charge of his education, with whom he remained until the year 1840, at which period he went abroad, and was absent from this country for about two years, and since that period he had resided partly in London and partly on one of his estates in the country, either at Chartley Castle or Staunton Harold. The plaintiff, Miss Smith, was the daughter of Mr. Smith, a gentleman of respectability, residing at Anstrey, in Warwickshire. He was a person of very considerable means, but of unblemished character and very well connected. Her mother was also of a good family, which was certainly related to that of the noble defendant. The plaintiff resided with her father, at Anstrey, in Warwickshire, from the year 1835. The defendant, who was then Lord Tamworth, shortly after that period attracted her attention. At first he merely spoke to her on ordinary topics, but gradually a degree of intimacy grew up between them, which led to a correspondence. The defendant, soon after that, went abroad. The plaintiff was a young lady of considerable personal attractions, and had received a very liberal education, and the defendant had succeeded in gaining her affections by the strongest professions of unalterable love and attachment, and their attachment at once appeared to be mutual. That state of things continued until the period when the defendant went abroad. All this, however, could not fail to attract the attention of the young lady's parents, and they accordingly spoke to her upon the subject. He (the Solicitor-General) was not at liberty to state to the Jury what passed between them on that occasion; but the result was, that, in the minds of the plaintiff's parents, some degree of suspicion was raised as to the intention of the defendant, and which was partly excited by the great difference between his rank and station in society and that of their daughter, and they, in fact, seemed to have a kind of [illegible] feeling of that which ought to be supposed, and they could hardly venture to hope that the acquaintance which had commenced between the defendant and their daughter would have a favourable termination. She was sent to school, and after that to Paris, where the defendant returned to this [illegible] in the year 1842, and took up his abode at Chartley Castle, and then the correspondence between him and the plaintiff was renewed, and he proposed in one of his letters that their union should take place in the following April; but the period was postponed until July or August, and shortly before that period the plaintiff provided a bridal dress, the wedding cake, and, in fact, all the usual preparations were made for the approaching nuptials. It was not until the middle of July that the plaintiff was, unfortunately for her peace of mind, awakened from the dream in which she had formerly indulged, by reading in one of the daily newspapers an account of the marriage of the defendant. In calling the attention of the Jury to the correspondence that had taken place between the parties, and the circumstances under which plaintiff's future prospects in life had been cruelly sacrificed, and her peace of mind destroyed, he would not cause any comments on the letters of the defendant, but would leave the Jury to form their opinion. He would merely observe, that nearly all the letters of the defendant to her were written on blue note paper, in some of which the handwriting was scarcely legible. Some of the earlier ones were lost, but the later ones had increased in fervency and in length also. (A laugh.) The learned counsel then proceeded to read some of the letters of the defendant to the plaintiff. One of them commenced, "If wishes would transport me to you, there would be no need of my writing; but I have been detained here longer than I expected. I have been advised not to take my seat at present." The letter alluded to some political matters, and the writer said his friends condemned the measures of Sir Robert Peel. (The Solicitor-General here remarked that such observations would suppose the contents of a much later date, which caused roars of laughter.) The letter contained not only a promise of marriage, but appointed a time for the performance of the ceremony. The declaration concluded:—"You are the only female who could not be a home to me without your presence. You are all in all to me. I beg of you to take particular care of your health, and be sure you change your shoes after you have been out walking. When I am married and settled, I will purchase some new dresses, and consider them as presents from himself, promising to repay her the price of them the next time they met, but not one shilling of that money had ever been repaid. Subsequently, in January, she was actuated by that feeling of shame which might easily be accounted for in a young woman in her situation, when courted by a person of the defendant's rank, and she did not like the degrading anxiety and misery to which she had been subjected in running up bills in her own credit which her weekly lover had not the means of paying for; and, therefore, although she could not conceal from them the circumstance that she was possessed of the articles, yet she was not informed them that she had purchased them on her own credit; but, at length, the parties from whom she had purchased these articles became clamorous for their money, and that caused the deepest anxiety and misery to the plaintiff, who concealed the fact from her parents as long as she possibly could. About this time she received a letter from the defendant on the subject, begging her to calm her apprehensions, and stating that he would see no more in running down and sending in bills; but he failed in doing so, and the result was that she was compelled to tell her father the whole truth. Such a communication, of course, greatly increased the uneasiness of the plaintiff's parents, and her father, knowing the defendant, inquiring what his intentions were as to his daughter, and when he intended marrying her? to which the defendant wrote an answer, stating that he was willing and anxious to put his pledge which he had given into execution, and he was grieved that any hesitation on his part had caused any pain to his dear Mary. But, the money not being forthcoming, the plaintiff's grandfather was compelled to advance it, in order to release her from the power of the [illegible] of the defendant, written subsequently to all this, to the plaintiff, he said—"Our wedding will be quite a surprise to the people at Anstrey. As soon as I come home, I shall have a great pleasure in returning your grandfather the whole of the money which he has advanced. I hope that nothing will delay our marriage—the sooner it takes place the better. You are solemnly pledged to me, and I will not break that pledge for the world or any one else." About this time there appeared in the public papers some allusions to the probable marriage of the defendant, and he wrote to the plaintiff requesting their nuptials might be kept secret for one or two months longer, but that time he expressed a hope that her health would be re-established. He begged her also to tell the waiting-woman whom she had engaged that her services would be required in August. This correspondence of the marriage, time and anxiety which had previously existed in the mind of plaintiff's father, and he wrote to the defendant on the subject, who returned an answer, saying, "I have long taken an interest in your daughter, and now I propose to ask her for my wife. I will see you shortly about our marriage." The learned counsel then alluded to the shock which the plaintiff's feelings and her family sustained when they heard of the defendant's marriage through the public papers. In support of the plaintiff's case he said he should call witnesses who would prove that the defendant had frequently met the plaintiff that the letters clearly proved a promise of marriage on his part after coming of age on the defence set up, the learned gentleman said he should call witnesses to prove the authenticity of the letters which he had produced, and expressed his conviction that the Jury would return a verdict in favour of the plaintiff, and with ample damages. The learned counsel, at the conclusion of his address handed in the letters from which he had previously read the above extracts. They were read at length. They were written in a most affectionate and passionate manner, and in not very grammatical language. The greater portion of their contents related to ordinary occurrences in which the defendant was concerned, and contained comments upon various individuals. In several of them, however, he distinctly expressed a great desire to be united to Miss Smith, and the marriage was continually spoken of Mr. Solicitor-General then called a number of witnesses, with a view to prove his statement.

The evidence given by the first witness was remarkable. He was the Rev. Edward Francis Arden, a clergyman of the Established Church, who stated that he was incumbent and chaplain to Earl Ferrers. He knows his Lordship several years. He was appointed his chaplain in the year 1842. Had previously been chaplain to the late Earl. Their intimacy continued up to the time when his Lordship went abroad, and was renewed on his return. He remained by his Lordship's side in the month of May, 1844. Lord Ferrers had a seat at Chartley, and another at Staunton Harold. Had frequent opportunities of knowing his habits, style of conversation and handwriting. His education was rather imperfect. Had been shown several letters said to have been written by his Lordship, and asked if he thought they were in his hand-writing. A great many letters were here handed to the witness, who said he believed each of them were in the handwriting of his Lordship. They were addressed to the plaintiff. Had seen his Lordship disguise himself by wearing a wig and tying a handkerchief over his hat. He often went out at night disguised as one of the bailgate breakers. Had seen his Lordship wear a ring very much like the one produced sometimes, by wearing his shirt outside and over his clothes. Had come oft in that disguise—the disguise was merely for a "lark." His Lordship, once, when ... ness was asleep on the sofa, marked his presence with a pace of carmine which made him look as if he were moustachios. Did not wear moustachios ... little household affair which nobody else had anything to do with. ... his Lordship had a right to do what he pleased with him in his own apartments. The putting on disguises was merely a bit of a school-boy lark Witness was not a boy at the time. Is now thirty-seven years of age. Had been been a great deal of Lord Mountcashel's company. Had been in his ... the country places would ... Lord Mountcashel's company. They would chat about him (the Attorney-General) if he lived there.

Cross-examined by the Attorney-General—Witness had also disguised himself

Mr. Justice Wightman then cautioned the witness to be more circumspect in the manner of giving his evidence.

If they said he was in the habit of being intoxicated, they said that which was not true. Was not dismissed from his ministry. Had been to Chartley Castle since he left

On the second day, the witnesses examined were Mr. and Mrs. Smith, the ... nts of the plaintiff, and Ann, a younger daughter, about thirteen years of age. The scope of their evidence was to identify the letters as in the handwriting of the noble defendant, and to endeavour to prove, by a variety of circumstances, the matters to which they were referred.

The case was resumed on Tuesday (the third day), when further evidence was given on the subject of the letters; and the case on the part of the plaintiff was closed.

The Attorney-General then addressed the Jury on the part of the defendant. The learned counsel said: It now became his duty to address the Jury on the part of the defendant in this most extraordinary case—the most extraordinary that had ever occurred within his experience, and which would require at their hands the most patient and careful attention. What had at present passed must, in a great degree, have been altogether unintelligible to them, and wrapt in complete mystery, and some of the facts which he had elicited on the cross-examination of the plaintiff's witnesses might have appeared to the Jury as adverse to the case of the defendant. But he entreated them, if they would only restrain their curiosity for a short period, he would explain everything to their entire satisfaction. He would clear up every doubt and difficulty. Although the path was at present veiled, he would presently give them a clear and distinct view of all the circumstances of this most extraordinary case, and he would leave no question as to the determination to which they ought to come. He (the Attorney-General) might have commenced by telling the young girl, in the first instance dreaming of an affection that never existed, and afterwards endeavoring to turn her day dreams into realities. But the plaintiff had been led from out the path to another. She had gone on from that period to childhood, until she at length found it quite impossible to extricate herself from the dilemma in which she was placed. What would be said of the defendant if it were true that, after engaging in the affections of an innocent girl, he had settled that affection and had ever existed between them, and had used the very tokens of his affection on which she had forwarded to him as a means of fastening upon her charges of fraud and forgery? Such would be the alternative which he should be compelled to adopt, had not the plaintiff presently put them in

The poll closed at four o'clock, and it being evident for some hours previously that the fortune of the day would be with General Evans, crowds of Liberal electors and friends of the cause flocked from all directions to the front of the Ship Hotel, Charing-cross, to congratulate their old and gallant representative, now once more reinstated in his position.

About half-past four o'clock, Sir De Lacey Evans presented himself at the balcony of the hotel, and was immediately hailed with deafening shouts and huzzas, intermingled with waving of hats and handkerchiefs, which continued for some minutes. When silence was in some measure obtained, the gallant General briefly addressed the crowd from the window.

As the final close of the poll approached the excitement around the hustings at Covent-garden, which had been great throughout the day, rapidly increased, and at two o'clock upwards of 10,000 people were packed together in the area which surrounds the market place. Notwithstanding their tempting vicinity to decayed vegetables of every sort, the vast assembly conducted themselves with exemplary propriety; and, although a band of rough fellows immediately in front of the hustings seemed at one moment bent on disorderly conduct, the prompt and judicious interference of a large body of police soon restored perfect regularity. Shortly after three o'clock, General Evans passed in front of the hustings on horseback, and received the congratulations of the assembly on his success. Captain Rous did not show himself, but his band was visible for a moment as it went along Henrietta-street about four o'clock. At five o'clock, the final state of the poll was announced; and soon afterwards General Evans made his appearance, and addressed the multitude amidst enthusiastic cheering.

The first person who voted at the polling-booth at St. Margaret's Church was Sir Robert Peel. The hon. Baronet arrived as the chimes were going for eight, the commencement of the polling, and gave his vote for Capt. Rous. There were few persons present at that early hour, and few except the poll-clerks were aware of the rank of the voter.

OFFICIAL DECLARATION OF THE POLL.

The following was the official declaration of the state of the poll, as made by the High Bailiff on Thursday afternoon:—General Evans, 3843; Captain Rous, 2906—majority, 937.

We give sketches of the rival candidates.

SIR DE LACEY EVANS.

The reputation of the gallant Member for Westminster is a mingled one—it is partly political, partly military. He has fought for Liberalism in very different fields, with very different associates: among the triumphant Whig majority in the House of Commons, and among his British Legion, on the territory of Spain. His military avocations withdrew him, for a time, from the field of politics; it was on the fall of the Conservative Ministry in 1835, that the Liberal Ministry resolved to aid the cause of Christina and the Constitution, then threatened by the energy of the Carlist Generals.

It was on the 1st of July, in that year, that General Evans took the command of the British Legion, numbering 8500 men. The Civil War lasted nearly seven years, and for two of them General Evans took an active part in it. He was not so well supported by the Spaniards as he ought to have been; and he had the same kind of difficulties to encounter, from the dilatory, all-promising, never-acting character of the people, which the Duke of Wellington had so frequently to combat. The actions of Irun, and the operations before Hernani, brought the war to a close, in 1837. On the 14th of May, the Carlist force surrendered; and General Evans and most of the British officers quitted the Spanish Service—which to foreigners has never been a grateful one.

At the Election of 1841, he contested Westminster, and was beaten by Captain Rous, whose success was very unexpected, and was attributed to the apathy and indifference with which the public regarded the fall of the Whigs, whose financial and legislative career had for some years been embarrassed and unsuccessful. Since that period, the gallant officer has not mixed much in public life; he is now restored to it in a manner that must be flattering to him, the majority in his favour being 937. His political opinions are too well known to require capitulation.

CAPTAIN ROUS, R.N.

A Tory sitting for Westminster would formerly have been deemed an impossibility; yet in 1841, Captain Rous, on Tory principles, was returned against a tried Liberal: but the gallant officer has many of the qualities that win popularity, apart from political opinions. A frank, open, and manly bearing; a bold and ready style of speaking; no hesitation about speaking plain truths in a plain manner; all blended with a spice of humour that smacks too much of the sailor, not to be acceptable to Englishmen of all classes—these were his recommendations to the Electors of Westminster. Some of his speeches in the House were "refreshing" in the midst of the abundance of half-phrased condemation there to be found. The Gallant Captain never hinted faults or hesitated dislikes; he said what he thought, and that was not always very favourable to the Board of Admiralty. He speaks well, however, on other than professional questions; it is said that he has suddenly changed his opinions on the Corn-Laws; this is hardly just as a charge; we believe he supported the Canada Corn Bill, and, on more than one occasion, defended the relaxation of the Protective System. In the House he was much liked; his address and delivery were good, and, on naval questions, his experience was valuable, for he has seen some hard service.

The Hon. Henry John Rous is the brother of the Earl of Stradbroke, one of the oldest families in England, as it has been established, it is said, in Suffolk, since the days of the Saxon Heptarchy. He was born in 1795, and entered the navy in 1818: he served under the late Sir W. Hoste, and has gained as good a reputation in his profession as most men can do in a time of peace. He has just been appointed by Sir Robert Peel one of the Lords of the Admiralty, an office for which a seat in Parliament is not required.

WESTMINSTER ELECTION.—THE HUSTINGS IN COVENT GARDEN.

LORD LINCOLN.

The seat for the Southern Division of Nottinghamshire is vacant, in consequence of Lord Lincoln having been appointed Secretary for Ireland. He has, of course, to be re-elected by his constituents. There is an opposition to his return on the part of the Protectionists, who have put forward Mr. Hildyard as their candidate; and Lord Lincoln has to engage in the contest under peculiar circumstances, as it is rumoured that the influence of his father, the Duke of Newcastle, will be rather used against him than in his support. His Lordship supported the Ministerial policy, and has most ably defended his conduct in so doing. Some surprise has been expressed that his Lordship should have resigned the office of First Commissioner of Woods and Forests to take the post of Irish Secretary, as the last is considered an office of lower rank. We can scarcely think so; it gives great influence in the ruling of a people—a far higher kind of power than the administration of any department connected with the public revenue. He himself says:

He did not know whether the office he had just accepted was inferior in rank to the one he formerly held. It might be so. But his services had been demanded in that new sphere by his Sovereign, and if he were called to serve her Majesty in an office lower still, his services should be, as heretofore, readily accorded, without reference to its personal dignity. Duty alone ought to actuate a servant of the Crown, and not the consideration whether the office were a little higher or a little lower.

The canvass of Mr. Hildyard has been interrupted by the sudden death of a relative, but it is stated that he will go to the poll. Whatever the decision may be, we doubt if Nottinghamshire can return an abler representative. In the business of the department over which he presided, Lord Lincoln always displayed great official talent; in the details of measures he was always at home, lucid and clear in his statements, and always ready with any explanations that were required. His Lordship is popular with the House, and deservedly so, and we augur well of his success in an office that will bring him before the public more frequently, and on greater questions than he has had yet to deal with. He speaks well, in a manly, straightforward, and business-like style, which is always approved in the House of Commons, where time is valuable. His Lordship is the eldest son of the Duke of Newcastle; he was first returned for the county in 1832.

THE RIGHT HON THE EARL OF LINCOLN.

AGRICULTURAL SCENES.—FEBRUARY, UNSTACKING WHEAT.

This is the second of our Series of Illustrations of the Agricultural Life of the Year, drawn by Mr. Duncan. It shows a scene from the farm business of the month—the Unstacking of Wheat—and is commended by its vraisemblance to actual life, the fidelity of its accessories, and the highly artistical treatment of the entire subject.

GOSSIP OF THE WEEK.

We have got possession of a curious document apropos of the Westminster Election. It is a letter from a very intelligent Chinese resident in London to a friend in Peking, one of the Members of the Ning-Ko, or Imperial Council, giving an account of the nomination in Covent-garden:—

"TO KY-LEEN, MANDARIN OF THE WHITE BUTTON, FROM HIS FRIEND SLY-SLANG, A MERCHANT.

"Since I have lived among the outer barbarians, oh, Ky-leen, I have been storing up knowledge with constant labour; like the bee, which extracts its honey from all flowers, the acid and the sweet alike.

"In our land, the wisest are appointed to rule over provinces, states, and departments. The youth who swallows the fruit of knowledge with the greatest avidity, and digests it most effectually at school, is appointed into the magistracy, being chosen for his wisdom by the wise. What saith the proverb? 'The birch beareth good fruit,' and 'A diligent scholar maketh a good master.'

"Here, among these barbarians, the manner of choice is widely different. Those who choose councillors are less wise than the councillors chosen, and I cannot learn what it is that gives unto a man a place in the Loo-poo, or council of this nation. It is not wisdom, of a truth. Those that they call 'Dukes' bear rule therein, yet are they not wise Sometimes I am told by the barbarians that it is wealth; sometimes that councillors are elected because the chosen one beareth such and such a name. To us of the flowery land, who choose rulers according to their wisdom and knowledge only, this is strange. Truly, I bless the great Fo that I was born in China.

"Some days ago, I went with a friend of the Hoppo, a merchants' company, to witness the nomination of a councillor to sit in the Too-long, or place of speech of the nation called Parliament.

"The nomination takes place from what, in the barbarian tongue, is called 'hustings,' which is shortened from 'hustle tings'—from the hustling and shoving of each other to and fro, which goes on by the law, when a councillor is being chosen. The hustings for Westminster is built in the great vegetable market of London. I found out the reason of this: the people make unto those who present themselves for councillors, offerings of decayed vegetables; and the damaged carrot, with the fetid turnip, and the odoriferous cabbage, are thrown unto the mandarins on the hustings. It is an unsavoury offering, and thy friend received thereof, albeit meant for some one else. Then came forward a Too-quen, or Chief Officer, to propose one for councillor, but the choosers shouted aloud, and his voice was not heard; so that it appeared strange to me how they knew who was to be chosen at all. They choose their councillor, it seemed to me, by loud shrieking and groaning, and cursing and striking of one another; and, when the favourite mandarin came forward, he had such vegetables offered up to him as I have described. Truly, these Barbarians are a wonderful people. The madmen, and the drunken, and the ignorant among them, choose their chiefs. I, a native of the flowery land, was sad when I saw this. My bowels were as water. "They friend, [illegible]"

We do not wonder at the impression which the Westminster Election appears to have produced on our worthy friend. It requires the working out of a great many problems in one's own mind ere one can see how out of the dust, and clamour, and frenzy of a Representative Election can come any of the good effects of a Representative Government.

The Bail Court has been enlivened this week with one of the most curious legal dramas that ever piqued the languid curiosity of London life. An imposing action was being tried for breach of promise of marriage, with an Earl for the defendant. An interesting young lady (though unromantically named "Smith"), has been wooed and won by a heartless lordling, who, while breathing the most ardent vows to Miss Smith is arranging his marriage with another. A host of letters, choice samples of the absurd and the passionate jumbled together, but bearing every external mark of authenticity, is produced. Witnesses are examined—father, mother, and sister of the young lady. All goes on swimmingly, and one anticipates swinging damages; when, lo! the case for the plaintiff having closed, with no part of it materially shaken, even by the skilful cross-questioning of the Attorney-General, up gets the learned counsel, and, with a few hours' work, proves, even to the satisfaction of his learned brother, that the letters are wholesale forgeries; that Miss Smith is a most accomplished intriguer, who has constructed and acted through a most ingenious romance of real life; that Lord Ferrers has never seen her or spoken to her since he was a boy at his tutor's, and she a girl at school; that the letters she wrote to him (the posting of which was proved), were anonymous; and the case was dropped, the Solicitor-General electing to be non-suited.

There is nothing like this, as far as we know, in the annals of deception. The question naturally occurs, who forged the letters?

We direct the attention of our readers to the report of the trial, in another part of our paper.

We conclude our Gossip with an earnest exhortation to the House of Commons to get through their business, to leave off their iteration, and begin the work of the session, to the air of "Sigh no more, ladies."

Talk no more, Members; Members, talk no more;
Corn-Laws are gone for ever!
Your constant talk would be a bore,
Though it were twice as clever.
Then prate not so,
But let them go,
And abuse neither Peel nor Johnny
For converting the country's song of woe
Into hey, nonney, nonney.

Make no more speeches, Members, make no mo.
Speeches both dull and heavy:
It's too bad on our patience so
Dreadful a tax to levy.
Then prate not so,
But to voting go,
And support both Peel and Johnny,
Converting the country's song of woe
Into hey, nonney, nonney.

THE THEATRES.

SURREY

There is no reason why the Surrey Theatre should not take precisely the same position in London, as the Ambigu has at Paris. It is admirably constructed house—to our thinking, one of the best in the metropolis. Its stage is very spacious, and its machinery can produce the most elaborate effects; whilst its melodramatic company is of the most excellent. Above all, it is situated in the centre of a densely-populated neighbourhood, and at a union of several large thoroughfares from important quarters of town.

It has also little opposition, for the Victoria house—the Victoria—cannot in any way affect it, as things are at present managed there; and the entertainments at Astley's are entirely of a different character. Altogether, everybody conversant with theatrical matters will tell you that it is "a fine property." The engagements, at different periods, of the leading vocalists from the large theatres, as well as of Madame Vestris, Mr. Charles Mathews, and other acknowledged stars, have given to it a certain degree of importance. But yet it does not succeed here, as the Porte St. Martin does. Why not, we will endeavour to point out.

The position of the dramatists in Paris is entirely different to that in England. They are more united as a body; and for that reason form a most powerful clique. In proof of which we may cite a case that occurred a year or two ago in Paris. The lessees of the Gymnase Dramatique having refused to comply with a demand put forth by the dramatic authors, that they were compelled, if nightly terms are agreed upon, half-a-sovereign as considered ample remuneration for a three-act drama. Whilst trash can be procured at this cheap rate, the managers do not care to look for better things; nor will acknowledged dramatists stoop to write them.

And next with respect to the mise en scene: and here a great reform is needed in the reasoning beauty of detail, so charming to the eye in the French theatres, is with us entirely lost sight of. Managers never give the public credit for understanding effect as well as—nay, very often better than—they do themselves; but they have only to sit in the pit and hear the remarks about them, to form a different opinion. It is not likely that, with the present constant endeavours to infuse artistic feelings into the masses, they should remain unconscious of the glaring incongruities perpetrated by every scene. Wings that have not the most remote connection with the flats, except that the same shrub with the popular buff Margate slipper, are heterogeneously thrown together; and the more all these defects can be multiplied the more the managerial idea of a "grand spectacle" is realised.

We are happy to notice a great improvement upon all these points, in a drama brought out here on Monday, called "The Sea-King's Vow," from the pen of Mr Edward Stirling. It is founded on a legend, thus given in the bills:—

"A swarm of savage Norsemen and Danes had overran the Saxon Kingdom of Wessex: the history of tyranny scarcely furnishes a more appalling picture of devastating and appalling cruelty than that which followed the success of their invasion. Thorgil, the Sea-King, vowed unless a hundred of the fairest and noblest virgins of the land became the willing slaves of his ruthless chiefs, to exterminate the name of Saxon from British ground, and make the Kingdom a desolate waste."

These fair and noble virgins, not approving of Thorgill's intentions, revolt upon taking up arms, and this determination furnishes the chief effects of the piece, which comprise the warlike evolutions of these lady warriors, all clad in bright armour, their military tactics, and their final struggle for liberty, and defeat of the foe. We have never seen anything of the kind so well done, since the first production of "The Revolt of the Harem." They had all the precision of their late fellow Amazons at the Lyceum, and mustered four times as many. The plot of the piece was somewhat confused; but it afforded scope for some excellent acting by Mr. Hughes and Mrs. Vining: and Mr. J. T. Johnson fought a combat with three Danes, which would have crowned Messrs. Blanchard and Bradley with honour in their best days. Mr. Cowell and Miss Martin supported the comic characters admirably.

A great expense has evidently been incurred in putting the piece on the stage; but it will repay the outlay: and is a great relief to the unbroken domestic heroine line of business. Its reception was most triumphant. On Tuesday evening, when we were present, the house was crowded to the ceiling. And to see the Surrey crowded to the ceiling is no ordinary spectacle; it is alone worth the pilgrimage to the transpontine districts.

We hope the success of this piece will induce the lessee to bring forward others with similar spirit. To draw money to the treasury, it must be both plentiful and well-expended: the public will never grudge their patronage to my theatre, which they see carried on with judicious liberality. On the other hand a rumour of economy, once set abroad, is death to all dramatic speculations.

QUEEN'S

Mr. Henry Betty has been playing at this house during [illegible] Monday and Tuesday as Macbeth, on Wednesday and Thursday as [illegible] on Friday and Saturday as Othello. His performance of Hamlet on Wednesday, when we were present, was above mediocrity, but he was very indifferently supported. The audience evidently comprehended but little of what they were hearing. They applauded Mr. Betty, it is true, in those portions of the tragedy, with which they were in a measure familiar; but, beyond this, bestowed all their attention upon Polonius. We were sorry to see the house so poorly attended.

OLYMPIC

The career of this management was suddenly cut short on Monday evening Mr. Oxley was announced to appear in one of Shakspeare's plays, but before the hour for opening the doors, a bill was pasted up to the effect that there would be no performance, the season having terminated. Rumours have been prevalent for some time, in theatrical circles, that the salaries at this house were anything but certain, as Saturday came round; and, judging from the style in which the pieces were produced, and the manner in which they were played, this was not to be wondered at. We have refrained (possibly more than we ought to have done, as impartially reporting what is going on in the world) from speaking too harshly of the management of this theatre, conscious that many hard-working individuals were dependent on it for the means for support of themselves and families; but now that the "season" is concluded, we cannot injure them by expressing our free opinion.

The theatre was opened under the management of a Miss Kate Howard—a lady we had not before seen, but, as the result has proved, one perfectly incompetent to fill the post of either principal actress or directress. A company was collected chiefly (with the exception of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Lacy, whom we were sorry to see there) of those unfortunate artistes who always contrive to get their names associated with sixth-rate speculations; and, after many flourishing promises, a few new pieces were badly acted and, then, several threadbare farces and dramas, and a wretched burlesque on Mr. Dickens's last work, effectually brought the career of this entreprise to a contemptible termination. At the very commencement of the season we remarked that all that was convenient with theatrical affairs could have done the same, even in contradiction to most or our commentaries. We trust this will be the last of these disgraceful speculations—for such they really are. They never the profession; they hold back salaries from those who can the worst afford to lose them; and, what is worse than all, they attach a stigma irrevocably to the names of all the actors and actresses engaged in such forlorn hopes of success.

The minor theatres are just at present running on Zoological attractions. In addition to the two Elephants at Astley's, there are two more at the City of London theatre, from Mr. Hughes's Menagerie, as well as the dog Emile. Some of the Saloons advertise Lions and Tigers; and, at the Standard, there are horses, a dog, and a monkey—from whether it is a case or an impersonation we know not. By the way, we were wrong in stating that the Astley's Elephants were from Paris; we believe they have been engaged from a caravan.

MUSIC.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.

Sacred Concerts.—The fifth scheme, on Wednesday night, was as usual well attended, at Crosby Hall. Mitchell's fine anthem, "Prepare ye the Way," was well executed. He was Master of the Choristers at St. Paul's, in 1686, and was killed in a night brawl with a watchman, in Salisbury. A charming duet by Bellamy, "What Holy Calm," was sung [illegible] Miss Steele and Mr. Francis. Mr. Machin was called upon to sing twice, Hasse's air, "Let the Storm," from the "Pal of Jericho." Miss Steele gave Preyer's air, "The Voyager's Invocation," so delightfully, that she was compelled to repeat it. Miss Rainforth sang, with Machin, Mehul's duet from "Joseph" "Dear Child of Hope," and also gave Handel's air from "Joshua"—"Hark! 'tis the Linnet." Gleanings from F. A. Reissiger, Neukomm, Cherubini, J. S. Bach, Spohr, and Graun, were also judiciously made. Mendelssohn's psalm, "Hear my Prayer," composed expressly for these Concerts, was executed for the second time. Miss Masson performed on the organ, which, by the way, is susceptible of improvement in quality—with her accustomed success. The last Concert will be given March 13th.

Choral Harmonists.—Our tickets reached us too late to attend the fourth meeting on Monday last, at the London Tavern. The scheme comprised Weber's Mass in G; Mozart's Offertorium, "Laudate Dominum;" Hummel's Chorus, "Hark the Angel Voice;" F. Ascher's Madrigal (1590), "Ah Ile, where is My True Love?" and the Overture and Selection from Mozart's "Magic Flute. We missed, therefore, a great treat. The next concert will be on the 9th of March.

The Euterpean Society. The fifth concert took place last Tuesday, at the City Lecture Theatre, in Milton-street, when a selection from Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" was performed: Mrs. Newton, Miss Chambers, Mr. Redfearn, and Mr. Leffler being the principal singers.

The Richmond Institution.—Miss S Hobbs, a young and promising vocalist, who has been heard with success at Concerts, with pleasure, gave a Soirée on Tuesday night, which was well attended. She was assisted by Miss E. Sabilla Novello, Mr. Wingham, and Mr. Weatherbee. Miss Hobbs was encored in Handel's "Verdure Clad, and [illegible]

Mr. Blagrove's Concert.—This clever fiautist had a large muster of his friends on Wednesday evening, at the Princess' room, in Castle-street, aided by M. de Folly, Mr. Bolton, and Mr. Walter Wells, also Sons. Mr. H. Laurent and Miss Chipp, pianists, the Chelsea Guitarists, Mr. Dando, the violinist, Miss Hess, the Misses Williams, Mr. Lockey, and Signor F. Labbache, vocalists. Mr. Mitchell was the conductor. There was a very agreeable programme, of which Hiles's own cavatina, sung by Miss Birch, with the obligato, to which the latter attached piece

229. "A Father," decidedly the best of the three, has less of these defects, although we should desire a little more simplicity and transparency in the water.

276 "A Pirate carrying off a Captive," does not convey an exact notion of its title, but affords another opportunity of displaying the power of delineating female figure.

We cannot find anything to admire in the "Children Reposing after a Bath," 197.

Landseer has condescended to send but one picture, a very small figure (3), which he calls "The Penitent," though it shows very little feeling of repentance; however, it is a very pretty profile, but weakly painted 422 "The Cabin Door," by Topham, is a charming little bit of nature, of very great pretensions, and very artistically placed in an obscure corner of the room, under a lot of works of ambitious size and inferior merit.

277 "View between Delft and the Hague," by Waldorp; looks like an old Flemish picture. It yields to none in the collection for charm of execution, which pervades every detail and point of reality and character.

19. "Frost Scene—Evening." Mr G Brandwhite seems to have aimed at displaying in the same frame all the different qualities that are requisite to portray the most various and sometimes opposed effects of nature, and his bold attempt has been decidedly successful. The exquisite handling of the minutest details may well be compared after the manner of the many background.

160. "The Vale of Teral;" and 363, "Pads in Epdaurus," are both remarkable for the distance the artist gives to his canvass, and his admirable sense of perspective; though a little more warmth in the colouring and atmosphere of this truly gorgeical scene. We can vouch for the special accuracy of the scene from Epidaurus.

The exhibition, so deficient in historical subjects, or compositions of a lofty character, is, as might be expected, rich in views and landscapes, of which Creswick is always the most prominent contributor. His "Skirts of the Forest" grand in conception, and broad in execution—is now only the best of the three he has sent there, but certainly the most remarkable of its class.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS, RECENTLY DECEASED.

GENERAL SIR WILLIAM HENRY CLINTON, G.C.B.

This venerable and highly distinguished Officer, whose term of service exceeded sixty years, was son of the late Sir Henry Clinton, K.B., Commander-in-Chief in America against Washington, and grandson of Admiral the Hon. George Clinton, an eminent Naval Officer, whose father, Sir Francis Fiennes Clinton, Knt., inherited the Earldom of Lincoln in 1692. At a very early age, in 1784, Sir William entered the Army as Cornet 7th Light Dragoons; in 1787 became Lieutenant; in 1790, Captain; in 1794, Lieutenant-Colonel; in 1801, Colonel; in 1808, Major-General; in 1813, Lieutenant-General; and in 1830, General. During the Dutch campaign of 1793-4, he was actively engaged, and took part in twelve sieges and encounters. He was subsequently appointed to the command of the Allied Anglo-Sicilian Army on the East Coast of Spain, and in that important station rendered essential aid to the operations of Lord Wellington, by keeping in check the whole force of Marshal Suchet.

In 1814, he obtained the colonelcy of the 55th Foot, and in 1842, was presented to the office of Lieut.-Governor of Chelsea Hospital. Sir William married, in 1797, Louisa Dorothea, daughter of the Earl of Sheffield, and has left a large family, of which is Lieutenant-Colonel Clinton of the Grenadier Guards. The deceased General was returned for Newark in 1826, by the interest of his kinsman the Duke of Newcastle, and continued to sit in Parliament until 1829. His death occurred on Sunday morning, the 15th, at the family seat, Cockenhatch, near Royston, whither he had been removed, during the previous week, for change of air, from his town residence, Audley-square.

SIR GEORGE LEFEVRE, M.D.

Sir George Lefevre, whose death took place a few days since, held a good position in the medical profession, was Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, and Physician to the British Embassy at St. Petersburg. He had appeared also in the world of letters, and was author of a pamphlet entitled "Thermal Comfort." He was son of the Rev. George Lefevre, of Southampton, was born in 1796, and married in 1825 a daughter of Colonel Charles Fraser, East India Company's service.

THE ANNUAL CATHOLIC CHARITIES' Ball took place on Monday last, at the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover-square, and was very brilliantly attended. Although the proceeds of this ball are dedicated to a charitable purpose, all the arrangements were on a most liberal scale

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The deaths in the metropolis, in the week ending the 14th instant, amounted to 911; births, 1,375

ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION.—On Tuesday morning a journeyman typefounder, named John Fency, attempted to stab Thomas Martin, in a house situated in Cradle-court, Redcross-street, Cripp gate. The culprit, a man about fifty years of age, was examined at Guildhall, on Wednesday, charged with running a carving knife into the left side of Martin, between the eleventh and twelfth ribs, penetrating to the lower part of the thorax, within the cavity of the chest. According to the evidence of Sebastian Emberton, the quarrel originated in jealousy. Martin was subsequently examined, though in a very precarious state. The prisoner was conveyed to the Compter, to await the fate of Martin.

STEERING FROM A STEAMER.—On Tuesday afternoon, the Diamond, Gravesend steamer, which leaves London-bridge-wharf at four o'clock, was off Northfleet, on her downward passage, when a man (unknown), who was standing on the afterdeck, suddenly jumped over the side of the vessel into the river. On the alarm being given, Captain Fox promptly stopped the engine and turned astern, and lowered her stern-boat, which was quickly on the spot, but too late to recover the body; only his hat and handkerchief being seen and picked up, and which are at the Diamond-office.

COUNTRY NEWS.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE IN LIVERPOOL.—A fire of an alarming character broke out on Tuesday afternoon, in the Back Goree, Liverpool, on the premises in the rental of Messrs Heath and Sons. The building was eight stories in height, and was respectively occupied, the second and third entirely by Mr. Edward Heath, and were stored with tallow on the second floor, and tallow on the third floor. In rooms five and six there was Indian corn, and on the seventh floor there were 1,400 quarters of flour belonging to Mr. John Bald. The building has fallen a prey to the flames. The warehouse adjoining has taken fire, and was nearly destroyed. The insurance offices will be losers to a considerable sum. The amount of property destroyed, including buildings and merchandise, is estimated at upwards of £250,000. It is believed that the fire originated with the carelessness of some of the porters, who very culpably have been allowed to smoke in every part of the building, as the disaster originated in a story where they usually congregated, and broke out a few minutes after they had gone to dinner.

EAST GLOUCESTERSHIRE ELECTION.—The High Sheriff has fixed Friday, the 27th inst., as the day for the nomination of candidates to fill the vacancy occasioned by the retirement of the Hon. Francis Charteris; the nomination will be at the County Hall, Gloucester. At present, the Marquis of Worcester is the only candidate in the field.

NORTH NOTTINGHAM ELECTION. The nomination is fixed for the 28th inst. Lord A. Bentinck is a candidate.

HUNTINGDONSHIRE ELECTION.—The seat in the House of Commons vacated by the retirement of the Hon. W. Dawnay, was on Saturday conferred upon George Finch, Esq., of Burley on-the-Hill, without opposition. Mr. Finch is a Conservative and a Protectionist.

IRELAND.

MURDER OF A WIFE BY HER HUSBAND.—On the 10th instant, while a man of the name of Daniel Dunn was in the act of cutting lumber in his house, he had some angry words with his wife, during which he struck her with the hatchet he held in his hand, and killed her. This shocking deed occurred at Dunn's house, near Cloghjeen. Dunn has made a full confession of his guilt, and has been committed to Tipperary gaol for trial.

EXECUTION OF SERGEANT MCLELINGAN. On Friday (last week) Bryan Seery was executed at Maidstone. The conviction took place under the following circumstances: Some time since Sir Francis Hopkins was shot at by a man in Westmeath; Sir Francis escaped the assassin, but his escaped; and after wards Seery was captured. The sole witness to the prisoner's identity with the assassin was the prosecutor: the defence was the common Irish defence—ALIBI; which was of course, as it usually is in Ireland. One of the Jury could not agree to the verdict, two Roman Catholics standing out against conviction: a second Jury condemned the man: efforts to procure commutation of his sentence failed, and he was left for execution. Seery, at the place of execution, solemnly denied his guilt. A circumstance highly characteristic of the feeling of the public occurred. The morning was calm—the sounding of bugles and beating of drums was heard in all directions. There was a perfect cessation of business in the town about ten o'clock all the shops were closed, and not a single human being was to be seen in the streets—not one individual from the entire city. Thus the people determined to mark their opinion of this awful tragedy—for all regard seery as a martyr. At eleven o'clock the military were paraded before the gaol, and not one human being appeared before the scaffold but themselves and the police. Even the magistrates of the county stayed away—not one of them appeared, except Mr. Unacke, who walked up and down with Captain Despard. Under the imposing head of the "Maidstone Tragedy," the reporter of the Dublin Freeman furnishes that journal with a long and highly-coloured account of the interment of Bryan Seery. The melancholy spectacle took place on Sunday, in the presence of vast multitudes of the country people, whose numbers were estimated by the writer to amount to 80,000 or 60,000 souls.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE ROYAL HUNTING ESTABLISHMENT.

No bright particular star in the constellation of its aristocratic appendages not even the company of courtly beefeaters itself is so characteristic of the train of a British Monarch as its appliances and means of woodcraft. Contemporary almost with our Kingly institution is the provision made for carrying on the chace as part and parcel of the Royal state. Probably the office of Grand Falconer is older than that of Master of the Buck Hounds, but the latter is old enough, for we find it was a court appointment in the reign of Edward the Second. During the Protectorate, or plebeian interregnum, it went to the wall, but returned with merry Charles. Passing over its subsequent vicissitudes, we come to it in the especial era of equirearchy the good old times "when George the Third was king." The sport of stag-hunting as now practised, with all its pomp and circumstance—indeed, with rather more, for it has become divested of its yeomen-prickers—was then first promoted and followed in the state befitting a mighty hunter. The fashion in which it then took the field was right Regal. The Royal party appeared in grey frocks with black collars and cuffs; the huntsmen and whips in scarlet and gold; and the aforesaid yeomen-prickers, half-a-dozen in number, in similar liveries, with French horns slung over their shoulders.

About the commencement of the present century George the Third gave up hunting, and the splendour of the Royal hunt fell somewhat into eclipse till the year 1813, in which the late Duke of Richmond presented his celebrated pack of fox-hounds to his Majesty George the Fourth—then Prince Regent. This was a signal for the entire remodelling of the system and its materials. George Sharpe, huntsman to his Royal Highness's fox-hounds when the Prince hunted Hampshire, was appointed to that office with the buck-hounds, and three whippers-in superseded the old yeomen-prickers. In 1833 Lord Maryborough became Master of the Buck-hounds, and was the first who, in that capacity, exercised control over the establishment, the Master of the Horse having heretofore had the management of it. To Lord Maryborough succeeded the Lords Lichfield, Chesterfield, Errol, Kinnaird, and Rosslyn—the latter noblemen having been verily Master of her Majesty's Stag-hounds. With their present position is our present purpose.

No doubt, such Continental people as are cognizant of the fact that there are Royal packs of stag-hounds, and of harriers, and of beagles, set it down that when at the Castle of Windsor the English Court does nothing but circumvent beasts of chase, hares, hares, and such-like, morning, noon, and night. When it regards deer chasing, it is our duty to undeceive them. The Royal hunting establishment is a modern illustration of the beau à nos lucarnes; not a member of our Royal family or its connexions ever goes near it, save, upon rare occasions, since the opprobrium of Ascot, has been very nearly eradicated; and, when it does now appear, it is so much less violent than it was wont, that a little care restores the patient. The open weather they have had this season has been very fatal to their diet, a large average having fallen victims, but they have eleven or twelve brace in the paddocks at Swinley.

In bounds they were never so strong—neither, perhaps, was the quality ever so good: the bitch pack, which showed at the meet at the kennels on Monday last, was a model of shape and condition. Mr. Charles Davis, one of the best and most popular men of his craft, continues to hunt them, and seems to grow younger every day; and they are whipped in by the two Bartletts father and son. The hunting stud stands at Cumberland Lodge: it is good, but not quite up to the standard. All the essentials of such an establishment, however, there are, but the desinus affatus spirit of the institution is wanted. It was meant that the Royal hounds should have Royal hunters; and it is a proof of the extreme apathy and currency of those who occupy the district over which they hunt, that, however they may be dissatisfied with the present state of things, they "give no sign." It is certainly to be regretted that those to the manner born do not patronise the field-days of the Royal stag hounds; but it is not for that reason we would have the establishment put an end to.

Fox-hunting, in the neighbourhood of London, is a farce. You might as well expect an Alderman to give a run as Reynard born and bred in a metropolitan preserve. Would ye have the youth of this metropolis the heirs of Cockaigne, if it please ye—as ignorant of woodcraft as the moustached multitude of the Italian Boulevard? Perish the thought, young sir! What though late has planted you remote from woods, there is such a man as Tilbury, who, for a consideration, will mount you becomingly. There is the Royal Hunting Establishment always within an hour or so of Charing-cross: take the car with it, and our advice as to the manner. Remember, the days of the road are over—therefore eschew Macadam. If your horse will jump, so much the better; but, next to being well over a fence, it is honourable to be well in it. And, above all, cultivate patience: rather die than let the parson of the parish beat you. Let no man ever reproach you with having wore a pair of spurs—merely as ornaments to your heels. Bear these hints always about you; and, when you are at the meeting of the next stag, unless you show some of the base Bezonians the stern of your steed, it's time your father bound you 'prentice to a tailor.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—Mermaid, of whom we have previously spoken, as a rising favourite for the Chester Cup, was in great force this afternoon, rising from 30 to 20 to 1, and disputing the premiership with Lord George Bentinck's nag—who, by the way, was rather on the tetter. Whinstone, Sweetmeat, Arthur, Fitzallen, and Catalani, were in demand, but no material change in the prices was observable. The Derby bets were 6 to 1 agst Sting, laid to several hundred pounds; 15 to 1, to two or three hundred, agst Rocardo—an improvement of three points; 1000 to 40, at least two times, agst Tibthorpe; and 1000 to 25 agst Hamdrum. Nothing fresh in the Oaks.

GAME THE SIXTH.

WHITE (Mr. H.)	BLACK (Mr. S.)	WHITE (Mr. H.)	BLACK (Mr. S.)
1. K P two	K P two	13. K to takes P	Q B to Q R 3rd
2. K Kt to B 3rd	Q Kt to B 3rd	14. Q Kt to K 2nd *	P to Q B 4th †
3. K to Q B 4th	K B to Q B 4th	15. B to K 3rd	P takes P
4. Q B P one	K Kt to B 3rd	16. B takes P ‡	B takes Kt
5. Q P two	P takes P	17. Q takes B	B takes B
6. K P one	Q P two	18. Kt to Q B 6th	Q to K B 3rd §
7. K B to Q Kt 5th	K Kt to K 5th	19. Kt takes B	Q takes Kt
8. P takes P	B to Q Kt 3rd	20. Q R to Q sq	Q to her B 4th
9. Castles	Castles	21. Q R to Q B sq	Q to her Kt 3rd
10. K R P one	K B P one	22. Q Kt to P one	R to K Kt 6th
11. Q Kt to B 3rd	P takes K P	23. Q to her 3rd	Kt takes K R
12. B takes Kt	P takes B

And, after a few more moves, White surrendered.

* We should have taken off the Knight in preference. Black, then, as his best move, would probably have taken the Knight (for taking the Rook would be dangerous, on account of Queen's Knight to King's Knight's 8th), and thus the game might have proceeded thus

WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
14. Q Kt takes Kt	Q P takes Kt	16. Q takes Q	P takes Q
15. Q to her Kt 3rd (ch)	Q to her 4th	17. K R to Q sq., &c.

The position, however, would, even then, have been much in favour of the second player, from the commanding situation of his two Bishops.

† This is stronger play, we believe, than taking the Q Kt. After advancing the doubled Pawn, Black remarked that, had his position been less favourable, and the advantages springing from this move less obviously certain, he should have much preferred the more enterprising play of taking the K B P, with his Kt—a sacrifice, as he demonstrated in an after game, which leads to many strikingly beautiful situations. For example:

WHITE.	BLACK.
	15. Kt takes K B P
16. R takes Kt (best)	16. K takes R
17. K takes R (best	17. Q to K R 8th (ch)
In the first back game White now played:
18. K to his B sq	Whereupon Black mated him prettily enough as follows:—
	18. R to K B sq (ch)
19. K Kt to B 3rd	19. R takes Q P
20. Q to R sq (His only move, unless he give up the Q for the Bishop.)	20 R takes Kt (ch)
21. P takes R	21. Q takes K R P Mate

In the second back game instead of "K to B sq," White played:

WHITE.	BLACK.
18. K Kt's P one	18. Q takes K P
19. K to K B 3rd (or a)	19. K to K B sq
20. Q Kt to K B 4th	20. B takes Q P
21. Q takes B	21. Q to K B 8th (ch)
22. K to his 3d	22. R to K sq (ch)
(If now, White play Kt to K's 6th, he loses his Q; therefore),	Black may now take the Kt or play R to K's 8th, in either case having a winning game.
(a) 19. Q Kt to K B 4th	19. B takes Q P (ch)
(If White take the B, he loses his Q in three moves; therefore),
20. K to B 3rd (b)	20. R to K B sq
21. Q takes B	21. Q to K R 8th (ch)
(If now the K be played to B's 2nd, or K's 3rd, Black wins the Q; therefore),
22. K to Kt 4th	22. B to his sq (ch), and Black wins.

There are many other variations, but these will suffice to show the resources of the attack.

(b) He may also play B to K 3rd, upon which Black can check with his Q, and afterwards take the Kt with B, having a better game.

‡ This move loses a clear piece. Play as he could, however, the game was irretrievable

§ A move White overlooked, when he, unfortunately, took the P with Bishop.

 Upon the termination of this Game, the score stood as follows:

Drawn	.. ..	..	0

The Match, which has been delayed for ten days, owing to the indisposition of Mr. Horwitz, is appointed to be continued on Monday next, the 23rd.

FRESCO FROM "COMUS," BY D. MACLISE, R. A.—FROM HER MAJESTY'S PAVILION, IN BUCKINGHAM PALACE GARDENS.

THE DECORATIONS OF THE GARDEN-PAVILION IN THE GROUNDS OF BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

In returning to Mr. Gruner's Illustrations of this artistical experiment, we have selected, for engraving, one of the lunette frescoes of the Central Octagonal Room, decorated with scenes from Milton's "Comus," which, says Mrs. Jameson, "at once classical, romantic, and pastoral, with all its charming associations of grouping, sentiment, and scenery, was just the thing to inspire English artists, to elevate their fancy to the height of their argument, to render their task at once a light and a proud one; while nothing could be more beautifully adapted to the shades of a trim garden devoted to the recreation of our Lady Sovereign than the chaste, polished, yet picturesque elegance of the poem considered as a creation of art."

From the eight lunettes we have selected the fifth, by Mr. Maclise. R.A.

> Brightest Lady, look on me
> Thus I sprinkle on thy breast
> Drops, that from my fountain pure
> I have kept of precious care.
> Comus, v. 910—919.

The Lady, spell-bound, not only "in stony fetters fixed and motionless," but asleep or in a trance, is seated in the marble chair. Sabrina and her attendant Nymphs are hovering round her. One Nymph presents in a shell the water "from the fountain pure." Sabrina, bending over the Lady, is about to sprinkle her and to pronounce "the dissevering charm." In front stand the two Brothers and the attendant Spirit. In the spandrils, two of the deformed "rabble rout" look down in affright.

This is, throughout, a masterly composition; and is, to our thinking, the most classical scene of the series.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

A very interesting contribution has just been made to the art-treasures of the National Gallery—in the addition of Banks's celebrated marble alto-relief group of Thetis and her Nymphs Ascending from the Sea to Condole with Achilles on the death of Patroclus. It is an oval, less than half the size of life; and is placed in the Hall of the Gallery, to the right of the entrance doorway.

This beautiful work of art had long been in private hands, and the public are indebted for its present allocation to Mr. Ambrose Poynter the architect, at whose disposal it was placed by Mrs. Forster (the daughter of Banks), on its reverting to that lady's possession. Beneath the oval is placed a small marble tablet, bearing the following:—

> Thetis rising from the sea to console
> Achilles for the loss of Briseis, > by Thomas Banks, R.A.
> Presented by his daughter,
> Mrs. Lavinia Forster.

This inscription was communicated by Mrs. Forster, who is on the Continent: it is, evidently, an error; since the only work executed by Banks, in illustration of Achilles and Briseis, is the noble figure of "the Mourning Achilles," now in the Hall of the British Institution. It should, however, be added, that Mr. Poynter had no opportunity of correcting the inscription tablet before it was fixed. It should, certainly, be set right.

Banks executed this beautiful composition of Thetis and her Nymphs Consoling Achilles, during one of the sculptor's summer visits to Hafod, in Wales: it embodies that graphic passage thus Englished by Cowper:—

> So saying, she left the cave, whom all her nymphs
> Attended, weeping, and where'er they passed,
> The parting billows open'd wide a way.
> At faithful Troy arriv'd, in order fair
> They climb'd the beach, where, by his numerous barks
> Encompass'd, swift Achilles sighing lay.
> Then, drawing nigh to her afflicted son,
> The Goddess, with a piercing shriek, his brows
> Between her palms compress'd.

The sculptor has, unquestionably, felt this fine passage deeply: the Goddess and her Nymphs ascend from the sea like a mist; nor has the buoyant and elastic elegance of those figures been excelled in any work, either of ancient or modern art. Yet, Allan Cunningham considers that "the figure of Thetis, and likewise the forms of her companions, are, amidst all their beauty, longer in proportion than they ought to be; their extent of leg and thigh is enormous. But the buoyant ease with which they make their way from the waves, and the graceful elegance with which they sail into upper air, and surround, as with a garland, the mourning hero, disarm all censure, and leave little admiration for the Achilles who has cast himself down on the shore, and seems resolved on not being comforted. From the smallness of its dimensions, and the variety of beauty which it contains, this little work has become very popular, and is to be found in the studies of all our chief artists."—("Lives of British Painters, Sculptors, and Architects," vol. iii., page 101.)

ALTO-RELIEF OF THETIS AND HER NYMPHS ASCENDING FROM THE SEA TO CONDOLE WITH ACHILLES.—SCULPTURED BY BANKS, AND JUST PLACED IN THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

SCENE FROM THE NEW BALLET OF "THE ISLAND NYMPH," AT DRURY LANE THEATRE.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.

The new fairy ballet, or rather divertissement, of the "Island Nymph," has been repeated with success. We have engraved the opening scene, with Nymphs disporting themselves on the sea-shore. "The atmospheric effect was beautiful (says the Morning Post); it was bright and luminous; and the ballerinas, dispersed in white amaru, golden zoned, seemed the realisation of an antique basso relievo. The horizon becomes darkened, and the young girls seek shelter from the coming storm; and a shallop is seen in the distance, and a Greek youth is wrecked on the island, and scales a rock in the foreground, and the dark clouds disperse, and the scene gradually becomes 'sunny, blithe, and balmy,' and the Nymphs skip in and dance around him, making a very heaven on earth; but Edda, the chief in beauty and in grace, suddenly 'suffers love' for the shipwrecked stranger and the unfortunate youth—yet not unfortunate, as the book saith, since he has encountered a being whose divine beauty has at once inspired him with the most passionate love.' And here Mdlle. Maria, who appeared for the first time this season, was quite charming in her exhibition of the pretty profession of nymph-ish fear—her downcast eyes, and eloquent action, and twinkling feet, advancing and receding, elicited deserved applause—it was charming and unconventional, and absolutely bordered on poetry. But here the Queen of the Island appears arrayed like chaste Diana for the chase; and, after some brief conversation, translated through the medium of ronds de jambes, entrechats, and jette battus, the gentleman is invited to join the sport, but prefers to retire to a grotto and take some repose, and this closes the first act."

'On ivory feet, like Monads bright,'

HAYMARKET THEATRE.

On Friday evening Miss Cushman made her first appearance here in Mr. Sergeant Talfourd's tragedy of "Ion." The attempt was, in some degree, bolder than her previous ones. The recollection of Mrs. Charles Kean (then Miss Ellen Tree), and also of Mr. Macready, was yet comparatively fresh in the minds of the playgoers; and each of these artistes had achieved a triumphant success in the part. The structure of the character of Ion we also conceived to be less adapted to Miss Cushman's style, than the majority of those in which she had already appeared. There are—more especially in the earlier scenes of the tragedy—few opportunities for the display of those bursts of energy and passion which constitute the most striking points of Miss Cushman's performances. The action of the play is too level, the dialogue too cold, although polished and classical, to admit of their being made. In spite of these unfavouring circumstances, however, Miss Cushman was perfectly successful in her representation of the character; and if, in the early acts, she did not evoke those frequent and loud bursts of applause with which she had been greeted on former occasions, it was only because the sympathies of the audience had not been sufficiently aroused by the progress of the story. In fact, as Mr. Sergeant Talfourd has himself said of "Ion," "it is the phantasm of a tragedy—not a thing of substance—mortised into the living rack of humanity; and therefore incapable of exciting that interest which grows out of human feeling, or of holding that permanent place in the memory which truth only can attain."

In the fifth act of the play, Miss Cushman appeared to greater advantage, and her concluding scene was eminently impressive.

Her sister, Miss Susan Cushman, enacted Clemanthe. It was, upon the whole, a pleasing performance; on a level with her Juliet, but labouring, in some degree, under the disadvantages above alluded to. Mr. Stuart performed Adrastus; Mr. Hudson *Crespho*n; and Mr. H. Holl Phocion. The acting of the two latter gentlemen was highly creditable, inasmuch as it evinced much pains-taking attention, but they were entirely out of their element. There was a small burst of applause at the fall of the curtain, and the two sisters were called forward to receive the renewed approbation of the audience.

A very droll farce was produced on Thursday evening, which kept the audience in a roar of laughter from the beginning to the end. It is called "Lend Me Five Shillings," and is from the pen of Mr. Maddison Morton, being a translation of the French piece, "Riche d'Amour," in which Arnal is now playing at the Vaudeville. The fun being entirely dependent upon a rapid succession of comical situations, the plot is somewhat difficult to describe.

The piece begins quaintly enough with a quadrille at an assize ball, where Mr. Golightly (Mr. Buckstone) is captivated with the attractions of Mrs. Fobbs (Miss P. Horton), a pretty widow, whom he has met, whilst her husband was alive, some fifteen months previously at Harrowgate. To his great delight, she requests him to see her home, in a fly; but his happiness is soon crushed by recollecting that, in consequence of his losses at the card-table (which he rushed to in desperation, upon being rejected for a polka), he has not a farthing about him. On this position of affairs, the comicality of the piece hangs. He is driven to the most absurd perpetrations to borrow the money; and, through mistaking his Harrowgate flame for her sister-in-law (who is also present at the ball with her husband), involves himself in the most inextricable mass of perplexities; even to fighting a duel, and running the risk of being taken up for an uttерer of false coin. Those who can call to mind the intense terror which is alone delineated by Buckstone in great difficulties may imagine how ultra-ludicrous he made the character throughout the various dilemmas in which he was thrown. The piece never flagged for one instant, and was loudly applauded at the conclusion. Mr Buckstone appeared before the curtain, and trusted that, as his character appeared to be tolerably good, and as he was personally known to the greater part of the audience, they would have no objection to lend him five shillings every evening until further notice. We can honestly recommend our readers to go and see this very laughable interlude.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert honoured the theatre with their presence, and laughed heartily at the perplexities of the unfortunate hero of the new production. It deserves to have a long run, and, we doubt not, will enjoy it. Buckstone's performance was admirable.

MISS CUSHMAN, AS "ION," AT THE HAYMARKET THEATRE.

GERALD GAGE; OR, THE SECRET.

WHEN Mr. Livingstone landed at Portsmouth, on his arrival from India, he found Mr. Graves with outstretched arms on the beach, ready to embrace him. Had the latter been better acquainted with the man he had to deal with, he would have known that nothing could possibly be more injudicious than this proceeding. Naturally of a suspicious disposition, and aware that a body in the world had expended worth of disinterested regard for him, Mr Livingstone had returned to England with a thousand anxieties to be expectant, and an irritable resolution not to be bored with them, and accordingly the empressement of the nephew, which it was extremely difficult to suppress, was very soon requited by the thorough detestation of the uncle. For a long time Mr. Graves neither could nor would believe in the alienation. He insisted that it was only Mr. Livingstone's manner; and when he found the door shut against himself, he forced in his wife and daughter, who, by their injudicious efforts to win the old man's heart, completed the mischief; and it was not till he wormed out Mr. Pilrig's strange disclosure in the stage-coach, that he was actually convinced of the disappointment awaiting him. From that moment, the constant study of both himself and his wife had been to keep the world in ignorance of this fatal secret, and to get their daughter well married on the strength of her great expectations, before the truth was discovered. But with respect to the latter enterprise, they had hitherto been unsuccessful. When suitors came to close enquiries, they found the fortune was too much en l'air to satisfy their tender affections for the beaux yeux of the young lady's cassette—and one after another fell off, just as they were supposed to be coming to the point. And yet matters were getting more and more urgent, resources were wearing out, creditors becoming pressing, and excuses growing stale. It was in this crisis of affairs that the ladies met Gerald at the table d'hôte; and when, after a couple of days' absence, Mr. Graves returned, he was immediately informed of the rencontre. "We must get acquainted with him, at all events," said he; "there is no telling what may come of it." So Mr. Graves waylaid Gerald at one of his resorts in the Palais Royal, and found no difficulty in making his acquaintance. Indeed, the young man, who was at his wit's end for means to carry on the war, was too happy to find himself courted by a gentlemen who, from his conservation in the coach, he felt satisfied must be a man of immense fortune. Not that he had recollected his features, till Mr. Graves reminded him of their former rencontre, and then they shook hands very cordially; and Mr. Graves invited Gerald to dine with him at Meurice's.

Rolinda wore her pink gros-de-Naples, and her pale hair was teased into innumerable small ringlets, with about half-a-dozen hairs in each. Gerald thought he had never seen anything less attractive than the ensemble; but he wanted friends and upholders at the moment, too much to be otherwise than extremely gallant and empressé. His fine friends had left Paris for Italy, but the consumptive state of his funds had prevented his accompanying them, and the same difficulty kept him in Paris. He fancied it was easier to live there upon nothing than in England; and he felt a mixture of shame and remorse that made him dread the sight of Emily. He was fully sensible of his own folly and of her good sense, and ardently wished he had had resolution to act according to her counsels, though he felt himself just as far as ever from being able to do so, and excused himself by the persuasion that it was now too late. Then, although he really loved her still, was fully sensible of what an admirable wife she would make him, and could not bear the thoughts of seeing her in the arms of another, he was so disgusted at the selfishness and cruelty that had induced him to break off her match with Mr. Weston, when he had no support to offer her himself, that he had for some time ceased even to write to her. "It's better that she should forget me," he said to himself; but he did not think she would, and if he had thought so, he would probably have written.

In the meantime Mr. Graves invited him frequently to dinner, and initiated him into some gambling secrets that he found very useful; and, as they were both actuated by secret motives of interest, unsuspected by the other, they soon became great friends.

CHAPTER VIII.

"Here, Emily, look at this," said old Miss Gage, to her young inmate one day. "I saw this paper at Baxter's shop, and I asked them to lend it me; for I think there is something in it that would suit you. You were saying the other day that you wished you could get a situation as companion, and here is an advertisement for the very thing; and I am sure it must be something of a superior kind, for applications are to be made to Wright and Miller, and that is a first-rate London firm."

"I have heard Gerald speak of them," said Emily; "Charles Miller was one of his schoolfellows, and they were great friends."

"Yes," answered Miss Gage, "and his father and my brother were intimate all their lives. Hear what the advertisement says:—'Wanted as companion to an elderly gentleman and lady, a young lady of education and respectability; she must be well-tempered and cheerful'."

"I am sure I am not cheerful," interrupted Emily.

"Oh, but you are cheerful, naturally," answered Miss Gage, "though you are not so just now; and your spirits will return fast enough when you are out of your trouble."

"When will that be?" asked Emily, with a sigh.

"Never while you stay here, Emily, working your fingers to the bone for scarcely enough to keep body and soul together: but if you were once easy in your circumstances you'd soon recover your spirits."

"You speak as if my circumstances were the only trouble I had, Aunt," said Emily.

"Upon my word, I think they ought to be, my dear," answered Miss Gage. "I should be sorry to think you were fretting after a man who has left you alone to struggle with your difficulties for nearly a twelvemonth, whilst he is living in luxury and idleness; and who has not even written to you for some months."

"I may be at least allowed to grieve that Gerald should be capable of doing so," replied Emily, with a sigh.

"It is a very lamentable thing that he should, certainly," answered Miss Gage; "and as he is my nephew, I have as much right to regret it as you can have; and so I do: but the contempt such conduct deserves ought to come to your aid, as it does to mine. He has pursued his own inclinations without the least regard to your claims on his affection, and as he has sowed he must reap. I should think it arrant baseness in you to continue to love him after the neglect with which he has treated you."

"I dare say it is, said Emily; "but it is not so easy as those who have never tried may think, to cure oneself of loving a person that has long been dear to us, by simply thinking of his unworthiness. Time may do it, perhaps."

"And to give time a fair chance, you should get free as soon as possible of this lonely, hopeless, melancholy sort of life."

"The life of a companion will, probably, be just as dull," said Emily.

"It will not be so laborious, at any rate," answered Miss Gage. "Now do, Emily, let me answer the advertisement. I do not know Mr. Miller myself, but I am sure, for my brother's sake, he will be disposed to listen to my recommendation."

And, after some persuasion, Emily having consented to the proposal, the letter was sent; and, in due time, an answer arrived requesting the appearance of the young lady in London.

"I am very glad you wrote so immediately," said Mr. Miller; "for the candidates are coming in thick and fast; although, in mercy to ourselves, foreseeing the pressure that would ensue, we only said 'a liberal salary will be given,' instead of saying, as we were directed, that, 'provided the person suited, terms would be no object.' However, that is really the case; and, if your young protegée, who, from your description, appears eminently fitted for the situation, can reconcile herself to the confinement, she may, I think, find it both very profitable and very comfortable."

"There, now, Emily, I am quite delighted that I insisted on writing. You must set off to-morrow morning; and I should not the least wonder if this is to be a turn in your fortune."

"I wonder what Gerald would think of it?" said Emily.

"I'm sure that is of very little consequence," answered Miss Gage. "Go, and pack up your things, and think no more of Gerald, I entreat."

Emily observed the first injunction, though not the second; and, in due time, she presented herself at Mr. Miller's, who had, in compliment to the sister of his old friend, requested she would make his house her home, till the affair was settled.

"I think you and the situation will suit each other admirably," said he. "I am sure my client must be a more unreasonable man than I think him, if he be not pleased; and, although you may have some eccentricities to put up with, and may be required to read out loud more than you like, you will meet with a great deal of kindness, and will live in the midst of luxury."

"What is the gentleman's name," enquired Emily, "and how old is he?"

"Why, his name we are not permitted to tell; he is so afraid of being troubled with direct applications from quarters that would not be agreeable, if the thing became public. With respect to his age, he is sixty-five."

"But that is not so very old," objected Emily, with some alarm, "I am afraid"—

"Eh, fear nothing," interrupted Mr. Miller, "every thing will be quite correct; a female relation of his own lives with him, an elderly respectable woman, but she has become very deaf—deafer than he is a great deal, and that does not suit him."

"Then he is very deaf? They are both deaf?" enquired Emily in some alarm.

"He'll hear what you say very well," said Mr. Miller, "never fear. He can hear what he likes."

Emily had great misgivings; she thought she should not like it at all, and regretted her journey to London, which had cost as much as would have maintained her for a fortnight; but Mr. Miller was so kind that she forebore to enforce her objections, and consented to accompany him to the gentleman on the following morning; whom perhaps our readers will have already guessed was no other than Mr. Livingstone, Nicky's hearing had become so imperfect as to render her unfit for her office of interpreter, and he wanted somebody to fill her situation. A young man, he affirmed, he could have no confidence in—he would be wild, if he were not stupid, and would not like the quiet, prosy life; and either man or woman that was not young would not be sufficiently pliable to submit to his ways and notions. Besides, he argued that men more easily found employment, and that there were many redcoat gentlewomen to whom the situation would be a Godsend, "for you know Miller," said he, "if I like her, she shall not be turned destitute into the world when I die. I shall want somebody to take care of Nicky, and I will provide for her."

COURT AND HAUT TON.

HER MAJESTY'S LEVEE.

Her Majesty held her second Levee for the season on Wednesday, at St. James's Palace, which was attended by the Cabinet Ministers, Great Officers of the Household, and a great number of the nobility and gentry

Her Majesty and Prince Albert left Buckingham Palace in the usual state shortly before two o'clock

The Queen and her illustrious Consort were loudly cheered as the Royal cortège passed through the Park. The presentations were numerous.

In the evening, her Majesty had a dinner party at Buckingham Palace. The invitations included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Duchess of Roxburghe, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Mrs. Howley, his Excellency Count Pollon, the Marquis of Abercorn, Lord John Russell, Lord Cawdor, the Earl of Morley, Lady Fanny Howard, Colonel the Right Hon. G. L. Dawson Damer, the Hon. Bingham Baring, Baroness de Speath, and the Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay.

HER MAJESTY'S HEALTH.—It is stated in the best informed circles that her Majesty's confinement is expected before the end of May.

NEW LORD CHANCELLOR.—It is generally understood that the Earl of Liverpool, at present Lord Steward of her Majesty's Household, is to succeed the Earl Delawarr as Lord Chamberlain.

MARRIAGE OF MISS MILES.—We understand that the nuptials of Mr Tudway with Miss Miles, daughter of Mr Miles, M.P., will be celebrated on the [illegible] of March next.

THE LATE ATTEMPTED MURDER AND SUICIDE AT BRENTFORD.—On Tuesday, Thomas Lowe, aged 73, was committed for trial, for stabbing his son, a shoemaker, at Brentford, on the 12th of January last. It will be recollected that after committing the crime with which he stands charged, the prisoner attempted to cut his own throat, and was not, until Tuesday, sufficiently recovered to undergo an examination.

SUSPECTED ARSON AT HAMMERSMITH.—On Wednesday, the further examination of the three persons, viz., John Stone, son, Anne Stone, otherwise Ann Hyde, and John Stone, jun., on a charge of having wilfully set fire to a house in the occupation of the latter premises, in the Bridge-road, Hammersmith, took place, and, after hearing additional evidence, which tended to confirm the suspicion against the prisoners, they were committed for trial.

DREADFUL MURDERS AND SUICIDE AT CAMBERWELL.

Shortly after seven o'clock on Monday morning, the neighbourhood of Southampton-place, Camberwell, was thrown into consternation by the frantic screams of a woman who had just made her escape, by the back door of No. 5, Wellington-place, a small cottage residence, only two storeys high. The first person who responded to the spot was Mr. Pratt, a surgeon, who resided at No. 4, and who, upon entering, was horror-struck at the scene which presented itself. In an upper room, upon the floor, lay the lifeless body of M. Philarète Horeau, a Frenchman, aged 53, with his throat cut from ear to ear; on the bed, his son, aged 13, quite dead, shocking to be mutilated about the throat; and in a lower room, another son, aged 11, with his throat cut, a wound on the cheek, and his hand much lacerated, who was at first supposed to be dead, but afterwards showed some symptoms of life, but totally unable to articulate or give the least account of the dreadful catastrophe; and in a short time afterwards, a male child, aged eight months, was found dead in a cradle-but which stood in the garden, but having no wounds whatever about its person.

Upon investigation it appeared that the unfortunate man had resided at No. 5 for nearly the last twelvemonth, supporting his family as a teacher of languages; but this mode of existence had been so precarious, that, for some time past, they had suffered extreme privation and great pecuniary embarrassment. M. Horeau had been in the habit of rising soon after seven in the morning, and usually took down stairs with him one of the twin infants (a male and female), who slept in the same bed as he and the mother. On the morning of the murder, he did the same thing, taking the child with him, and leaving the female infant in bed with the mother. In a few minutes the mother was alarmed by a loud shrieking, which she at first attributed to the two elder boys quarrelling, and therefore took no further notice of the matter for a few moments, but the shrieking being continued, she went to the room, and, upon opening the door, was met by the younger boy, who immediately ran down stairs bleeding, at the bottom of which he fell down apparently lifeless; and, on entering the room, Mrs. Horeau saw her unfortunate husband in the act of cutting his own throat, and before she could interpose, he had fallen down a corpse. On looking farther, she discovered her eldest son dead in the bed, but could not perceive any trace of her infant child, who was, however, afterwards discovered to have been drowned in the rain-butt. There is no doubt whatever but that the unfortunate father proceeded to the garden instantly on leaving his bed room, and, having drowned the child, then ascended the rain-butt stage, where he afterwards perpetrated the other murder, committing suicide the moment an alarm was raised. As no vital organ has been severed, hopes are entertained that the younger boy's life will be saved, although, of course, there is great danger that he will not survive the shock. There seems to be little doubt but that, owing to their privations, temporary insanity was the immediate cause of this shocking affair, as his pecuniary embarrassments had, for some weeks past, induced great depression of spirits

An inquest was held on Wednesday, at the Bricklayer's Arms, Southampton-street, as to the deaths of M. Philarète Horeau, and Helvetius and William Horeau, his sons, who were murdered by him on Monday morning, previous to his own suicide.

The inquiry lasted six hours, but the evidence was merely confirmatory of the above accounts. Mrs. Horeau, the widow, deposed as follows:—The family retired to bed on Sunday about eleven. Helvetius and his brother (who is now going on well) slept up stairs, where the bodies were lying. Her husband and she, with two twin children, slept in the parlour below. Her husband got up about seven on Monday, taking one of the children (the deceased William) with him into the garden. In about an hour she heard a scream, and afterwards went up stairs to their son's room. When she got there her husband was in the act of cutting his throat, and holding Helvet us, who had also his throat cut, down on the floor. She instantly ran down stairs, but found the chain so fastened that she could not open the front door; and having got into the garden, gave an alarm, when several persons came. When she got back to the kitchen she found another son (Philarète) standing up, and he had also his throat cut. The infant (William) she afterwards discovered had been drowned in the rain-butt.

To the Coroner: She had no doubt these deaths were the act of her husband, and that they had been caused by his great irritability of mind, caused by extreme want. He was quite unable to supply the children with food.

The Jury returned the following verdict.—"We find a verdict of Wilful Murder against Philarète Horeau, as regards the death of Helvetius and William Horeau, and we find that the said Philarète Horeau destroyed himself while in a state of temporary insanity, produced by extreme privation and want."

A MASTER SHOT BY HIS APPRENTICE.

At an early hour on Monday morning a premeditated murder was committed by an apprentice, named Thomas Wicks, upon his master, Mr James Bostock, a brass-founder, residing in Pitt's-place, Drury-lane. It appears that on Saturday evening last, the master had occasion to send the youth to one of his customers, with an order, for which he directed him to bring back the money. This he failed to do, and after being severely scolded for his misconduct, he went home to his mother. With whom he resided, in Great Wild-street, but came back in a sulky mood. He had only been a few minutes in the place, when, as Mr. Bostock was in the act of stooping to light the fire, the apprentice stepped behind him, and discharged the contents of a loaded pistol into the side of his head, at the back of his ear. He then ran out of the house, but it has since been ascertained he delayed a considerable time in the neighbourhood, and even took a glass of rum at a public-house in Drury-lane. An alarm being given, two constables of the F division arrived in a short time, and the unfortunate man was conveyed by them to the King's College Hospital, in Portugal-street, in a state of insensibility, and, as the ball could not be extracted, he was attacked with frequent convulsions until he expired, a little after three o'clock in the afternoon.

There is every reason to suspect that an ill feeling has existed for some time between the parties, for the youth, according to the statement applied for and obtained a summons against his master, at Bow-street Police-court, on the 3rd instant, for neglecting to teach him his business, and also for refusing to pay him the sum of 2s. 6d. for work and labour done. The summons was heard on the 6th instant, and dismissed on the ground that, as no mention was made of wages in the indenture, he could not be legally entitled to any remuneration for his work, which should be considered as the property of his master. From this circumstance seemed to engender in his mind a spirit of revenge, which led him to embrace the first opportunity of carrying out his determination to take away the life of his master, for the police have discovered the spot where he had purchased, several days previously, a pistol, with some powder, and a quantity of slug.

The murderer is rather remarkable in his appearance, being of less than the ordinary stature, and having a considerable hesitation in his speech

He was apprehended shortly after ten o'clock on Monday night, by Thompson and Pocock, two constables of the F Division, at a small coffee-shop, in Little Queen-street, Holborn. He was shortly immediately removed to the chief Police-station, in Bow-street, where the charge was formally entered against him.

When placed at the bar at the station, after his apprehension, to have the charge entered against him, addressing Sergeant Pocock, who took him into custody, he said, "I can't blame you, Pocock, for what you have done; but the villain (meaning the deceased) should have had it younger boy where he had the scandalous and cruel conduct to treat me at the same time holding out his right hand in a most determined manner.

On Tuesday morning he was examined at Bow-street Police-office, on the charge of murder.

The possession of a pistol, with powder and bullets, by Wicks, was proved in a very clear manner by a tradesman named Stone, who keeps an oilshop in Great Wild-street. Wicks had purchased the pistol on Saturday, the 7th inst., and purchased a small quantity of gunpowder, remarking at the time that he was going out shooting on the following day (Sunday.) On Monday, the 9th inst., he again visited Mr. Stone's and purchased on that occasion another small quantity of powder. Mr. Stone asked him what he had shot on the previous day, to which he replied by giving a description of some bird which Mr. Stone imagined to be a snipe. During the first visit, Mr. Stone asked him what sort of a gun he used, whereupon Wicks pulled out from his breast a bright-barrelled pistol, about six inches long. Mr. Stone next asked him what sort of shot he used, to which question Wicks replied by producing three or four small bullets. At Mr. Stone's request, Wicks gave him one of the latter to see if it would fit a pistol he had in use.

The deceased has left a widow, but no children.

After several witnesses had given their evidence, which went in corroboration of the above facts,

John Collen, of F, stated that on Saturday night he was called to take the prisoner into custody for detaining money. It was the deceased who called him into the room where the prisoner was sitting. He said that he was his apprentice, and had sent him for money, which he said he had not done on the errand.

His prisoner: If you allow me, I can tell you all about it in a more straightforward manner than the witness.

Constable Thompson, F division, proved that on Monday night about ten o'clock, he went to a coffee-shop, 32, Great Queen-street, where he found the prisoner at the front parlour. He took hold of him and said he was his prisoner on a charge of murder. Whereupon the prisoner, for which he thanked him, and said that it was all right. He then put his hand into the prisoner's coat pocket, but the prisoner said there was nothing in it. "I hunged down (meaning he pistol) at Gravesend." He then stated the master was dead, and, being told he was, he said no and been a — rogue to him, and he had his satisfaction. "This has been brewing for him for twelve months. He and me for my money, and not for my work." He then said, "I never meant to have only dead, and witness said such was the case. He then said, "I shall die happy, I dare say. I shall suffer for it." He found 1s upon him.

Prisoner: 7s. 3d. I got upon the road. I was not spy is perfectly true.

The prisoner, on being asked for his defence, made a rambling statement about the dispute with his master. He was committed to Newgate for trial.

An inquest was held on Thursday on the body of Mr. Bostock. The evidence was similar to that given at Bow-street, and the Jury returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder" against Thomas William Wicks.

AWFULLY SUDDEN DEATH.—On Wednesday Mr. Wakley held an inquest at the Cleaning Public-house, Wellington-terrace, Bayswater, on view of the body of Mr Benjamin Bendish, aged twenty-eight years, whose death took place under the following awfully sudden circumstances:—It appeared deceased was a greengrocer, residing three doors from the above public-house. On Sunday last, shortly before one o'clock at mid-day, he left home with his wife to dine with a friend in town. They we had as far as the small gate into Kensington Gardens, when the deceased hailed an omnibus, and putting his wife into it, as if he would get up outside. At that time he appeared in perfect health, and while getting up he fell backwards to the ground, as the witnesses stated, completely dead. A verdict "Natural death."

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Tuesday).—The present week's arrivals of English wheat for our markets have been on the increase, and of improved quality. To-day the stands were fairly supplied with samples of that article, which met a very dull inquiry at barely Monday's quotations for a continuance of the supply of foreign wheat must have been small. Brown Mustard-seed, 10s to 12s, white ditto 8s to 11s. Tares, 7s 6d to 8s 3d per bushel. English Canaryseed, 22s 6d to 23s, per last of 10 quarters Hempseed, 24s to 26s. English, £11 5s to £12 0s ditto, foreign £9 0s to £9 5s per 1000 Rapecoal cakes, £5 12s to £6 0s per ton. Canary, 56s to 58s per quarter. English Carraway-seed, 42s to 44s; ditto, 42s to 44s. Coriander, 20s to 22s; ditto, 18s to 20s. Foreign, red, 42s to 46s: extra, 50s; white, 60s to 62s; extra, up to 68s. Foreign, red, 42s to 46s: extra, 50s; white, 60s to 62s; extra, up to 68s.

Flour.—The prices of wheaten bread, in the metropolis, are from 9d to 9½d, of household ditto from 6d to 8½d per 4lb. loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 54s 8d; barley, 30s 6d; oats, 21s 9d; rye, 32s 7d; beans, 34s 8d; peas, 33s 7d

Mark Lane Average.—Wheat, 55s 3d; barley, 31s 4d, oats, 21s 10d; rye, 34s 2d; beans, 35s 11d; peas, 36s 11d

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 17s 0d, barley, 7s, oats, 6s; rye, 6s 6d; beans, 7s 0d; peas, 6s 6d.

Sugar.—Comparatively speaking, this market has been tolerably steady since our last, and prices have been well supported.

Coffee.—The best parcels of West India and Mauritius have been in good request, at full prices, but all other kinds in sugar—raw, as well as refined—have sold heavily, at drooping rates.

Tea.—Selected qualities of West India are steady, and prices are well supported. Ceylon, Mocha, and foreign sorts are dull.

Hay and Straw.—Monday hay, £3 3s to £4 8s; clover ditto, £4 5s to £5 12s, and straw £1 8s to £1 13s; wheat straw, £1 11s to £1 16s, per load

Smithfield.—The arrivals of Irish butter since our last, have been somewhat extensive, yet the finest parcels are in good request at 98s to 100s per cwt. Other qualities are very dull. In foreign butter a large business is doing, and prices are fully 2s per cwt. higher than on Monday. Belfast fine Stubble Kiel, 102s to 105s, fine Holland, 98s to 102s, and fine Dresden and Leer, 88s to 90s per cwt. The supplies of bacon have increased, the demand for that article is heavy, at a reduction in value of 2s per cwt. Waterford sizeable, landed, 50s to 52s; heavy, 47s to 49s. Limerick sizeable, 49s to 51s, and heavy, 45s to 48s per cwt. Hams, of mild cure, are steady, at full prices; but other qualities are dull. Limerick 36s to 66s, and Mallow 54s per cwt. Fine pork dull, at late rates, but of 1st to 3d per cwt. All other kinds of provision are a dull sale at late rates.

Of the potato sales are now occupying the attention of the trade, the demand, privately, is inactive, at previous quotations

Potatoes.—The arrivals at the water-side have been again extensive; hence the demand is heavy, and prices have a downward tendency.

Hops.—(Friday).—The best hops in pockets, the supply of which is small, still command a ready sale, at fully last week's quotations; but the middling and ordinary kinds of Sussex are [illegible] Sussex pockets, 4l 8s to 4l 15s: West of Kent ditto, 4l 5s to 4l 7s; Mid Kent ditto, 3l 7s to 3l 15s; East Kent, 3l 5s to 3l 10s; Weald of Kent ditto, 3l 5s to 3l 10s; East Kent, 2l 5s to 2l 8s; East Kent ditto, 2l 8s to 3l 0s.

Corn Trade.—(Friday).—Baddle's West Hartley, 15s 6d. Heaton's Hartley, 16s, Holywell Main, 16s; West Wylam, 15s 6d, Bewicke and Co.'s Adelaide Teas, 16s; Seaward's, 15s 6d; and Hedley's, 15s per ton.

Smithfield. (Friday).—Although the supply of beasts here to-day was by no means extensive, the demand for the best made but a very moderate progress, and previous quotations were with difficulty supported. We had on offer 62 beasts from Holland, 16 ditto from Hamburg, and 240 ditto from Scotland. The numbers of sheep were again small, yet the sale for them was heavy, at Monday's prices. For the time of year the supply of calves is by no means large. Pigs were in good request, at a further decline in value of 2s per s.b. Pigs steady, at full prices. Milch cows are in good demand, at fully late rates.

Per 8lb. to sink the offal.—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; second quality ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime large ox-n, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime Scots, &c. 4s 0d to 4s 0d; coarse and ordinary sheep, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; second quality ditto 4s 2d to 4s 4d; prime coarse-woolled ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 8d; prime Southdown ditto, 4s 10d to 5s 0d; large calves, 4s 2d to 4s 8d; prime small ditto, 4s 10d to 5s 0d; large hogs, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; neat small porkers, 4s 0d to 4s 2d. Sucking calves, 18s to 24s each; quarter ox, coarse pork, 4s to 5s; ditto beasts, 66s; cows, 13l, sheep, 1949, calves, 123, pigs, 275.

Vegetable and Leadenhall. (Friday).—We had a very slow inquiry this morning on the 5l. 5s. system.

Per 8lb. by the carcase:—Inferior beef, 2s 6d to 2s 8d, middling ditto, 2s 8d to 2s 10d, prime ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 2d; inferior mutton 2s 6d to 2s 8d, middling ditto, 2s 8d to 2s 10d, prime ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 2d; veal, 2s 6d to 3s 6d small pork, 3s 8d to 3s 10d.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Although the English Market opened on Monday with some inclination to improvement, the extraordinary tightness of money soon caused a check. This pressure on the Money Market still continues, although some slight abatement may be expected within the last day or two. The directors of the Bank of England decided, on Wednesday, to extend the period of accommodation on loans until the 9th of April, about which period the dividends are usually made of payment. Thus, a fortnight's relief will be very little felt by any but the higher class of the commercial world; and no symptom of enlarged accommodation, or reduction in the rate of discount, is at present visible in the money market, which is still the subject of numerous complaints. It must be conceded, however, that, under existing circumstances, little more could be anticipated on the part of the Bank of England. A feeling of pressure on the Consol Market has been experienced during the week; and although no investment broker has taken his usual purchases, continual fluctuations have daily occurred. Consols, on Tuesday, declined about one half per cent., the difference of price between Monday's opening and Tuesday's closing quotations; but a slight improvement was visible towards the close of the week, and the last quotation is 96 to ¾, for money and time. Exchequer Bills have declined from 39 to 40 to 36 to 40, notwithstanding the large purchases that have been taken place for the account of the market. Bank Stock has improved to 208 to 209. This is not surprising when it is considered that the Bank of England has the monopoly, at present, of all the floating capital that can be applied to loans and discounts. Reduced is 96¾. New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents, ——, and India Stock, 260.

The limited business in the Foreign House renders any record of the fluctuations of the week unnecessary. Spanish Active Bonds closed on Monday at 27¾, and receded, the following day, to 26¾; from an anticipated modification of the Spanish Cabinet. On Wednesday, no bargains were recorded; but the difficulties of the Queen Mother, and a new Ministerial combination of Narvaez, caused a decline, on Thursday, to 26¼ to 27¼. The Three per Cents. were 37¾, and close at that price. Mexican improved a point towards the end of the week, and closes at all for the account. Portuguese 4 per Cents. advanced a point, closing at 30¼. Belgian is 97¾. Equador Bonds, 3¾; Grenada, One per Cent., 23; Ditto, Deferred, 4¾; Russian Bonds, 112; Spanish Three per Cent., 37¾; Venezuela Bonds, 19 per Cent., 45; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cent., 56¾.

The Share Market continues heavy, although no great alteration is visible in prices. This indicates a determination to hold, and the comparatively small amount of business doing confirms the opinion that the speculators do not view this in a favourable point of view. It is argued that large amounts of Railway Stock are in the hands of the public, which, having been bought at high prices, will be retained as an investment, if possible, rather than postponed to realise the species of "carrying on" until better times. At present the feeling exists, that the next two or three months will not be favourable to a revival of speculation, and sales from time to time, express the market, already heavy and declining. At the close of the week there was no symptom of improvement, as a reference to the subjoined list will show. Caledonian, 15¾; Ditto, Preferred, 24¾; Ditto, Deferred, 2¾; Dundee and Perth, 39; Direct Manchester (Hardwick's), 3¾; Direct Northern, 2¾; Dublin and Galway, 4¾; Eastern Counties, 2½; Ditto New, 6¾ pm.; Ditto, York Extension, 1¾; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 57; Ditto, Half Shares and Preferred, 21½; Ditto and Wemyss (Ireland), 17¾; Great Western, 150 ex. d.; Ditto, Half Shares, 85 ex. d.; Ditto, Quarter Shares, 18 ex. d.; Liverpool, Manchester and Newcastle Junction, 3¾; London and Birmingham, 223 ex. d.; Ditto, Half per Cent., Deferred, 5¾; London and Brighton, 69¾ ex. d.; Do. Consol. Eighths, 6¾; London and Croydon, 22¾; London and Greenwich, 9¾; London and South-Western, 78; Ditto, Consolidated Eighths, 6¾; London and Yarmouth, Warwick and Stourbridge, 2¾; Londonderry and Coleraine, 5; Londonderry and Enniskillen, 2¾; Lynn and Ely, 0; Manchester and Leeds Half Shares, 61; Manchester and Birmingham, 78; Ditto, Quarter Shares (5), 10¾; Manchester and Bury, Buxton, and Matlock, 12; Manchester and Southampton, 2¾; Midland, 154; Ditto, New, 27¾; Ditto, Birmingham and Derby, 120; Newcastle and Darlington Junction, New, 10¾; Newcastle and Berwick, 21¾; Newark-upon-Trent, 5; Ditto, Half Shares and Preferred, 3¾; North and East Yorkshire, 2½; Northern and Eastern, 69¾; North Kent and Direct Dover, 2¾; North Staffordshire, 4¾; Northampton, Banbury and Cheltenham, 1¾; Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, 13¾; Scarborough Direct, 2¾; Rugby and Huntingdon, 1¾; Scottish Central, 16; Ditto New, 9; Shrewsbury and Birmingham, 3¾; Shropshire Union, ¾ discount; South Midland, 2¾ premium; South Eastern and Dover (A), 9¾; Ditto New (A), 3¾; Trent Valley, 26; Wilts, Somerset, and Weymouth, 3¾; York and North Midland Extension, 3¾; Boulogne and Amiens, 12¾; Bordeaux, Toulouse, and Cette (Espelette), 2¾; Central of Spain, 1¾; East Indian, 1¾; Grand Junction, 1¾; London and Brighton, 69¾ ex. d.; Great Western Bengal, ¾, Jamaica South Midland Junction, 3¾; Louvain and Jemeppe, 2¾; Lyons and Avignon, 2¾; Luxembourg, 2¾; Madrid and Valentia, 2¾; Namur and Liege, 2¾; Orleans and Vierzon, 17¾; Orleans and Bordeaux, 11¾; Paris and Rouen, 40¾; Rouen and Havre, 29¾.

SATURDAY MORNING.—The English Market was quiet yesterday, with little variation in prices. Consols closed at 96¼ to ¾ for money, and 96¾ for time. In Shares there was little doing; prices, however were maintained. The only stock dealt in was the high class, for investment.

THE LONDON GAZETTE.

TUESDAY, FEB. 17.

CAMBRIDGE HOUSE, Feb. 17.—The Duchess of Cambridge has been pleased to appoint the Lady Augusta Cadogan to be her Royal Highness's Lady in Waiting.

WHITEHALL, FEB. 18.—The Queen has been pleased to direct letters patent to be passed under the Great Seal of the [illegible] to grant unto [illegible] the dignity of a Baron of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, by the name, style, and title of Baron Ellenborough of Ellenborough, in the county of Cumberland.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint Lieutenant-General Sir William Bowles, Esq., C.B. [illegible] Admiral of the Red Squadron of her Majesty's Fleet; the Honourable Henry Fitzroy [illegible] Admiral of the Blue Squadron of her Majesty's Fleet; and the Honourable Henry Fitzroy [illegible] Captain in her Majesty's navy, one of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, in the room of Rear-Admiral

ST. MARY'S CHURCH, BUSSELTON, WESTERN AUSTRALIA

CHURCH IN WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

This timely provision for the spiritual and temporal welfare of the colonists and natives of Western Australia has lately been erected at Busselton, in the Vasse District, about 130 miles south of Perth, the seat of Government. It affords a considerable frontage to Geography Bay, and is also well watered by the River Vasse.

For some years, the project of erecting a Church in this neighbourhood had been agitated, and many of the settlers, as well as their friends in England, exerted themselves to bring about so desirable an object; amongst them, none were more active than the Bussell family, from whom the townsite takes its name. In the latter part of the year 1843, funds considered sufficient for erecting the walls and covering-in of the same having been received from England in addition to the local subscriptions, it was resolved to proceed thus far, trusting to future exertions for completion. Plans and estimates were, accordingly, prepared by Mr. E. Brabazon Forsayth; the foundation-stone laid on the 4th of March of the following year; and the Church was opened in April, 1845, by the much respected Chaplain of the District, the Rev. J. E. Wollaston, attended by a large assemblage of the inhabitants for a circuit of many miles.

The building, of which the annexed is a correct representation, from a drawing made upon the spot, is a plain but substantial stone edifice, with circular headed windows and doorways: between the former and at the cornices are buttresses reaching to the line of springing. The Nave or body of the Church is forty feet long, and twenty feet wide; the Chancel fourteen feet long by twelve feet wide; the walls are sixteen feet to the line of roof; the exterior presenting a height of eighteen feet from the ground to the parapets, which extend all round.

The roof, which is of native mahogany, is constructed with principals, purlines, &c.; they are very massive, and, having been well oiled, they have a very handsome appearance. The whole roof, externally, is close-boarded and shingled.

The Chancel, which is raised two steps from the Nave, is lit by a window on each side, in addition to the three-light window over the altar. A bell-gable rises about 10 feet above the west-end, the dead wall of which is somewhat relieved by a circular window. The congregation are, however, in hopes of being enabled to affix a characteristic tower, which the architect's original plan embraced.

The interior fittings at the present time are necessarily of the simplest description, no funds being available for the purpose. Suitable open pews on each side of a centre aisle are intended to afford accommodation for about 140 persons.

The total amount of money expended has been £300; and, considering the scantiness of funds, as also the difficulty of procuring workmen, the whole has given very general satisfaction.

TRICENTENARY OF THE DEATH OF LUTHER.

Wednesday, the 18th instant—the three-hundredth anniversary of the Death of Luther, "the solitary Monk who shook the World," was to have been celebrated with great pomp in all the Lutheran churches of Prussia. We hope to be enabled to present to our readers some graphic record of this memorable solemnity.

The last days of the fearless Reformer may be thus narrated. At the beginning of 1546, Luther repaired from Wittenberg to Eisleben, where he preached four times, and also revised a plan of regulations concerning the ecclesiastical discipline of that little State. He had been, for some time, in a very precarious state of health: on the 17th of February, he felt very ill and weak, laid himself on a couch, spoke of his approaching death, for which he appeared quite prepared, and recommended his soul to Jesus. He grew worse in the evening. Count Albrecht, of Mansfeld, and his Countess, and several medical men, attended him during his last hours. His old friend, Dr. Jonas, having asked him: "Reverend father, do you die with a firm conviction of the faith you have taught?" Luther, in a distinct voice, replied, "Yes;" and soon after breathed his last. His body was carried to Wittenberg, where it was buried with great honours. Thus the Reformer passed from earth; of whom it has been eloquently said: "Such were the great talents and qualities of Luther, and such the situation of Europe at the time, that the Reformation, in fact, passed from the mind of the one into the mind of the other."—(Professor Smyth's "Lectures on Modern History.")

Every site associated with the personal or public history of Luther is regarded as hallowed ground; whilst, "the form of the monk of Wittenberg, emerging from the receding gloom of the middle ages, appears towering above the sovereigns and warriors, statesmen and divines, of the sixteenth century, who were his contemporaries, his antagonists, or his disciples."

We have engraved two of these venerated localities. 1. A view of the interior of the chamber which Luther occupied in the old Augustine Convent at Erfurt. While at the University here, Luther appears to have led a careless life; but, in 1505, one of his fellow students was killed at his side by lightning, and Luther, from that moment, made a vow to become a monk. On the 17th of July, in the same year, he entered the Augustine Convent at Erfurt, carrying with him only a Virgil and a Plautus. In the retirement of this convent, Luther was tormented by temptations, and religious scruples and doubts, which he has pathetically described; especially on the subject of faith and salvation, until he at last adopted the principles of St. Augustin, or at least those ascribed to that Father, on grace and predestination.

The second memorial is a ruined house in the village of Neuenheim, in the environs of the town of Heidelberg, in the Grand-duchy of Baden. This dwelling was formerly part of a monastery, the farm-buildings of which may also be traced in the neighbourhood. "The house" is little more than a cottage; but it is remarkable as the place of Luther's concealment for several months, after he had quitted the Diet at Worms, convoked in the year 1521, by the Emperor Charles V. The two windows of the first story are reputed to be those of the chamber wherein Luther concealed himself from the close pursuit of his persecutors. Upon the gable of a small building adjoining the cottage, may be traced the figures 1525, which are supposed to relate to the date of Luther's sojourn here.

The Report of the Gauge Commissioners, Sir Frederick Smith, and Professors Barlow and Airey, has been published. It enters into very long and minute inquiries, and disquisitions, which it is impossible for us to analyse, and concludes with four resolutions, recommending the interference of the Legislature to prevent the increase of the evils already produced by diversity of gauge, and to take practical measures for the remedy of these evils, by substituting the narrow gauge universally for the broad, or by some equivalent measure. This they recommend in the following terms:—"That the gauge of four feet eight inches and a half be declared by the Legislature to be the gauge to be used in all public rails ays now under construction, or hereafter to be constructed, in Great Britain."

Improvement in Waistcoats.—Mr. Goddard, of Nottingham, has just patented an expanding waistcoat back, which secures great comfort to the wearer, and completely insures the well-sitting of the waistcoat. The invention has only to be known to be generally adopted.

Cleansing of the Sewers.—The association for this important object, in conjunction with the employment of the poor, have published a most interesting report of their recent experiment, with the calculated financial results, which we especially recommend to the attention of municipal and local authorities. The second Anniversary Dinner of this excellent association will take place on Thursday next, when the Duke of Cambridge has kindly consented to preside.

A DOUBLE COMET.

To the Editor of the Illustrated London News.

Sir, The fact of a double Comet is a circumstance of so unique and interesting a nature, that I beg to be allowed, through the medium of your columns, to communicate the following particulars, with a sketch of its appearance, which will interest very many of your readers, as this is the first instance of a phenomenon of this kind having been seen.

The drawing is from a sketch and description of its appearance by John Glaisher, Esq., at the Observatory of Dr. Lee, at Hartwell, on the evening of February 8th.

As some particulars of its history, with its predicted places, were published by you in October last, in the "Illustrated London Almanack, for 1846," I refer to that work for those particulars—remarking, however, that it was never seen double before the present time.

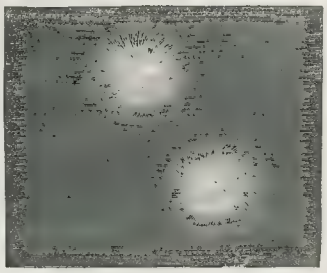
I shall now proceed with its history, since its discovery, on Nov. 29, 1845, at which time it was seen by Professor Encke, at Berlin. On December 1, it was discovered by Professor Challis, at Cambridge; and observed by him both on the 1st and on the 2nd day of December. At this time it appeared as a faint, misty patch of light; it had no nucleus, or central condensation of light, and was distinguishable from a faint nebula only by its motion.

On January 15, 1846, Professor Challis thought he saw a much fainter Comet having a bright speck, near the one he was observing, but, from the improbability of finding a Comet in that position, he supposed it to be a star surrounded by haze.

On January 23rd, the Professor was surprised to see distinctly, at a short distance from the Comet, an object occupying nearly the same relative position as the object observed on the 15th, and which had all the appearance of a Second Comet, and both objects were found to move relatively as compared with a star near them. The new Comet preceded the other by five seconds; it was less bright, and of less apparent diameter than the other; each had a central condensation of light, and the coma of one did not extend to that of the other.

After this time the double Comet was seen by most observers.

On Feb. 8, as seen at Dr. Lee's Observatory, at Hartwell, the light of the greater Comet was far more intense than that of the other, but they seemed nearly to cover equal spaces, each being of a circular form. The larger one followed the other by seven seconds, and it was above it in the field of the telescope; it had a stellar nucleus, the other had nothing more than a condensation of light towards the centre: the coma of one was at times supposed to merge into the other, but the light was so attenuated that it was barely perceptible. Since the discovery of the second Comet the observed places have departed from the predicted places; at the present time the amount of this departure is about 14 minutes of arc in North Polar Distance, the observed being greater than the predicted places by this amount.



DOUBLE COMET.

On January 23, Professor Challis measured the distance of the centre of one Comet from the other, and it was 145 seconds of arc

" 24 " " " " 148
" 27 " " " " 169
" 28 " " " " 174
" 29 " " " " 175

And on Feb. 8 the distance was " " " 260

By referring to the "Illustrated London Almanack," for these days, it will be seen that the Comet is rapidly approaching the earth; but the great increase of distance is much more than can be accounted for from this cause; therefore, they are actually separating from each other.

On Jan. 23, the angle made by the line joining the two Comets, with a vertical line passing through the greater Comet, was 32° 17′, and on Feb. 8, it was 24° 4′, so that the one appears to revolve round the other, or both round a centre of gravity.

It will be highly interesting to observe the motions of these two singular bodies; and, should there be any marked difference in their appearance, I will forward another drawing of them to you. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Blackheath, Feb. 14, 1846. James Glaisher.

Since the above was written, Professor Challis has published a letter in the Times of Feb 16th, from which it appears that he has succeeded in obtaining observations on the Double Comet on Feb 11th, 12th, and 13th. On the latter day the small one preceded the other by 8′ 3″.; and the measured distance between the two was 293 seconds of arc.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

BEDDINGTON HOUSE.

At an easy distance from the town of Croydon, ten miles south-east of the metropolis, lie the picturesque park, and substantial mansion known as Beddington House, the long-continued residence of the ancient family of the Carews (originally from Devonshire), and now the seat of Capt. Charles Hallowell, R.N., who, having succeeded to the property, took the name and arms of Carew, by Royal license, in 1835.

Of the original mansion erected by Sir Francis Carew, and in which he had twice the honour to receive the visits of Queen Elizabeth, not a vestige remains, except the Great Hall. The present house was built about the year 1709, at which time Beddington was in the possession of Sir Nicholas Carew, who was created a Baronet by Queen Anne. It is a brick edifice, with stone dressings, and consists of a centre and two deep wings; with the Great Hall for a medium. This fine specimen of the domestic architecture of the age of Elizabeth is entered by a handsome stone portal; and is surmounted by an Italian decorated turret. It has an oaken open roof, in the manner of our college halls: the principal ribs spring from large carved and gilt brackets, and form an equilateral pointed arch, which, being undercut with smaller ribs, assumes the trefoil character: over each arch is a strong beam, forming a brace with the rafters. The flooring is paved with lozenge-shaped slabs of black and white marble; and the walls are wainscoted with oak, in panels. The walls are decorated with carved arms and trophies; and the piers are hung with portraits. The old fire-place has, however, been filled in, and and-irons substituted. On the great entrance-door is an Elizabethan lock, wrought of iron, and covered with elaborate Gothic tracery richly gilt; the key-hole is concealed by a shield of the Royal Arms, which moves in a groove, and slides down on touching a knob in the form of a monk's head.

The lower story of the south wing contains the dining and drawing rooms, and other large apartments, (most of which were repaired and modernised in 1817); together with a long gallery that extends through its entire length.

The grounds retain much of the character of the old school of gardening; and, towards the east, is a waterfall, supplied by the river Wandle, which intersects the park in its course to the Thames. There is, also, a spacious canal on the west, derived from the same stream, and ornamented on each side by a row of venerable elms; parallel with which, is a fine avenue of chesnut trees of stately growth; and near the house, on the north-west, are some remarkably large walnut trees. The park, three or four miles in circumference, is well wooded, and abounds with deer. In our Illustration is shown the Mansion, and the tower of Beddington Church, a structure of the reign of Richard II.—(Abridged from the New History of Surrey.)

BEDDINGTON HOUSE.

Queen Elizabeth's oak, and her favourite walk, were long pointed out here. The fine old place, too, long enjoyed great note in horticultural history; for, here the first orange-trees were raised in England, and flourished for about a century and a half. In short, Beddington, with its olden celebrity, is a place of great attraction for strollers from the metropolis.

THE INDIAN WAR.

The mantle of dominion is fitly named "the purple," for it is often dyed in blood; it is the hue of power, and the nations to whom has fallen the sceptre of the world have been compelled to defend it by the same means by which it was acquired—force. This it is which makes the history of the past little more than a chronicle of wars and battles. Peace, which, for the interests of humanity, ought to be the rule of the government of the world, seems on an average of centuries to be rather the exception, as if by some fatal necessity men were driven to exist amid continual hostilities. It is sometimes their fault, as being the aggressors; but quite as often their misfortune, as being the objects of oppression by others: in either case Peace is impossible. Even periods that seem to be pacific are but times in which men repose from great wars only to engage in minor ones; and had the nations of modern Europe their Temple of Janus, like the Romans, it would be difficult to point out any one of the great powers which could boast of having been able to close it for three years successively. Since the close of the great war of the revolution, in 1815, in which millions of men perished, Europe has experienced what has been called a "thirty years' peace." The phrase only means that the seat of war has been changed from the territories of the old political states to the borders of their dominions—to the outposts and debateable ground of civilisation: it has not really ceased to exist. In this "thirty years' peace" we have really seen several wars, which are only called little in comparison with that mighty tempest that swept over all Europe for a whole generation. In themselves they were great enough to cause incalculable suffering and misery—great enough to exhibit human nature in its worst aspect—great enough to bedew the earth in a thousand places with what is sadder even than human tears—and only not great enough, in some cases, or success, when the best sympathies of the world were enlisted on the side of the vanquished.

If we look back over this period of peace, we shall find that it has really been distinguished for the number of its wars! And we have ourselves contributed our full share to the chronicle. France took but a brief repose after the long conflict in which she had been engaged, and in which she had suffered so deeply, ere she entered upon the war in Algiers; it has lasted now fifteen years, has cost France forty millions sterling of her treasure, and—the calculation is from a French authority—the lives of three hundred thousand men! At the present moment the position of the French in Africa is more precarious than ever; all is confusion, the climate and the harassing tactics of the Arab race, have baffled the efforts of men who are among the best soldiers of the world; and the cry is for more troops, more regiments, more lives, more treasure to pour like water into the thirsty sands of the desert, and with as little return! Yet the struggle in Algiers passes for one of the "little wars" of an age of peace! Russia has in the same period had her wars—one with the tribes of the Caucasus, who have for years bid defiance to all the power of that great but overrated empire—and another with Poland, which, hemmed around by hostile or unfriendly states, and receiving no resources from without, fell, and was crushed; but the conflict was a bloody one, and marked by such courage and determination against overwhelming numbers, that it can scarcely be called a "little war," though history perhaps will so record it.

Then there have been the wars of succession in Spain and Portugal, between the partisans of rival branches of the same royal family; they were wars of the worst kind, being waged between men of the same blood and language, and, like all civil conflicts, were prolific of the most dreadful atrocities; the civil war in Spain, which lasted seven years, was perfectly hideous in its cruelties, the words seemed literally fulfilled, that "man's heart was taken out of him, and there was given to him instead the heart of a beast." This, too, has gone into the catalogue of "little wars," that history dismisses with but a passing notice. To come to ourselves, we have been, for a pacific people, in a time of peace, remarkably warlike; we have had a battle of Algiers, and of Navarino; we have had a Burmese war, an Affghan war, and a China war; we have battered down Acre and Beyrout, because they belonged to Mahemet Ali, whom we have some interest in being friendly with, to serve the Sultan, whose friendship or enmity is a matter of great indifference to us; and we have invaded Scinde; in some of these operations we have gained all the glory that can be derived from success; in others we have met with checks and disasters, and loss. And now we have another war in our hands, the beginning of which is not so decisive as to exclude all anxiety with respect to what may be its termination.

Looking back at all these conflicts, can we admit that the last thirty years have been absolutely years of peace? True it is that the great Powers of Europe have not come into collision with each other; but they have not let the sword to rest altogether in its sheath; we doubt if they are really much more pacific in their disposition than of old.

As to the present struggle in which we have become engaged, it is caused by that necessity which has compelled us to advance, ever since we obtained any part of the territory of India. All Governments, all parties, men of very different dispositions, have felt this necessity; although many believe that our Empire in the East is already too extensive, it seems impossible to stop in the career of aggrandisement. The Hindoo race have always been subjected to the sway of conquerors, or made the spoil of plunderers; our preponderance in India alone is their safeguard from falling again under a yoke, to which our Government, bad and corrupt as it, in times past has been, is mild and just. The wild and warlike tribes would soon be, in the Indian peninsula, what the Tartar race is in China—but not with the same results; the condition of the districts in which these tribes have full power is but a type of the barbarism into which the whole of India would fall if under their government. Into the maze of the politics of these independent states of India it is impossible to penetrate fully, but enough is known to show that under them good government is impossible; bloody family feuds, murders, poisonings, are rife in the history of their ruling races. If one man of strong mind governed for awhile with something like stability, his death was the signal for anarchy: the army was the disposer of power, and, in some cases, like the Prætorian Guards in the decline of the Roman Empire, sold the throne to the highest bidder. How the bulk of the people fare under such rulers is needless to inquire: prosperity in such states is impossible. With such neighbours to watch, the English Government could never be secure in the provinces bordering on these territories; and it has, from time to time, been compelled to seize and annex them to our diminion, or to repel their incursions. In either case hostilities have been often urged upon us, and it seems impossible to maintain our power in the East except by the same means by which it was founded—force.

We have sometimes underrated the strength of our opponents, and thought too lightly of their skill, both military and diplomatic. This was the case in Affghanistan; and to some extent though finally successful, a want of precaution or preparation may be traced in these last operations. Why, with hostilities long foreseen as inevitable, the nation that has the greatest material resources should have appeared in the field with its artillery so inferior to that of the enemy, seems almost inexplicable. Courage, endurance, and devotion, have made up for the disadvantage, but it has been by a frightful loss of human life—a slaughter that will carry desolation and mourning into many an English home. We cannot but deplore the fatal necessity that seems to compel us to extend our Indian territory. We wish that we could confine our exertions to defending what we have gained, and improving what we possess, rather than adding to the extent of our charge. These "little wars" are great in their addition to the sum of human misery; and when we look at the slaughter of an Affghan campaign, or that of the recent victory on the Sutlej—though one was a disaster and the other is a triumph—we are tempted to ask, what real advantage does England gain by such a lavish expenditure of her best blood upon such distant fields, for results so doubtful and uncertain?

THE HORRORS OF WAR.

Bella—Horrida bella. Virg.

The guns roar'd from the Invalides,
It was a glorious day for France;
Algeria saw such noble deeds
Achieved by Gallia's sword and lance!
Seven hundred wretched Arabs, pent
Within the desert's hideous cave,
Were baked to death—untimely sent
By Frenchmen to a burning grave.
But Retribution's day arrived,
The faggot is repaid by snow;
The rout from Russia is revived,
And France's chivalry laid low.
And, after thirty years of war,
With all its woes, El Kader still Defies the haughty vicolon,
And bravely sweeps the vale and hill.
What boots it? Blood is spilt like water,
The human heart is agonised,
The arts of peace must yield to slaughter,
And yet we are the civilised!

The village smiled. It was a scene
Which memory treasures as a gem.
No cloud hung o'er the sportive green
Where shone Spring's flow'ry diadem.
The rural maiden there was seen,
With ribbon gay, and Sunday gown;
And hoary Eld on youth would lean,
And village Timons cease to frown.
The windmill sails were furl'd and idle,
The plough in mid furrow had stopt;
Poor Dobbin, free'd from trace and bridle,
At ease the verdant pasture cropt.
Our brave flag, from the spire and tow'r,
Waved in the sweet breeze joyously;
For this was England's triumph hour—
Her sons had gain'd a victory!
Ay! ring the bells;
But not for "Glory"
They are the knells
Of men, whose gory
Hoof-trampled corpses glut the plain
Where War and ruthless Rapine reign.

See, where the sullen Sutlej pours
His tribute to the Indian deep,
The Muses, with bitter tears, deplore
The loss of gallant hearts which sleep
The sleep of death—the warrior grey,
Who oft had braved the steel and shot;
The youthful soldier, gallant, gay,
Doom'd mid the jungle's reeds to rot!
Oh! where shall end Ambition's stride?
And where the reckless thirst of blood!
We lately tamed the Afghan's pride,
And now rolls down a fiercer flood.
The clarion sounds, the cannons boom—
Unfurl the banner of St. George!—
Proudly the Punjaub's bandits come,
Grim Havoc's joyful maw to gorge!
Their cry blasphemes the name of God—
"Allah! Il Allah!" Wild hurrahs
Respond; while, round the crimson sod,
The Tiger to Death's banquet draws.
The Furies on the conflict gloat—
Bristle the bayonets, red with gore;
The sabre gleams, the war-clouds float
Around the warriors of Lahore.
Where are they now—those ruthless hordes
That madly sought the fatal fray?
Scatter'd by England's warlike swords!
Where are our best and bravest—say,
Which hew'd out victory on that day?
They sleep in death,
Their fiery breath
Is lost in the blood of the clotted clay!

Oh! Thou who mad'st the human soul
Thy miniature on earth—to WHOM
All human things, by Death's control,
On one most awful day must come,
Was it Thy wish—Thy word—behest—
Thy deathless image to debase,
Or raise on high War's gory crest,
To brutified but Adam's race?
Oh! no!—Not to perpetuate
The primal fratricide of Cain,
Nor build up shrines to deadly Hate,
Upon the bones of thousands slain.
This, this was not the lesson taught
Along the shores of Galilee,
By the Divine One, who had sought
To make man's spirit pure and free.
He bade it soar above the earth—
Seek to regain its native skies,
By deeds of mental—moral worth,
By virtue's fame, which never dies.
This was THE TEACHER'S mission here;
And still its guerdon shall be won:
Religion breaks the shield and spear,
And Moloch's sceptre trambles on:
Science extends the reach of peace;
Commerce shall prove like Noah's dove;
The clouds disperse—the tempests cease—
And men shall dwell in brother-love.

THE BUBBLE-MANIA.

The following "Bubble Poem" is from a plate entitled "The Bubbler's Melody, or a Sketch of the Times; being Europe's Memorial for 1720." Though written a century and a quarter since, it is as applicable to the present time, as it proved but yesterday; the passion for gain being the same in all ages.

There is a Gulf where Thousands fall,
Here all the bold adventurers come;
A narrow Sound, tho' deep as Hell,
'Change Alley is the dreadful Name.

As Fishes on each other prey,
The Great Ones swallowing up the Small,
So fares it in the Southern Sea:
But Whale Directors eat up all.

Nine times a-day it Ebbs and Flows,
Yet he that on the surface lies,
Without a Plot seldom knows
The time it Falls, or when 'twill Rise.

While some bubl Castles in the Air,
Directors build 'em in the seas;
Subscribers plainly see 'em there,
For Fools will see as Wise Men please

Subscribers here by Thousands float,
And jostle one another down;
Each pushing in his leaky Boat,
And—ere they fish for Gold, and drown.

Directors they are hurried by
Pray, Gentlemen, believe your Eyes;
Or else you're carried on with Cries.
Look round about how thick it lies.

Now fearful of the Depth below,
Each mounted upon his Bubble again;
They steer an Stagger to and fro,
At their Wits ends, like Drunken Men.

Oh! would these Patriots be so kind
Here in the Deep to wash their hands,
That like Pactolus, we should find,
The sea, indeed, had Golden sands.

Meantime, secure on Garr'way's Cliffs,
A savage Race, by Shipwrecks fed,
Lye waiting for the founder'd Skiffs,
And Strip the Bodies of the Dead.

The Nation now too late will find
Computing all their Cost and Trouble,
Director's Promises but Wind,
South Sea at best a mighty Bubble.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Wednesday.

The Carnival is at its height: the "Bœuf Gras," to which, as to the golden calf of antiquity, a whole nation bows down, has done its duty, and Paris is resuming its wonted aspect. No other city in the world can exhibit such a scene of madness as this: every house, and each story of every house—from the palace to the garret—has had its dancing party. The brilliant sounds of the grand orchestra of Musard, and the tinkling monotony of the Savoyard's hurdy-gurdy, strike at the ear at every corner; all the costumes of the world, and all the grotesque masks ever dreamed of in the many-coloured thoughts of German romances or of Italian poets, meet the eye in every direction. The city has been steeped in deep drunkenness, and has lost the little propriety it can usually boast: it has been one vast saturnalia, exceeding that of antique Rome; for here master and slave join equally in the universal revel.

But the "bœuf gras," which would shame and put to the blush every obese animal of your boasted prize cattle show, is the principal feature of the three days' fete. His magnificence is the observed of all observers. He is from the fat fields of Normandy, and he comes arrayed like a holy victim covered with floral offerings. Golden devices scintillate from his cheerful flanks; he is covered with clothing decked with rare embroidery, and almost sinks beneath the effluence of his gay adornings. The city is apparelled to receive the Ox of the Carnival; and the bœuf, and the loud Hosannahs, and the songs of triumphs, and the Io Pæans heralded the way that he is going, and yet the praise-bordered hero majestically moves forward, unheeding, or, if heeding, concealing, his triumph beneath the consciousness of his fat, and turning an apparently deaf ear to the sounds of timbrels and the brayings of clarion. The children, with joyous cries, follow in the wake of his glory: the old women calculate the richness of his collops; the hotel keeper and the butcher calculate the amount of his ponderosity: and the poor and the famishing sigh at the view of his rotundity, at the thought of their many wants, and from when they think of the famishing children at home.

All the great and the illustrious of the State gaze upon him from the windows of their palaces, and political axioms present themselves of the shortness of his reign: while the mob, ever envious of what stirs their feelings, pass villanous jests on his improvised dignity, and laugh and sneer at his bigness. But who can please all, or pass through their honours untouched by sarcasm, and unmarked by envy? The "Bœuf Gras" rejoices in the appellation of Dagobert. A few hours, he will be disrobed and shorn of his three days' splendour; and, though he may not, like Alexander the Great, stop a beer-barrel, he will be cut into steaks, or chopped into dumps, to fill the pot au feu of his myriad worshippers.

The cortège was totally brilliant and picturesque. The quadruple mosquetaires of Alexandre Dumas were habited in their grand war costumes: their there were gorgeous dresses of the Court, and Paris of the reign of the Louis, and Arab Chiefs and Norman knights, and Oriental Saladins, and Knights Templars, &c. The mythological car, intensely gilded, was drawn by four white horses, richly-caparisoned in gold-coloured velvet, followed by Time. In the car were grouped Jupiter, Love, Apollo, Hercules, Psyche, with Venus and Mars. All the costumes were designed from the best authorities. The beast was promenaded to all the Ministerial houses, and was exhibited at the Palace of the Tuileries, where the two cattle-mongers who fattened him had the honour of being received by Louis Philippe and the Royal Family.

It may not be uninteresting to your readers to learn the order of the cortège. I took down the following, thinking it might serve as a hint to the procession-mongers of your theatres.

Four Municipal Guards, mounted on horseback.
Two running footmen in the costume of the reign of Louis XIII.
Drummers, costume of Louis XIV.
Mounted on magnificent horses in state robes, M. Rolland, the proprietor of the Bœuf Gras, and M. Corner, the feeder; M. Hersent, the principal inspector of the slaughter-houses of Paris.
The master of the ceremonies.
The chief of the slaughtermen, costumed after the antique two hectors in a similar costume.
Four slaughtermen conducting Dagobert.
Dagobert, his horns gilded, his head ornamentalled by a diadem, his brow covered with brilliants, and his body caparisoned with scarlet velvet embroidered with gold.
Grand cavalcade marching in double ranks, composed of Knights of the epoch of Henry 3rd.
Six ghts of the brilliant reign of Francis I.
The Grand Provost of Paris, under Charles VII.
The illustrious Aubry-le-Boucher, who had the honour of giving his name to one of the streets of the capital.
Knights of the reign of Louis XIII.
Knights of the reign of Louis XIV.
Knights at Arms of all epochs.
The four mousquetaires of Alexandre Dumas.
Groups of Pages of the reigns of Louis XIII and XIV.
The Car was constructed after the most classical manner. The cortège followed the accustomed itinerary.

A rather curious incident occurred a few days since at a dinner given by M. Pastoret, a celebrated lover of art, to the eminent painter, M. Ingres. After dinner, Ingres desired to see a portrait of the "Amphitrion," which he had painted in his early days of art. The portrait was sought for, and was discovered in a salon, which at that moment was filled with guests. A gentleman, a great talker, and not redolent of French polish, observed that "The colouring was monstrous—no one would dispute it; but I can't help feeling a strong disgust for the Philistinism of those who call Ingres a classical draughtsman—his drawing is so unclassic. Look at this hand: I ask any one if this portrait could, by any rules of art, lift his arm, if it even felt the wish to do so; it is positively ridiculous: it's all cold grays." M. Ingres suffered the gentleman to finish his peroration, until his breath was expended, and he had no more to say. "Sir," he replied, "my name is Ingres, and I thank you for the compliments you have been pleased to bestow upon me; perhaps, in future, you will do well to express yourself with more moderation in regard to the master of the house, who has the last taste and the kindness not to partake of your opinion." The gentleman blushed every colour of the palette; stuttered, and coughed, and bungled excuses. Ingres turned his back, and left the room.

FRANCE.

There is very little domestic news in the Paris papers this week.

The subject of Algeria appears to have taken complete possession of the political world in Paris. On Monday, a long discussion took place in the bureaux of the Chamber of Deputies, relative to the supplementary credits demanded by the Government on account of the expenses of the war in that colony. These supplementary credits amount to 25,000,000 francs. Several members, principally on the Ministerial side, declared their opinion to be in favour of a more limited system of occupation in Algeria than that at present adopted. The Opposition members in general advocated the necessity of keeping complete possession of the whole of the territory from Morocco to Tunis, and defended the system of expeditions into distant districts and razzias adopted by Marshal Bugeaud. A member of the Opposition, M. Mounier de la Sizeranne, made some remarks on the question of raising Algeria into a vice-royalty, and contended that the appointment of a Viceroy would tend greatly to the advancement of the colony. M. de Remusat, who was one of the members of the Thiers Cabinet, proposed that a special Minister should be appointed for Algeria, with a seat in the Cabinet. The committee to report on the question of the supplementary credit for Algeria was then appointed. Five Conservative and four Opposition members were elected. The general feelings in the bureaux appear to be adverse to the proceedings of Marshal Bugeaud.

M. Guizot has obtained another triumph over the Opposition. M. Odilon-Barrot having demanded the resumption of the project of law relative to the University, in which demand he was vigorously supported by M. Thiers, but opposed by the Minister of Public Instruction and M. Guizot, the question was, after a warm debate, put to the vote, when there appeared

The Constitutionnel says—"M. Guizot has formally declared that the Government had abandoned all idea of the expedition against Madagascar. The garrisons of Bourbon and Mayotte will merely be reinforced. The Minister of Foreign Affairs added that the English would not act any more than ourselves against the Hovas."

It is now beyond a doubt that the present Chamber of Deputies will be dissolved in the course of the present year. In the sitting of the Chamber on Monday, the Minister of Foreign Affairs and the Minister of Public Instruction both stated that this would be the last session of the present Chambers.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"H. M." Feltham.—In the very simple position received, White may delay the mate by sacrificing his Queen at the first move. You will have seen by our solution of No. 108 that yours is incorrect.

"Caduceus." and "Wanderer."—We concur in opinion with you that a player cannot be compelled to take a Pawn in passing. Many very eminent players, however, think differently, and we were glad of the opportunity of publishing a position involving the point at issue, which ought certainly to be determined.

"Ignoramus."—White would of course take the Queen's Pawn, leaving a move.

"E. M. P." We take much pleasure in your occasional criticisms: they are genuinely acute, and always as a friendly spirit.

"Tyro, Mc.M—h—y."—Persons attempting the solution of problems by masters of the game, you should learn the moves of the pieces

"Bishop," Kingston.—The solution of Mr. Bone's "macdal" problem was given in our Notices to Correspondents last week. Jaenisch's Treatise on the Openings is in French; the price, 18s. The translation of Heydebrant will contain all the most important variations of Jaenisch, and is intended to appear this summer.

"R A"—Mr. Staunton is about half the age he is made to appear in our Sketch which appeared a fortnight since. Mr. M'Donnell was thirty-seven when he died. We do not know the age of Sarratt at his death

"Bow Bell." You are not far wrong, we believe, in your relative comparison of the two players' capabilities; but it would be premature to pass utterance to it just now. The Problems shall appear.

"T. T. T. P."—We do not know to whom the public is indebted for Double Chess.

"Vicesimus Dons Up." There is no mistake whatever in the Problem 108.

"Tyke."—You never need be troubled to meet an opponent for a game at Chess in London, while we have such convenient establishments for playing the game, always open. On your next visit, seek out Gaudet's Café, on Ludgate Hill; or the magnificent Divan in the Strand; or Kilpatrick's cosy and commodious Chess Rooms, in Covent Garden; or last, though not least, the spacious and splendid "Shades," in Leicester-square where you will find competitors of every force, and refreshments of every description.

"Jonathan," and "T. N."—Many of the beautiful games in the late match between Mr. Staunton and Mr. Lowenam are at present unpublished, but a volume containing the whole, with notes by Mr. Staunton, is in active preparation, and will be duly announced immediately.

 The pressure of other matter compels us to postpone the Replies to a majority of our Correspondents till next week.

A GOSSIP UPON GOSSIP-PARLIAMENTARY.

The year 1846 will be remembered in history as "the year of the great talk," just as there are years of "the great frost," "the great plague," or "the great fire." What good is to come of it all would puzzle a cabinet minister to say. The only party who might have been expected to talk—the triumphant free-traders—have said little, the time has been spent in listening to prot-tionists parading the weakness of their arguments and Ministers confessing the cowardliness of their apostacy. In the cases they have hitherto supported, and which has hitherto supported them.

The country is anxious for Free-Trade, but does not evince a very hearty admiration of the channel through which it is to come. Englishmen like fair play, and there is an uneasy feeling that Sir Robert "has struck below the belt."

However, all the talk in the House does little for one side or the other. Reporters suffer; editors suffer; members suffer; who or what is benefited? Not the argument; that was settled long ago. Not the House; each side of it has made up its mind. Not constituencies; those of them who will listen to reason have done so already, and to those of them that won't, it's no use talking. The sufferings in the reporters' gallery have been dreadful. With all the aid of "burking," the work is still destructive, and exceeds anything ever known in the memory of the oldest stenographist. We give an affecting document, which was dropped by one of these useful men as he left the House the other night. It was picked up by a policeman and handed to us. It is founded on Alfred Tennyson's "Marianna in the Moated Grange," and touchingly depicts the sufferings of the gallery.

With every kind of awful rot
Were filled the speeches, one and all;
Each country member took a shot,
In the great debate in St. Stephen's Hall.
The poor reporters, sad and strange,
Listen'd, perforce, to each new batch,
In hopes some gleam of sense to catch.
And all was rot! No hope of change.
They only said, "It's very dreary,
They won't divide," he said;
They said, "If Brotherton were here, he Would move them all to bed!"

The talk went on—from four till seven;
The talk went on—it all cut and dried;
And after dinner, past eleven
Each night—and they would not divide!
When Peel and Graham pull'd their hats
Down o'er their brows, the members nigh
Thought 'twas to hide their shame, but I Knew that they were not quite such flats!
The fact was, they both felt it dreary—
The speeches dull as lead;
They closed their eyes, and snored—so weary—
They thought they were in bed!

About the middle of the night
We hoped they'd stop—but 'twas no go;

The county members still showed fight;
From out their hats their speeches slow
They stammered. Without hope of change
We sat and took our notes forlorn,
Making our minds up to till that morn
To work, their nonsense to arrange.
But still we said, "It's very dreary,
They'll never stop!" we said;
The Speaker too! It's very clear he
Would like to go to bed.

Leaning his back against the wall,
A stoutish Irish Member slept,
And in his dreams thro' Tara's halls
He heard the harp of Turn sweep.
'Twas his own nose that snored alway,
Mixed with the melancholy talk
Of one, nor coughs nor groans could balk
Of having out his stupid say.
We all exclaimed, "'Tis very dreary;
He should be stopped, we said;
If he himself could only hear, he
Would wish he were in bed.

All night upon the suffering House
Their vengeance country members wreak'd,
Each voice pitch'd into Fed.
Of the Protectionists, they shriek'd,
Was scandalous—he should go out.
Old gentlemen, tremendous bores,
Mander'd for hours, 'mid coughs and roars,
Of what they knew the least about.
We only said, "Our lives are dreary,
We're boxed up here." We said,
"When Peel is doom'd such stuff to hear, he May well be cupp'd and bled."

This picture of physical and mental suffering is extremely painful; but, alas! it is not overcharged. In ancient times of Rome, when oxen spoke, it was common: the priests were assembled; propitiatory sacrifices offered, to avert the wrath of offended Heaven; and the public himself slain as victim. Now-a-days, why, when certain other animals speak, in times as perilous, are they not buried alive, like the talking ocean, recorded by Livy? Who knows what a blessing such a propitiation might bring on the country. The powers that watch over the despatch of business would bestir themselves to help great measures through the House of Commons at critical times, instead of smothering unfortunate Britanna under the leaden and brazen eloquence of Milesses and Tyrells, as the Roman soldiers crushed Tarpeia under their brazen shields.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

"What! all my pretty ones at one fell swoop?"

Rural England is in convulsions. The time foretold by the Miller with Three Thumbs has arrived: the crisis is at hand: the country is about being overrun with bread, and jugged hare to become a thing for aldermen to dream of when they snore! Already have these columns announced the coming plague of corn in leading articles, and parliamentary notices, and political summaries—in every form of intelligence, this portent has borne to every nook and corner of the habitable world the news that the climax of liberty has come upon us—but we touch upon the licentiousness of freedom that henceforth, when John Bull is hungry, he shall be permitted to help his stomach to a slice of Jack Frenchman's hide. This, we repeat, has been told as also how the landed people declare that the glut of foreign bread must ruin John's constitution. But, mid this sad moment, no mention has been made of that gigantic change—revolution were the utter word with which the Legislature menaces what is even dearer to us than bread, or beef, or beer—that glorious heirloom of Canute the Dane—our Game-laws. O! Gosamith, Goldsmith! why is thy muse not here to sing, haply in stanzas such as these

A time there was—ere Britain's sorrows came—
When all her fields were populous with game.

That a lord of the soil should arise in his place on the great benches, to submit to an assembly, necessarily lords of the soil, a bill recognising the principle "that game is the property of the owner of the land on which it is reared!" Contrast this with the issue of the good old times. . . . "The Attorney-General exhibited an information against James Bond, for that he had erected a pigeon-house on certain land which he held for a term of years, parcel of the Manor or Thorp, in the County of Surrey, of which Manor the Queen is seised in fee. And Maxwell, Chief Baron and Gent Baron, the Attorney-General, and Serjeant Hill all the counsel at the bar, took the law to be that a pigeon-house was considered and accounted as a common nuisance, as I therefore they granted an injunction, to him to cause him to pull down his building. And that no one could erect a love-house, de novo, but the lord of the manor and the parson of the church and, by the ancient law, this was inquirable at the Act, among common nuisances. And pending this motion, Hardress came into court, and being their treasurer, said, that Mr. Flowden was of opinion that no one but the lord of the manor or the parson of the church could erect a dove-house. He said, likewise, that the Mountagues had the same in a large assembly." . . . . See that, now—before the passing of the Reform Bill a pigeon-pie was gentlemanly eating; more recently the pheasant was prohibited to the plebeian, and now they threaten to cut off the digestion of London from hare-soup! What catastrophe was thus darkly hinted at in Parliament, on Tuesday last. Lord Ashburton said, "that rabbits are already excluded from the list of game: what he would propose, would be to take hares out of the list of game, also.

In our capacity as advocates of sporting we might lift up our voice against this measure—which will throw the coursing community into convulsions; as organ of the gentlemen of England—who as they attain life sear and yellow, affect the current-jelly cause, we might plead in mitigation of the sentence; but we take higher ground, and denounce it upon the principle of justice. In the name of the barns of England, we exclaim against their having been made game of first—victims after. If proclamation is to be made for their annihilation, will they spare the nut-brown partridge, the brilliant pheasant? Not a bit of it—this is the first step of the sliding scale in game protection. Next year the hitherto firmly will be proscribed; then Parliament by that time, representative of labour, and not of land—will distranchise the beasts of forest, and a hamlet or vermon will be as rare in St. Giles's, as a partridge is now wont to be in St. Giles's. Sportsmen, to the rescue! Are you men? and will you submit to such wholesale hopelessness as this? Ask yourself; and remember our occupation, too, hangs upon the answer.

"What! all my pretty ones, at one fell swoop!"

TATTERSALL'S

MONDAY. Sweetmeat was in good odour this afternoon, and on an indifferent out-lay settled firmly at the head of the poll. None of the other favourites were in demand; in fact, we fancied there was a prevailing disposition to lay against Mermaid and Wilkinson. The Derby betting was unquestionably flat, and will call any results worthy of notice.

THE ROYAL STAG HOUNDS.—A very large field was at the meet, on Wednesday, at Kitching's Park, near Colnbrook, including His Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge, Lord Sheffield, Mr. George Wombwell, and several military officers from Windsor and Hounslow. The well-known stag, Rory O'More, upon being uncarted on Iver Heath, took away into Black Park, breaking away to Fulmer Common, crossing Stoke Park bottom, leaving the village to the left, on to Gerrard's Cross Common, by Fox Hall, towards Beaconsfield. Rory then turned in the direction of Hedgerley, passing away at a rattling pace for Hail Barn Farm, near Seeon Head, to Wilton Common, down Long Lane to Stone End, cross to the Taplows, and was there taken, after a capital run, of about hunting pace throughout, over a fine line of country, of an hour and three quarters. Prince George, who was up at the finish, returned to town by the Great Western Railway.

MUSIC.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE

"THE CRUSADERS." GRAND OPERA IN THREE ACTS. LIBRETTO BY M. DE ST. GEORGES AND MR BUNN. MUSIC BY JULES BENEDICT

The subject of the Crusades has been an inexhaustible source to the historian, poet, painter and musician. History, unfortunately, is involved in doubt and contradiction; and the romance writer has not shrunk from astonishing anachronisms to suit his purpose. The authors of the present drama have not made use of Sir Walter Scott's tales of "The Betrothed" and "The Talisman," as the title would indicate. In an interesting preface Mr. Bunn admits frankly that he has rendered subservient to the plot, the capture of Jerusalem, under Godfrey Boullon, in 1099, and also events of the Third Crusade, in 1191, by France and England. The incidents are, however, entirely fictitious; the former borrowed from Torquato Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," and the latter gleaned from Hume's "History of Richard the First," 8vo. edition, Vol. pages 10 and 19, and Sismondi's "History of Chivalry," chap. 19, page 2 containing details of the famous Man of the Mountain, a leader of fanatics who did not hesitate to obey the will of their master by committing assassination. The scene which they select (Jaffa) originated the name of "Assassin" as they were sure of the joys of Paradise, to compensate for their acts, their organization was complete. Of the existence of this sect, resembling the Thugs of India, and the Jesuits in many respects, there can be no doubt. To the curious in those matters we suggest the perusal, in addition to Mr. Bunn's authorities, of the following authors:—Gibbon's Decline and Fall" (Chap. 58, 59); Keightley's "Outlines of History" (pp. 233, 235), and his book on "Secret Societies;" and Ramdohr's "History of the Hohenstaufens." The "Assassins" were ultimately annihilated by the Mongols. Let us now see how the materials have been employed in the present dramatic version. The cast is thus: Almeo, Mr. Romer; Ismail, Miss Rainforth; Bohemond, Mr. Harrison; Count of Toulouse, Mr. Borrani; Archbishop of Tyre, Mr. Weiss; Hassan, the Man of the Mountain, Mr. Stretton; and Ismael, Mr. D. W. King.

The opening scene is in a banqueting-room of the Palace of Tyre, with an orgie of Crusaders and Summite girls. The Archbishop enters, and reproves the lascivious revels, but as Conrade has been elected King of Jerusalem, at the gates of which the Christians are approaching. The Summite Girls are dismissed, but not before reservation is made by Bohemond on behalf of Almeo. The crimes of the Man of the Mountain are alluded to in this scene. Almeo (who is of the sect of Assassins) cautions the Knights of the perils to be apprehended from Hassan; and Ismael, at her command, in a legendary song, confirms her warning. It then appears that he is stupified by Almeo, and he vows vengeance against the favourite. Bohemond. Just as Ismael is hurrying Almeo to appear before Hassan, the Crusaders enter in a tumult, announcing the assassination of Conrade, Marquis of Montferrat (called by Scott, by mistake, Monserrat) by the emissaries of the Man of the Mountain. Immediately has an election of a new King, in this way each Knight places his ring into a helmet, and a deacon chooses one by chance from the casque. It turns out to be that of Bohemond, who is hailed as the new King of Jerusalem. He receives a secret intimation from Ismael that Almeo is waiting for him. The scene changes to a sombre forest; and the Man of the Mountain, with sweep band, and white robe, is seen on the summit of a lofty rock. With his Fatarees or followers around him. Conrade's death is announced to him. Almeo avows to Hassan her love for Bohemond; and, on condition that she may be allowed to depart with him, offers to gain his adherence to the Man of the Mountain. The latter consents, excepting only from death the Kings of Jerusalem. Bohemond enters the supposed enchanted wood, and is subjected to all the fascinations of the odalisques. The interview that follows with Almeo is interrupted by the arrival of Hassan and his followers, who discover that he has been elected King, and are favoured to murder him—a fate only averted by Almeo, who effects his escape across a lake. This act is called the "Enchantment."

The second act is designated "The Siege," and the first scene is in Bohemond's tent, whose life is again saved through Almeo's agency. Hassan and some followers having penetrated into the Christian camp, disguised as Crusaders. But the Count of Toulouse, accompanied by his daughter, Iseult, arrives just at this moment, and Bohemond has been betrothed to her. He has no intention to commit bigamy, as he really loves his earliest flame, although he has been a wavorer. But the story has a break by the arrival at Jerusalem, the siege thereof, and the entrance in triumph of the Christian army. Poor Almeo is about to forfeit her life, for saving that of Bohemond, if Ismael had not arrived in time to proclaim her innocence, by a confession of his own guilty attempt on the king's life.

The third act is entitled "The Bridal." Here the chivalric action and the panoply of war cease, and the tournament is pursued to the close. Almeo, disguised as a Pilgrim, informs Iseult that Bohemond is attached to Almeo. Iseult resolves to reject the King's hand. A proposition then arrives for the surrender of the Man of the Mountain, provided Bohemond will espouse Almeo. The Crusaders, to get rid of such a dreadful enemy, induce Bohemond to accept the offer, and Hassan enters in a dying state. He explains that he visited the tomb of Almeo Queen of Jerusalem, that the Christians might have no enemy and the creed of Mahomet a defender; but the Sumnite undeceives him by declaring that she has become a Christian, and he is carried off dead, and defeated in his object. After a scene of reproach from Iseult to Bohemond, in which the latter is driven to despair by his contract with the other lady, but she generously resigns her right and becomes a Nun of the Hospitalers of Jerusalem, preferring Iseult to the King, and the latter consummate the opera with a bravura duet, advocating the ties of friendship as earnestly as the bonds of love.

We are happy to record the complete success of this magnificent work. The house was crowded in excess on Thursday night in every part. As it was the first, the composer was called for, and appeared on the stage with Miss Romer, Miss Rainforth, and Mr. Harrison. Mr. Bunn was then come led to appear, and was loudly cheered. He has been the architect of extreme. The "Introduction and Chorus" the first act, and the Songs of and Entrance into Jerusalem, in the second, were marvellously got up. We cannot, at the hour we are obliged to go to press, enter into the music at length. For the present we shall say that we found it long, but that it is too long; but there is room for curtailment, especially in the third act.

The overture is a magnificent piece of writing, although it was not encored by the chorus, "Hasten on!" the subject of which can be found in every new opera, was the first encore. It is broad, martial, and inspiring. Mr. was next in rotation, although the demand for the elegant [illegible] of the last act, in the song "I was made a captive," and the [illegible] in a coquettish song, "Submit unto her will." Stretton had a splendid subject when he first appeared on the mountain top. A clever descriptive song was sung by Mr. King, but the illusion was all flash. The [illegible] rather obligato music is charming. One of the most effective duets we ever heard takes place in the second act between Miss Romer and Mr. King. It is delicately instrumented. Miss Rainforth's opening cavatina electrified. It is a beautiful melody. The quartette and finale of the second act are superb specimens of Mr. Benedict's inspiration and science. Miss Rainforth has a ballad "In childhood's calm," a duet with Borrani, and another one with Harrison, in the third act. Harrison has a ballad, "Ll-gifted ring," which had a tremendous encore—it is t e gem of the opera.

The finale to a love duet between Miss Rainforth and Miss Romer, who created such an extraordinary sensation by their vocalisation, that they were forced, even after the curtain had fallen, to appear again and repeat it. The ballet is delightful, and is exquisitely treated. A more effective duet for two soprani has been rarely met with; and it is quite a novelty to wind up an opera with such a composition. The honors, as regards the lyric vocalists, "were divided." We shall supply an analysis of this magnificent opera in our next publication.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.

SPANISH CONCERTS. Under the direction of the Brothers De Ciebra, a series of Spanish Concerts have commenced at the Royal Polytechnic Institution. There is a band of 20 guitars, and with harmonicons, castanets, &c., the melodies of Spain are rendered in perfect fidelity. The playing of Don Francisco R. De Ciebra, is first-rate. Their execution is wonderful, and intonation excellent. The entertainment is quite a curiosity; and to amateurs, desirous of acquiring a knowledge of the national airs of every country, quite a treat.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—At the second performance of "Samson," at Exeter Hall, Mr. Lockey and Miss Dolby occupied the places of Braham and Miss Hawes, owing to the former gentleman having been indisposed. Mr. Lockey is a pupil of Sir George Smart, and is unquestionably the best tenor now in the musical market. He delivered the recitatives with great intelligence, intonated well, and was generally successful.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The trial night of compositions to be performed during the present season, takes place to night (Saturday) at the Hanover-square Rooms. Signor Balfe's newly-composed overture for the opening concert, is entirely altered to arrangement of the old orchestra. Beethoven's Mass in D, performed with such éclat at the Beethoven Festival, in Bonn, in August last, will be performed. Mendelssohn's Symphony in D, in type and style, is the most important information that the trial night has been postponed, owing to the absence of a principal singer.

MR. LUCAS'S THIRD CLASSICAL EVENING.—The scheme comprised Mendelssohn's new trio in C minor, played by Madame Dulcken (piano), Sainton, (violin), and Lucas (violoncello); Mozart's quintett in E flat, executed by Sainton, Hayward, Tolbecque, Hill, and Lucas; and Beethoven's quartet, No. 11, and trio, No. 2.

THE HUTCHINSON FAMILY.—The third entertainment, on Tuesday night, at the Hanover-square Rooms, was crowded, and the minstrels were encored in nearly every piece.

THE ETHIOPIAN SERENADERS. The tide of fashion is now turned towards the St. James's Theatre, where the performances of Mr. Pelham's troupe, is equally as well attended, to listen to the diverting strains of the "Darkies."

REPORTED DEATH OF MADAME CASTELLAN.—It is with the highest gratification that we announce the falsity of the intelligence transmitted to London and Paris by letters from St. Petersburgh, announcing the decease of this amiable and accomplished vocalist. She had been seriously ill, and was confined to her room for some nights, which gave rise to the unfounded rumour. We are glad to learn that she has reappeared on the stage in excellent health.

SIGNOR TAMBURINI.—This great baritone has written from St. Petersburg, to announce his visit to this country during the present season. His return will be gladly welcomed, whether in the concert-room or theatre.

PARAGRAPH. This great artist, we regret to learn, remains in a very melancholy state since the awful decease of his lamented wife. When Mrs [illegible] was taken so ill, he fell down in a fainting fit, and it was only by its after her death that the fatal news was communicated to him. She died in the arms of Madame Sainton, her eldest son. The only words she uttered after the exclamation, "John, I am dying! something has snapped at my heart;" were, "Is this death? I have never done harm to a human being," and then breathed her last, without a sigh.

MEETINGS FOR THE WEEK.—Next week will be rich in music. Mr. Dando's Quartet party at Crosby Hall, on Monday; the second choral meeting of Hullah's Singing Classes at Exeter Hall, on Wednesday; Mr. Lucas's fourth musical evening; and, on Friday, the Sacred Harmonic Society will give Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise."

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang," or Hymn of Praise, and Beethoven's 'Mount of Olives," under the name of "Engedi" are announced for performance at Exeter Hall on Friday next.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS

The great fact in our weekly advices from the Continent is the first performance, at the Parisian Académie Royale, of Donizetti's "Lucia," with Duprez as Edgar, Wilfe, Nau as the baritone, and Barrilhet as Ashton. There was a French version at the Renaissance, some years since, for the début of Madame Thillon, our fair countrywoman. Duprez has now played Edgar in Italian (it was expressly composed for him by Donizetti, when the French tenor was rivalling Rubini in Italy), French, and English. It will be recollected that he performed the part at Drury-Lane Theatre. The sensation he created at the Académie was tremendous. He was called for after the malédiction and death scenes. Mdlle. Nau sang cleverly, but is deficient in the dramatic skill required for Lucia. Barrilhet broke down in the first act, and an apology was made for him. Leon Pillet, the director, had two messengers from Italy, in search of a prima donna. He heard the one called Barbiere-Nini at Florence, and was expected to go on to Trieste, to listen to Mdlle. Lagrange, who is creating a furore there.

The Revue Musicale publishes a complimentary letter from Duprez to Rossini, offering to dedicate his new "Treatise on the Art of Singing," to the Swan of Pesaro, and Rossini in a graceful reply, dated Bologna, the 6th inst., accepts the dedication. At a musical fête given in Berlin, by the Earl of Westmoreland, in presence of the Royal Family, his Lordship's cantata, "The Rape of Proserpine" was executed by Jenny Lind, Mdlle. Tuczek, and Herr Botticher. We are glad to learn from the Frankfort advices, that our young countryman, Mr. Aguilar, formerly a pupil of Mr Neate, is distinguishing himself both as a pianist and composer. Litolff, in Berlin, and Lindsay Sloper in Paris, also English pianists, were gaining glory.

THE THEATRES.

FRENCH PLAYS.

The new star here is M. Felix, who made his débût before an English audience on Monday, and bids fair to become a great favourite. The piece selected for the occasion was "Les Memoires du Diable," played some time since with M. Rhorevalle and Mademoiselle Doche in the parts now allotted to M. Felix and Mademoiselle St. Marc. The piece turns on the use made, by a certain attorney's clerk, of memoranda left by his late master, respecting the secret history of his various clients. Tyrannous of these he is enabled to base himself off in the light of a supernatural being; and, by an adroit use of his information, to restore a poor wronged widow to the name and property of her husband, of whom she had been unjustly deprived by grasping relations. As a reward for these good services, he receives the hand of the lady's daughter. The mixture of really good warm earnest feeling, with a somewhat rakish gaiety and satirical knowledge, which forms the character of Robin, the attorney's clerk, is gracefully admirably suited to M. Felix's peculiar characteristics. He has all the light, easy, graceful deportment, stinging raillery of expression, and impertinence coolness of manner which distinguishes Lafont, and which constitutes the essence of a French man of the world. But, in addition to this, that which makes his performance peculiarly grateful to our English tastes, is the power of exhibiting intense feeling and the most impressive earnestness. Those two qualities, seldom found united by the play of their contrast, combine to give this actor the property of riveting the attention and engaging the sympathies to a degree. Precisely the same elements which give Mr. Wallack his popularity. Felix is, moreover, accomplished in his knowledge of the stage. The fact of all his movements is consummate; and none but one versed in the matter could detect the art, so skilfully is it used. His figure and face are, moreover, in his favour, though leather can be considered handsome or fine. They have, however, what, perhaps, exceeds this, immense resources of expression. His voice is perhaps the most embracive of any star that has appeared this season; and the audience went with him, throughout his performance, in a manner we have seldom before witnessed. He was admirably seconded by Lafont and Mdlle. Martelleur. The Queen and Prince Albert honoured the theatre, and appeared to share the delight of the audience at the performance.

SADLE..'S WELLS.

No theatre in London, we opine, has undergone such changes as Sadler's Wells, since it was first established as a place of public resort. This was a long time ago; when the patriotisms, shades of the drama were handy-dandy, and "legitimacy and bastardy" danced into the theatre hand in hand;" and when the re-discovery of a old well by Mr. Sadler (which was said to have once belonged to the Priory of St. John of Jerusalem) drew so many people together, from all the surrounding villages, besides the metropolis, to taste and test the virtue of its waters.

No great wonder was the course imposed upon the patients. In the old tract of "I. G., Doctor of Physick," who wrote upon the efficacy of Sadler's Wells, we find the patients were recommended to "eat carraways," or "drink a glass of Islington ale with wine," viz., one third sherry does; and it was also enjoined "convenient" to smoke a pipe or two of tobacco at the same time. The five or six hundred people who are said to have been there constantly every day, evidently found the latter a desideratum, for they went there as we now go to Cremorne; for the Brunswick had not then been invented.

Well—time went on, and we suppose, the popularity of the waters began to decline; for Mr. Sadler, about the year 1765, found it necessary to add a musical attraction. We read of singing and instrumental performances; and of "a Mrs. Pearson, who played on the dulcimer, at the end of the great walks, every summer evening, from five o'clock this season of the year, to which all lovers were invited." A shell-work rock on the lawn," on which a piper was accustomed to sit, and every one who passed might dance to the melody of his pipe and tabor. Then the room was built upon the lawn, and the advertisements announced "tea, coffee, and "cheese-cakes, custards, bottled ale and cider," and other articles were vended at the bar, and formed the stable refreshments. Jigs, sword-dances, and tumbling by Jackson were added; and the entertainment was wound up either by "honest friend Thomas," who officiated in the two-fold character of clown and waiter.

Many times these were at Sadler's Wells. They were the days when our forefathers strolled leisurely on fine evenings across the pleasant pastures between Islington and the Exmouths, to amuse themselves for an hour or two. And a charming walk, we imagine, it must have been. There are glimpses to be got at this present day from the heights of Pentonville on sunny afternoons—orange-coloured, dusty, hazy views seen at the ends of rapidly-descending streets suddenly commencing to show how beautiful must have been the prospect of Old London from this point, before it was destroyed by the polypus-like ramifications of bricks and mortar and the never-ceasing smoke from the legion of manufactories that surround it.

It is now a matter rather of difficulty than of pleasure, to get to Sadler's Wells. It is not in anybody's way. No omnibus, wherever you may be, can take you there. You must go down at the end of a street, and you progress from it to any more comfortable manner. From central London, the most vivid impression of voyage at is, that you never could get away from Cumberland. Pentonville turn in whatever direction you chose, you always found yourself close to its walls. And from the west, the journey is equally uncomfortable. There are no thoroughfares: you imagine you are going on, all right, direct to the spot; and then you are brought up by a gate, or a barrier, right across the road, and compelled to go back again, and make some roundabout route, over Blackfriars Bridge, or across Primrose Hill, or through St Giles's, for aught we know, for we never yet could make out the right line of our way so far as Seven Dials or Smithfield, and then all consciousness of the road leaves us. The best way for strangers is to put all their faith in the Angel, at Islington; and, when there, to trust to the nearest policeman or baker's shop for further guidance.

And yet, with all these difficulties, we find that Sadler's Wells has always been a favourite place of resort, from the "Musical House" up to the days of Grimaldi, and, perhaps, never more so than at present, under the new management of Mrs Warner and Mr. Phelps. It has often been our pleasing duty to notice the very admirable manner in which the theatre is now conducted; and the revival of "Virginius," on Monday, has added another most praiseworthy success to the present catalogue. If we mistake not, "Virginius" was performed once or twice, when the theatre was first opened by the present lessees; but not with the care and general excellence it at present exhibits, after a revival the other evening. It achieved a perfect triumph, and it deserved it.

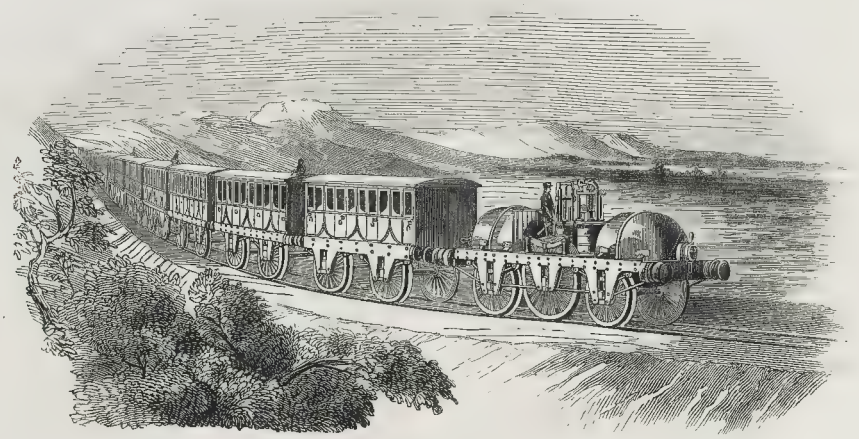
Indeed, since time the dramatic action of the play is likely to run, have especially the characters of a piece been played with that level excellence which marks everything undertaken by this company. At the fall of the curtain the cheering was enthusiastic; and Mr. Phelps responded to a loud call made for him.

The production of a piece called "Le Lac Sallaye," lately produced at the gymnase dramatique, has been brought out here under the name of "Check to the King; or, the Queen's First Move." It is almost too French in its construction and style, but was cleverly supported by Miss Laidell, Miss Cooper, and Mr. H. Marston.

THE MURDER AT BERKSWELL, NEAR COVENTRY.—The young man Read, who has been several times examined before the magistrates at Solihull, charged with the murder of the old man Tranter, at Berkswell, near Coventry, was on Monday committed for trial on the wife's testimony.

In the course of Sir Thomas Wilde's argument on Monday at the bar of the House of Lords, in Wood's appeal case, he learned counsel had occasion to refer to a case in the books, in which a rat is stated to have murdered a wife. Lord Brougham—"The rat is a surprising animal, but I was not before aware that it ever practised as a conveyancer. I knew it to be fond of shifting uses." "It is," interposed the Lord Chancellor, "for test of corn." "Doubtless," rejoined Lord Brougham, "it is very fond of corn."

PARSEY'S AIR-ENGINE.



PARSEY'S PATENT AIR-ENGINE AND TRAIN.

PARSEY'S PATENT LOCOMOTIVE AIR-ENGINE.

Had any one, thirty years ago, ventured to predict that in 1845 nearly 600,000,000 sterling would be the amount of liabilities incurred for the construction of roads and steam machinery, for the transit of passengers and merchandize, throughout Great Britain, at velocities varying from 25 to 60 miles per hour, it would by some have been regarded as a tolerable joke; by others, perhaps, as establishing the rather maimed necessity for a statute of lunacy on such an adventurous prophet.

Probably a similar feeling would be indulged towards any one of the present day who would hazard a prediction, equally true, of what shall be the range of our engineering and commercial appliances thirty years hence! Steam has shown the immense value of a concentrated force; and must, therefore, necessarily bow to any innoxious agency that shall afford equal power in a smaller compass, and at less cost.

It is not in our province to give an authoritative opinion on the probable success of Mr. Parsey's invention as a competitor with steam power; but simply to record, in a popular form, the facts presented to us, as far as the capabilities of that invention have been hitherto developed; and, with this view, we have engraved diagrams from the working model now exhibiting at the Office, in Pall-Mall, of the Company formed for carrying out Mr. Parsey's views.

Fig. 1 is a side elevation of the entire Carriage, with the working parts of the Engine shown in Section. Fig. 2 is an end elevation of ditto; and fig. 3, a plan of Engine, and part of air vessels; the letters of reference corresponding in each diagram.

Thus, A,A, are receivers of compressed air; B, tube connecting the receivers, from which the air passes up the supply-pipe, C, into the equalising cylinder, E, at D. Attached to the top of the equalising cylinder, E, is a self-acting apparatus, for adjusting the supply of air to the working cylinders, K,K; this is effected by setting the spring, F, so as to press down the valve, M, with a force equal to that at which the engine is to be worked; say 60 lb. per inch. Whenever, therefore, the pressure in E becomes greater than that, the valve, M, is forced up, and partially closes the valve, G; thereby limiting the supply from the receivers, A,A, and preserving a uniform pressure in E. The condensed air is conducted into the working cylinders, K,K, through the sliding valves, in the same manner as steam, and is admitted or shut off by raising or depressing the handle of the stop-cock, J. Motion is communicated from the cross-head direct to the crank axle of the driving wheels, by the connecting rods, H,H. L,L, are for connecting the hose or pipe of the stationary reservoirs with the receivers, when a fresh supply of condensed air is required.

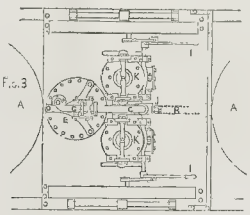
Assuming that the reaction arising from the elastic force of air is equal to the amount of pressure per square inch to which it is subjected in the receivers, its power must be equal to the performance of any labour that steam can accomplish; because, like steam, its power can only be limited by the strength of the vessel in which it is confined. Assuming this, then, the next most important feature is the economy that would result from the general substitution of one power for the other.

The first cost of a steam locomotive varies from £1200 to £1600. An air-engine, of corresponding power, can be supplied at from £700 to £1000. The comparative durability may be gathered from the well-known fact, that steam locomotives are more burnt than worn out; and are, therefore, so frequently out of order as not only to occasion a vast outlay in repairs, but to render it necessary to keep up a much larger establishment of engines than would otherwise be needful, in order to prevent the general traffic from being impeded by casualties.

The inventor, Mr. Parsey, proposes constructing the receivers of his Air Engine so as to sustain a pressure of from 1000lb. to 2000lb. per square inch; whilst the working pressure supplied to the engine from the equalising cylinder will be 60lb per inch. But this may be increased, and the speed thereby varied from twenty to a rate equal to one hundred miles per hour. One charge will suffice to drive an engine fifty miles, with a train of 40 tons attached.

It is proposed further to erect stationary engines on a railway line, at intervals of about thirty miles; from these a fresh service of air can be obtained as readily as the engines are at present supplied from the water cranes; and it is well known that a stationary engine can be more economically worked than a locomotive, owing to the cheapness of coal as compared with coke.

On the comparative cost of condensed air and steam for working a given line, a Correspondent of the Mining Journal gives the following result of his calculations and inquiries:—



The annual charge of working by condensed air—

2480 horses-power engines consume 33,800 tons coal at 9s.	..	..	..	£15210
Oil, hemp, and tallow, at 5 per cent. on cost	..	..	..	4950

Wages of stationary engineers and stokers	..	..	..	4742
Ditto of engine drivers	..	..	..	5000
Total	..	..	..	£36286

Steam system, 1843, authentic—

Wages of engine drivers and firemen	..	..	..	£ 9673
Coke	..	..	..	20541
Oil, horse pipes, and fire tools, pumping engines and water				4099
Labourers and cleaners, waste and oil	..	..	..	414
Repairs of engines and tenders	..	..	..	12021
Coals and firewood, expenses of stationary engines at Wolverton, &c.				3172
Superintendent, clerks, and foremen's salaries, &c.	..	..		4634
Total	..	..	..	£63834

The above power will convey 90 tons net by each train.

The expense and impediment of tenders is by Mr. Parsey's system, wholly avoided.

At the soirée of the Marquis of Northampton, which took place on Saturday evening last, at the residence of that nobleman, Mr. Parsey had the honour of being introduced to his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and of explaining to him the nature of his invention, and the mode of working the model, for which purpose a vessel of compressed air was placed in the apartment. His Royal Highness asked many questions in relation with the subject, and inspected very minutely the model and mode of filling the engine from the reservoir or vessel, the principle and action of the regulator, &c. The model generally attracted great attention.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE FINE ARTS.

The fifth Report of the Royal Commission on the Fine Arts has been issued within a few days, containing an appendix of various subjects of interest upon the general decoration of the two Houses of Parliament, and of matters connected with the arts generally, particularly painting in fresco.

Upon the actual and bond fide execution of frescoes for the adornment of the walls of the new Palace of Westminster, the Royal Commission speak with great caution and uncertainty. They state—

"That, being desirous to afford opportunities for the further practice of fresco painting, and for the cultivation of the style of design which is fitted for it, we propose that a Hall in your Majesty's Palace at Westminster, called the Upper Waiting Hall, should be decorated with fresco paintings. We beg leave to commit the execution of five of the said works to Charles West Cope, A.R.A., John Callcott Horsley, John Rogers Herbert, A.R.A., Joseph Severn, and John Tenniel, Junr., who, we consider, have distinguished themselves as designers, or as fresco painters, in one or more of the various exhibitions that have taken place with reference to the decoration of the Palace at Westminster.

"And, further, conceiving it to be expedient that the preparation of works of art, now or hereafter to be undertaken with reference to the decoration of your Majesty's Palace aforesaid, should, as far as possible, have relation to the progress of the building, and to the order in which the several decorations may be required, we deem it expedient that a competition in oil-painting, announced in July, 1844, for which, with the sanction of your Majesty, premiums to the amount of £3000 have been offered, and which was intended to take place in June, 1846, should be postponed till June, 1847."

The paintings are to be sent, in the course of the first week in June, 1847 for exhibition, to Westminster Hall.

Upon the subject of stained glass for the windows of the House of Lords, the Committee state that, having considered how much the beauty of the proposed windows would be enhanced by rich draperies, and by the intermixture of female portraits, the latter object especially could scarcely be attained in any other appropriate manner than by a succession of the Queens of England.

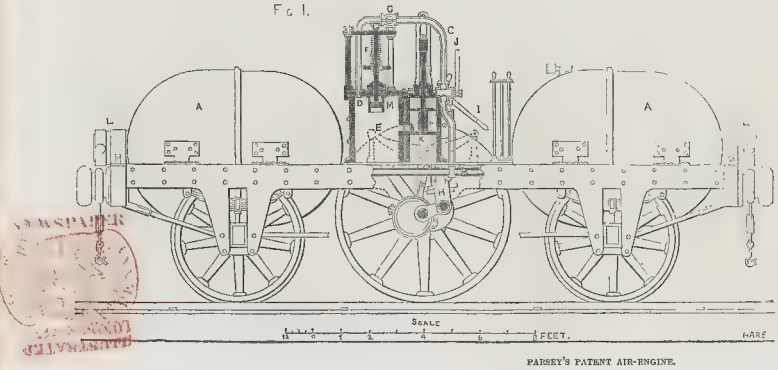
Under all the circumstances, the Committee are prepared to recommend a series of the Royal line. They have also been confirmed in their opinion as to this recommendation by finding that the proposed arrangement will fill each of the twelve windows with the representations of eight persons united by some kind of historical connection, and separated in the same manner from the rest.

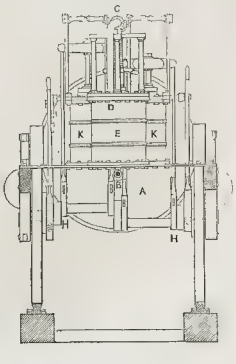
On Wednesday, the inquest on the bodies of John, Jane, and Margaret Gilton was held before the county coroner, at West Derby. The coroner, in summing up, said it must be satisfactory to all parties to know that the arsenic had accidentally communicated with the water. The jury accordingly found a verdict to the effect that the deceased parties had died in consequence of having drank a solution of arsenic, which had accidentally oozed from the drain into the well.

Death of Lieutenant-General Sir James Kearney.—We are sorry to announce the demise of Lieutenant-General Sir James Kearney, K.C.H., who departed this life on the 23rd inst, in the 60th year of his age. He entered the army in 1794, at the early age of sixteen.

Gambling Transactions.—It will be seen by an advertisement in another part of our paper, that the Committee of the Art Union of London, intend to adopt means to defeat the schemes of individuals who endeavour to get money from the public by the delusive and illegal promise of prizes, dependent upon the distribution of the works of Art by that Association. The deception is so glaring that few dupes could be obtained, but it is well to prevent even the attempt to pervert the praiseworthy objects of the Society.

Failures in Liverpool.—On Monday, the creditors of the Messrs. Stockdale and Sons, whose failure took place a few days ago, had their first meeting, and the disclosures have taken the mercantile world by surprise. The liabilities are £250,000; the assets to meet them are set down at £132,000. The firm, in matters of trade, are indebted principally to importers of palm oil, the highest debt being about £19,000; the average amount due to individual houses, however, not exceeding £8000. But the most astonishing fact had reference to the Borough Bank. The debt due to this bank is £126,000. For £26,000, securities are held; for £100,000, there is no security whatever. The banking-house is able to meet this loss without any inconvenience, for it has a reserved fund of upwards of £100,000.





PARSEY'S PATENT AIR-ENGINE.

CHATHAM DOCKYARD

CHATHAM DOCKYARD.

This fine establishment dates from the reign of Queen Elizabeth, by whom it was founded, previous to the invasion of the Armada, on the site of what is now termed the Ordnance Wharf, and occasionally the Old Dock. It was removed to its present situation in 1622, the demands of the Navy requiring increased accommodation. From this period until after 1757, nothing very important was effected at Chatham; but, from this time down to 1830, according as alarm respecting French invasion prevailed, or as the rapidly increasing navy required, new buildings were erected; and the extensive area occupied by the different establishments was enclosed by a strong line of fortifications on the land side, and protected on the river side by strengthening Upnor Castle, by the erection of a martello tower, called Gillingham Fort, on the Chatham side, and other defences.

The naval and military establishments consist of a dockyard, nearly a mile in length, which has four wet docks, capable of receiving vessels of the largest class; an extensive arsenal; barracks on a large scale, for artillery and engineers, infantry and Royal marines; a park of artillery; magazines and store-houses; besides a handsome Dock-Chapel, and a number of habitations for the civilians who are employed.

The principal Mast-house is 240 feet long by 120 wide. The Rope-house is 128 feet in length, and 47½ wide, in which cables 101 fathoms in length, and 25 inches in circumference, are made. The machinery used in all the departments is of the very best kind. A duplicate of Brunel's block-making machine is kept here, ready for use, in case the machine at Portsmouth should get out of order. The engineer barracks are built in a plain and simple style, and are extensive and convenient. There is a school for engineers, and near the Dockyard gate is a large Naval Hospital, which was erected at the suggestion of William IV., when Lord High Admiral.

Among the vessels now in progress at Chatham dockyard, is the Eurotas, fitting for a steam guard-ship, and expected to be ready to receive her engines in July next. The Racer steam-ship, also, building here, has just had more hands put on her, so as to complete her for launching at the end of next month.

SOUTH NOTTINGHAMSHIRE ELECTION.

RETURN OF MR. HILDYARD.

The nomination for South Nottinghamshire took place on Saturday, at Newark.

At an early hour the respective candidates were stirring with their friends. Mr. Hildyard's party, some hundreds in number, assembled at Farndon, on the road from his residence, Flintham-hall; most of them wearing rose-coloured favours.

Lord Lincoln was accompanied by Sir R. Bromley, Bart., Mr. J. E. Denison, M.P. (whom his Lordship displaced as representative of the county 14 years ago), Mr. J. M. Sutton, Major Warrand, Mr. Handley, Mr. Neville, Mr. E. Bristowe, and other gentlemen of the neighbourhood.

After the various preliminaries had been gone through, and the High Sheriff, Mr. Francis Hall, of Park-hall, had asked a full and fair hearing for all,

Admiral Sir R. H. Bromley, Bart., came forward and nominated the Right Hon. Henry Pelham Clinton, Earl of Lincoln, as a candidate to represent this division of the county.

Mr. J. M. Sutton, of Kitham-hall, seconded the nomination.

Mr. W. H. Barrow proposed T. B. Hildyard, Esq., which nomination was seconded by Mr. George Storer. Considerable confusion ensued.

Mr. E. Denison, M.P., then addressed the electors. He said that he stood there to support Lord Lincoln might require some explanation, both for the sake of the noble Lord and for his own. When Lord Lincoln wrote to ask for his support, he had answered, that if Lord Lincoln had come to his old office to ask for re-election on the ground of the Corn-laws, he had made up his mind, though not entirely approving of the Government measure, to give Lord Lincoln, without a reservation and without a word, his cordial support. But as Lord Lincoln came in the new and responsible office of Secretary for Ireland, entertaining the strong opinions which he (Mr. Denison) entertained on certain points of policy, both as regarded Church and State affairs in Ireland, he could not offer the noble lord, at all events, an entire and cordial support without some explanation, in the first instance, as to the views with which Lord Lincoln entered on that office. He (Mr. Denison) asked for no promise and no pledge; it would have been unworthy of him to have asked, or of the noble Lord to have granted. He had had a conversation with the noble Lord on Irish affairs, with which he was entirely satisfied, and if convinced that the noble Lord would enter on those high duties in a spirit of firm and liberal policy, he at once assured him of his cordial good wishes and earnest support. (Cheers.)

Lord Lincoln then came forward. The noble Lord said, "I appear here to plead my cause before you; and if it be true that when a man pleads his own cause he is but a feeble and insufficient advocate, it is a great chance I may fail in the task I have undertaken. For I will not conceal from you that in this contest are involved the best and dearest interests of my life—that in your hands you hold the jewel which I have ever held as above price—that it is in your power to bestow it, and that it is in your power also to withhold it from me. If you bestow it upon me you confer upon me one of the greatest obligations one of the highest and proudest gratifications I could possibly receive. If, on the contrary, you withhold it from me, you can inflict upon me as heavy a blow and as deep a wound as it is in the power of any body of my countrymen to inflict upon me. It was a proud moment of my life when, 14 years ago, I accepted of the prize, the value of which has been increased by my subsequent long possession of it. And I again tell you that to retain it would be worthy of any sacrifice but one—but that I could not, in order to retain it, act in opposition to my conscientious conviction of what is right. (Cheers.) But I would not, in order to obtain your favour, or to conciliate a popularity that I have, notwithstanding, never undervalued—I would ot, for purposes of temporary moment, act in variance with what I believe to be the best interests of the country, and in opposition to your real and permanent welfare." (Cheers.) His Lordship then went on to say: At the close of December last, a meeting of the Nottinghamshire Protection Association was held—an association that he had always declined to belong to—at which his attendance was requested. On account of the respectability of the parties composing that association, he should have wished to attend that meeting, and state the course he intended to take in the debates then about to commence. But, as a sworn servant of the Crown, he could not come down and prematurely announce to that association the decision which the Ministers were not entitled to announce till the opening of Parliament. A meeting of the association was held a few days after the meeting of Parliament. He was then in a different situation, and, in a letter that he wrote to the association, he succinctly and plainly shadowed forth the course which he felt it his duty to pursue. The result was, that the gentlemen composing that association passed a resolution, calling upon him to resign his seat. He should not have complained, if they had put forward the proper grounds for their demand, namely, that his opinion was not in harmony with theirs, and with that of the majority of his constituents. They demand of him that he should resign his seat, as the only step left open to him, consistent with public honour. (Hear.) That demand was unjustifiable, and he for one scorned the distinction between his publicand private honour. The change in his opinions was not of a sudden, captious, or capricious nature, whatever it might suit his purpose to say. After hearing the debates on this question in 1842, and after attentively reading the various productions of the press on both sides, he was led to doubt whether the opinions he had expressed in 1841 were as sound as he then believed them to be. Further consideration of a subject, on which he was at least as much interested as any one who heard him, convinced him that he was wrong. Accordingly, last year, when it would have become his duty on more than one occasion to address the House on this subject, he felt that he could not get up to defend the Corn-laws, and, therefore, he was silent.

A Gentleman on the platform —"Why not vacate your seat, then —"

The Earl of Lincoln said he was prepared to answer that question. He wished that the circumstances of the country might have admitted of the continuance of the then existing Corn law for another year or two, and it might have been in his power at the approaching general election to announce what he had now told them of the alteration in his sentiments. Lord Lincoln then entered upon the general question of the Corn-laws; and, after discussing the topics to which he had adverted in his previous speeches at Newark and Nottingham, the noble Lord defended the course taken by Ministers in not dissolving Parliament upon the Corn-law question. He expressed his wish to devote his energies to the amelioration of the condition of Ireland. If, by a firm and liberal policy, he could cement that country more closely with this, he should feel amply repaid for any sacrifice of private interest that he might be called on to make. He could not refrain from adverting to the position in which the country now was, compared with that which existed when the present Administration came in. We have now no foreign war, our population extended—we have no State prosecutions—nothing is heard of Chartism—we have a full exchequer and a large deficiency had been turned into a considerable surplus; we have been enabled, not only to meet every call upon us, but also to improve our defences and to promote the socia. amelioration of the people. Were these to be forgotten? and was a member of the Government that had accomplished these things to be rejected because he differed with his constituents on one question alone? ("Oh, oh!" and a laugh.) His Lordship was greeted with much cheering from his friends at the conclusion of his address, which occupied no less than two hours and a half in its delivery.

Mr. T. B. T. Hildyard said, that he presented himself on this occasion with great diffidence, not unmingled with feelings of pain, in having to oppose the noble Lord, whom he would have been most happy on any other occasion to have supported. They were most of them aware that it was with the utmost reluctance he had come forward to offer himself as a candidate on this occasion; nor should he have consented unless he had been convinced that the great majority of the electors were opposed to the Ministerial project for an alteration in the existing Corn-laws. He should not have come forward had any other candidate been found to advocate the cause of Protection. Was the case of introducing a cheap loaf if there was no money to purchase it with? This measure would not not only be injurious to the agricultural interest; it would likewise affect the tradesmen, who, in this borough, were in a great measure dependent on the country gentlemen and farmers, with whom they would be involved in the general ruin. Such a picture was too horrible even for contemplation. And with whom did the measure originate? From the very men whom they sent to protect their interests, and whom in 1841, they enabled to overthrow the Whig Ministry. They had heard of the famine hanging over Ireland; but what would the repeal of the Corn-laws do for Ireland in replacing the common food of the Irish labourer?

The High Sheriff then called for a show of hands, which was in favour of Lord Lincoln by at least three to one, and the election was declared to be in his Lordship's favour.

Mr. Barrow demanded a poll, and the Court broke up, after having lasted nearly six hours.

The polling commenced on Tuesday. At the close of the poll on that day the numbers were stated to be thus:—According to Lord Lincoln's Committee Mr. Hildyard was in a majority of 549; according to Mr. Hildyard's own Committee, the latter gentleman had a majority of 658 over Lord Lincoln. The following are the statements of the respective Committees of the result of the gross poll on Wednesday:

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

Sending Poison in Letters.—On Wednesday, Henry Joseph Kellerby, aged seventeen, described as a printer, was indicted for sending a threatening letter, containing poison, to Miss Elizabeth Ward. The prisoner, it will be recollected, was tried in the course of the last sessions, for sending threatening letters to some females in the Borough, and one to the churchwardens of St. George's, threatening to burn down the church. Being on bail, the day before he surrendered to take his trial, he sent the letters, one to Miss Chester, aged eleven, and the other to Miss E. Ward; they both contained a white powder, which, upon examination, was found to be oxalic acid. In the latter directed to Miss Chester there were thirty-five grains, and in the other, fifty. The latter letter he declared his determination to murder Miss Ward; if he could not do it by poison, he would cut her throat. The prisoner was tried, but the evidence not being sufficient, he was acquitted, and was ordered to be detained by the Court. While in Newgate he wrote a long letter, directed to his brother, in which he admitted that he was the writer of the letters; that he had been in the habit of reading romances to any trash, and he thought he could become a mysterious hero. If he should escape, he would never act so foolishly again. The prisoner made no defence, and called no witnesses. Mr. Justice Williams summed up, and the Jury found him "Guilty," with a recommendation to mercy. Mr. Justice Williams sentenced him to twelve months' hard labour.

The Attempted Parricide at Berkford—Thomas Lowe, 73, shoemaker, was indicted for felonously cutting and wounding John Lowe, with intent to murder him; and in other counts the prisoner was charged to be unlawfully and maliciously to do him some grievous bodily harm. Mr. Ballantine prosecuted, and Mr. Payne defended the prisoner. This was a case of a distressing character, the prisoner and the prosecutor standing in the relationship of father and son to each other. It would appear that they had both together carried on the business of shoemakers, at Bradford, but early in January there had been some misunderstanding between them, and they separated. On the 16th of January the prisoner went to his son's shop, to ask for some of his tools that he had left behind, and he opened at the time very improper conduct; and, while the prosecutor was in the act of stooping down to look for the tools, the prisoner stabbed him in the side with a knife, and then rushed into the street, and inflicted a severe wound on his own throat with a razor. After this the prisoner Guilty of a common assault, and he was sentenced to six months' imprisonment.

Charge of Arson.—John Stone (aged 53), paper maker, John Stone, the younger (aged 24), labourer, and Ann Ryce (aged 60), were, on Thursday, indicted for feloniously setting fire to a certain dwelling-house, the property of George Lennard, with intent to defraud the Union Insurance Company. The evidence was very circumstantial and voluminous; but as all the material facts of the case have been recently published in the newspapers, it is unnecessary to detail it account on the present occasion. The prisoners refused to put any questions to the various witnesses. The Jury, after a short consultation, returned a verdict of Guilty against John Stone, the elder, and acquitted John Stone, the younger, and Ann Ryce, the other prisoners. The elder prisoner was then tried on a second indictment arising out of the same circumstances, and found guilty. The other two prisoners having been removed from the bar, Mr. Baron Parke, after remarking on the enormity of the offences of which the prisoner, John Stone, the elder, had been convicted, sentenced him to be transported for 20 years beyond the seas for the first offence, and 20 years' transportation for the second offence, the second sentence to commence at the expiration of the first. The sentence amounted to transportation for 40 years.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1846.

The signal defeat of Lord Lincoln in South Nottinghamshire is beyond all question a triumph for the Protectionists; their best battle-field is evidently in the counties; the aptitude for conversion so remarkable in the Representatives, has not been exhibited by the Constituencies, who are out of the reach of Treasury Bench influences, and to whom the breaking up of a "great party" is of less consequence than the breaking up of that system which the very same party taught them to rely upon as the only safeguard of their prosperity. Without sharing all the apprehensions felt in the counties of the consequences of the Government policy, we can appreciate the strong determination of the farmers to hold fast by that which they believe to be good; they are much firmer to their creed than those who taught it them so long and so successfully. The rejection of two of the Ministry, by two great constituencies, is a damaging misfortune, even though in both cases there may be peculiar circumstances which will partly account for it. It will embolden the opposition to the Ministerial measure, particularly in the House of Lords, where its success is much more doubtful than in the Commons. In fact, it is beginning to be thought not quite an impossibility, that even now the plan may there have to undergo some change, and come back to the lower House in the shape of a compromise, making a fixed duty a fixed one, lower than at present, and varying. Three years ago, a low fixed duty might have been carried, if the Landed Interest would have accepted it; they would gladly take it now; but it is doubtful whether any Government that could be formed would propose it. Sir R. Peel will hardly alter his present plan; and, if any amendment should be carried in the Lords, and rejected in the Commons, there will be no alternative but a dissolution. The Protectionists would be glad of the chance of replacing the new converts by men who would defy all argument on the question. The measure would then be entirely in the hands of the people, and to their decision the House of Lords would have to bow, or the Government compelled to consent to a compromise. But a dissolution now would be a calamity. Trade and business are paralysed, as they always are by the agitation of great questions—all the vast amount of railway business has yet to be disposed of—affairs in India and America are unsettled. Great and important as the Corn-law question is, it is not the only one that affects our welfare; and a dissolution upon it alone would keep everything in suspense and confusion for months to come, to the great injury of all classes and interests. We believe that most reasonable men would prefer an immediate settlement to that appeal, even though it could only be procured by a compromise.

A collection of the letters of living statesmen would be a curious and edifying book; the correspondence between members and their constituents is often, and particularly has it been so of late, very remarkable; but no man of note has written more interesting specimens of the politico-epistolary style than Mr. Macaulay; his dating from "Windsor Castle" was long remembered, and his portrait of Lord Howick—but that is long ere it is forgotten. It was a slight but graphic sketch, boldly touched—the strokes sharp and decisive—shadow predominating. But to do the honourable gentleman justice, he is no less bold and trenchant in his style when he writes to his constituents, criticising their opinions, than in his estimates of his probable associates in office. He neither disguises, or conceals, or qualifies what he thinks. There is a cool, refreshing air of candour about his communications, that make them welcome in the present close and vitiated state of the political atmosphere. Two letters have just been published from Mr. Macaulay, to two of his constituents, which are worth attention on several accounts, for their soundness of opinion, and terse, direct way of stating it. Thus, a Mr. David Gregg has scruples about the lawfulness of war and service in the militia, and advocates Universal Suffrage; the first point Mr. Macaulay thus disposes of:—

You pay taxes, I presume, directly or indirectly. You must be aware that a large part of those taxes goes to support the regular army and navy. Now, if you may lawfully contribute to the support of a kind of force which has been, and may be employed in offensive warfare, surely you may, without any twinge of conscience, contribute to the support of a force which is, by its nature, strictly defensive, and which is not likely ever to shed a drop of blood, unless danger of the most fearful kind should come near to our own hearths. I persuade myself that your scruples do not go to such a height that you would hold yourself morally bound to see Edinburgh sacked by invaders, without striking a blow for your home and family. Now, the militia is meant to be peculiarly a security against invaders. It is not an instrument of aggression. You must, therefore, admit it to be, as compared with the regular army, an innocent institution. If, then, you refuse to pay anything towards the militia, while you are paying the soldiers and sailors who have just been fighting at Buenos Ayres, I must say that you strain at a gnat and swallow a camel.

If Mr. Gregg has any doubts left on the subject after this, it is his own fault, not Mr. Macaulay's; as to the suffrage, before consenting to give it, the Member for Edinburgh asks, how will it be used? In the petition presented by Mr. Ducombe in 1842, says the honourable gentleman—

Some hundreds of thousands of Chartists asked for the franchise, and told us how they meant to use it. They avowed that their objects were national bankruptcy, confiscation of the soil, of canals, of railroads, of machinery—in short, the destruction of all property. I was firmly convinced, and am firmly convinced, that such measures would produce indescribable misery to the great majority of the petitioners themselves. I refused them the franchise, not from disregard of their interests, but from the same feeling which would lead me to refuse a razor to a man who told me that he wanted it in order to cut his throat.

There is nothing doubtful or undecided about this either, and while so many politicians are explaining their opinions, past and present, and avowing themselves open to the effects of time and conviction, something fixed and settled is a luxury. On another subject Mr. Macaulay has also written; in common with others he has been asked to support a petition for the pardon of Frost and Williams; on what grounds such a pardon can be asked for we cannot conceive, and Mr Macaulay puts the matter in its true light in his answer to the Secretary of the Committee who sent the petition; his letter is short, and we give it entire:—

Albany, London, Feb. 16, 1846.

Sir—I cannot agree with you in thinking that the law has, as respects Frost and his accomplices, been thoroughly satisfied. Consider what they did, and what they have suffered. They raised a rebellion, which no one will to have been unpunishable—led thousands of ignorant labouring men into guilt and danger—fired on the Queen's troops—wounded a magistrate in the discharge of his duty—caused the deaths of several unhappy creatures—and would, if their attempt had not been stopped in the outset, have caused such a destruction of life and property as has not been known in England for ages. This is their offence. What has been their punishment? Transportation for about five years—a lighter punishment than has been inflicted on many poor lads for picking pockets. You disclaim very properly all projects of insurrection. But only on that there will be insurrections enough, if turbulent and designing men are apprised that the penalty of raising a civil war is henceforth to be less than the penalty of robbing a hen-roost. Thinking this, I cannot hold out any hope that I shall vote for any address in favour of these great criminals.

I have the honour to be, Sir, your faithful servant, T. B. Macaulay.

REPORTED DEATH OF MADAME CASTELLAN.

To the Editor of the Illustrated London News.

Having seen a statement in your valuable paper of Saturday last, to the effect that a person had stated to me his having been present at the funeral of Madame Castellan, at St. Petersburgh, I think it due to yourself and the public, to inform you that I never, directly or indirectly, stated such a circumstance, nor have I ever had the slightest reason for believing that such an event had taken place

Your obedient servant, John Mitchell, Director of the French Plays.

POSTSCRIPT.

DEPARTURE OF HER MAJESTY FOR THE ISLE OF WIGHT. Her Majesty and the Prince Albert left town early yesterday morning, and the South Western Railway, for the Isle of Wight.

CABINET COUNCIL.—A Cabinet Council, which was attended by Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, the Earl of Aberdeen, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir James Graham, Mr. Gladstone, and all the other Cabinet Ministers, was held at the Foreign Office yesterday at two o'clock.

HOME MINISTERIAL CHANGES. Sir George Clerk, it is stated, will proceed immediately to Calcutta. Major-General Sir George Pollock retires from the Council on account of his health.

ELECTION MOVEMENTS.—It is rumoured that Lord Lincoln is to be brought into the House of Commons for the borough of Carrickfergus, the present member retiring for the purpose; and that Sir John Owen is to vacate his seat for Pembroke in Mr. Gladstone's favour. Mr. Baillie Cochrane, who has accepted the Chiltern Hundreds, offers himself again for Bridport.

THE Dowager Countess of Scarborough died on Tuesday, in the 80th year of her age.

THE ANNUAL DINNER in aid of the Building Fund of the Butchers' Charitable Institution took place at Willis's Rooms, St. James's, on Tuesday last. The members of the trade, with their ladies and friends, enumerated about four hundred. The musical arrangements and the refreshments gave universal satisfaction; and the stewards will, doubtless, have the additional satisfaction of presenting a very handsome amount of profit to the Building Fund of their valuable Institution.

THE EXPLOSION AT DOVER. The investigation relative to this sad catastrophe (an account of which appears elsewhere), involving so deplorable a loss of life, was commenced on Thursday, at twelve, before Mr. Thompson, the Borough Coroner, and a JURY of 13 householders, in the Lord's-room attached to the town terminus of the Dover Railway. The names of the sufferers, and their respective ages, as handed to the Coroner by Mr. Way, the station-master, are as follows:—Joseph Hambrook, aged 34, left a widow and one child; William Sweden, aged 23, a widow: Thomas Hutton, aged 52, a widow and no family; Cook, 36, left two children; John Russell, single man; John Pearson, widow and seven children; Isaac Hughes, 28, single man; John Wilson, widow; Edward Rack, 38, widow and two children; John Kendall, 24, single man; William Richards, 30, widow; and Joseph Wills, 30, widow and two children; the last-named deceased survived the accident a few hours. He died in shocking agony at nine o'clock on Wednesday evening. The JURY having been duly empanelled on the twelve bodies, evidence was given by several witnesses, but it gave no additional information upon the subject, and the inquiry was adjourned.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS

FRANCE.—Few Paris papers were published on Wednesday, the preceding day, Shrove Tuesday, being strictly kept. The French bar has experienced a great loss by the death of M. Philippe Dupin, the celebrated advocate, who died at Pau, on the 14th of the month, after a long and painful malady.

THE BRAZILS. Rather important news has been received from the Brazils, by her Majesty's packet, Express. That vessel left Rio on the 9th of January. She brings mail from the River Plate, but we have news from Monte Video, and Rio Grande, of December 23rd. The combined fleet, after repairing damages, had ascended the Panama without further opposition, and on the 5th December had opened their mouths above Rosario. The arrival of the 49th and 73rd Regiments had rendered the inhabitants of Monte Video secure from any attack from Orbe's force. Colonel Silveira, with the entire department of Maldonada, had deserted from Rosas. Garribaldi had routed Lavalleja, and captured his family and baggage. Uruguina had been twice driven from before Salto. Buenos Ayres is said to be full of deserters. Paraguay had joined Corientes against Rosas, and 6,000 men from Paraguay had joined Paz, who had been appointed to the command of the forces. Lopez, the President of Paraguay, had declared war against the Dictator of Buenos Ayres by a very bellicose proclamation. The Exchange at Rio upon London was 26½ to 27 pence, upon Paris 356, upon Hamburg 760.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

HER MAJESTY'S DRAWING ROOM.

Her Majesty held her second Drawing-room for the season at St. James's Palace, on Thursday, which was very brilliantly attended. The finness of the weather had the effect of attracting a great concourse of persons to St. James's Park.

The Queen and Prince Albert, attended by the great officers of the household, left Buckingham Palace about two o'clock, and were loudly cheered, as the Royal cortège passed along to St. James's.

The Foreign Ambassadors, Great Officers of State, the Cabinet Ministers, and numbers of the nobility and gentry, arrived early.

The Drawing-room was very numerously attended.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY EVENING. (From our own Correspondent.) Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent will leave town on Saturday morning, and arrive at Frogmore to luncheon. Her Royal Highness will remain, it is expected, at Frogmore until after the accouchement of her Majesty, which has been definitively arranged to take place at the Castle. The visit of the Court to Osborne House will not be prolonged beyond seven or eight days, Instructions to that effect having been communicated to the members of the Royal household.

THE TUTOR OF CAMBRIDGE'S BIRTHDAY. Tuesday was the birthday of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge. The Royal Highness arrived in town from his residence at Kew. His Royal Highness Prince Albert arrived at Cambridge House in the afternoon, to pay a visit of congratulation to the Royal Duke on this auspicious event. The members of the diplomatic corps, and many of the nobility and gentry called during the day at Cambridge House, and left their names for his Royal Highness. His Royal Highness's tradesmen illuminated their houses in the evening. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester gave a dinner party in honour of the occasion, in the evening, at her residence, Gloucester House.

APPROACHING MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE. A marriage is said to be in contemplation between the Hon. Spencer Lyttelton, brother of Lord Lyttelton, and the Hon. Miss Dawson, one of the Maids of Honour to her Majesty.

PARTY DINNERS. Her Majesty gave a Dinner-party on Wednesday, at Buckingham Palace. The Council was attended by H. R. H. Prince Albert, the Lord President, the Lord Privy Seal, the Commander-in-Chief, the First Lord of the Treasury, the Secretaries of State for the Home and Colonial Departments, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the President of the Board of Trade, the Postmaster-General, the Secretary at War, the Lord Steward, the Lord Chamberlain, the Master of the Horse, and the Groom of the Stole to Prince Albert. At the Council, the most Honourable James Marquis of Abercorn, and the Honourable James Archibald Stuart Wortley were, by command of the Queen, sworn of her Majesty's Most Hon. Privy Council, and took their respective places at the board.

THE EARL OF MAR.—The Earl of Mar was seized with a fit of apoplexy at Mar House, on Wednesday (last week), and is not likely to recover. The Earl has no family, and at his demise the Earldom falls back to his uncle, who labours under the deprivation of sight.

COUNTRY NEWS.

EXTRAORDINARY MEETING OF HAMPSHIRE LABOURERS.

The late cares of Hampshire have imitated those of Wiltshire and some other counties. The Hampshire agriculturists met on Monday, at the Castle Tavern, Basingstoke, William Chase. The object of the meeting, as stated in the handbills announcing it, was, "to describe their state and condition, under Corn Law protection."

The meeting was held in the yard of a man named Wilford, who is not a farmer, but a general dealer. Two "lifting carts," or carts covered over with hoops and sacking, formed the hustings. It was reported that the chair would be taken at five o'clock, but it was not occupied until long after six. The number in attendance was variously estimated at from 800 to 1,500. They were mostly dressed in clean white smock frocks; and evidently, by their demeanour, they showed that they did not meet merely for an exhibition, but under a solemn sense of duty. Several of them had left their homes, many miles distant, in order to be present. In the early part of the day the rain fell in torrents, and the summer was industriously spread that the meeting would not be held: but the labourers would seem to be thrown of Love guard. Candles in lanterns having been supplied for the reporters, and a few torches being lighted, a labouring man, named Jessy Burgess, was called to the chair, on the motion of William Cobbett, labourer, from Droxford

Mr. Ekless (timber-merchant, of Barlesdon-bridge) stated that the aged chairman was the man whom Cobbett was accused of having flogged to death. This charge was made when Cobbett was candidate for Coventry; to which town Jessy, at once started, and standing in the hustings, exclaimed, "Here I be; I be alive Jessy Burgess as you say was killed by William Cobbett. God bless him." (Loud cheers and laughter.)

The chairman said as he had been made a chairman, he hoped he should be a good one; and that if their object was right it would be carried out.

James Biddle (a labourer from Droxford) proposed the first resolution, declaring that they had not the means of living. The resolution was couched in terms both as to fact and speaking peculiar to the district. The speaker said, Last week I got but a week, and there was seven of us. That's a week, and now there be eight of us. True 'tis, I pay no house rent. We want 8s. 3d. for bread, that's for seven gallons. This left us 1s. 10d., and we'd that how are we to buy meat, clothes, strong beer, or any luxuries for we (Cheers); there be 6d. a week for schooling, because I send three of the young ones to school (loud cheers); there is 3d. for yeast, and there be six gallons of bread. Where be the 6s. 6d. gone to this? Where be the shoes—the stockings—the tea—the sugar? The meat I dare not think of. (Loud cries of "it's true," and "we know it.") As a mother I'll tell you all I know, and that is, that I have often, whilst suckling a child, gone to bed upon a bit of bread for the day. (Cries of indignation.) We have often had to go supperless for seven or six, with half an ounce of tea and a quarter of a pound of sugar for the week. (Cries of "ago, aye.") I come here to say, if the [illegible] away with the Corn laws we'll do good, let us have it [illegible] resolution that they were in a starving state, was then unanimously carried amidst cheers.

[illegible] addressed the meeting. Her husband had been [illegible] and from the parish she received 3s. in money. She had to pay "fifteen," said she, "have I gone to bed with an empty belly, and if you can do us any good by this Corn-law repeal, pray let us, for God's name have it." (Loud cheers.)

Sarah Tytheredge: I have six children, and my husband is ill. If he were well, he would have nine shillings a week.

(This woman told a tale similar to the others who had preceded her. Her family and herself must have starved this winter, if it had not been that some kind people had trusted her for food upon the mortgage of her summer earnings.)

Mary Hillyar said her husband was a shoemaker, and could work none. They had eleven children, but some were out, which made the family ten will. herself and her husband. For five months they had not had even a potato. (Great sensation.) They all knowed that, for ten years, she had never been out of sickness in her house. She had it now, and had no parish re She had no money—that was out of the question with her.

Peter Barfoot said he had 3s. to live upon during the whole month of January.

A petition was then agreed upon to the Houses of Parliament. It prayed for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn-laws, with the hope that such a measure would lead to an immediate advance of wages, by increasing the demand, and lessening the extent of farms, and, also, by rendering farming investments more secure. The petition expressed, further, a hope that the repeal of the Corn-laws would lead to an adjustment of the tithe question, and to various other great reforms. The petition was unanimously agreed to. Three cheers were given for Mr. Cobden, three for Mr. Bright, three for Ekless, and three for the labourers of England, when this extraordinary meeting quietly separated.

FATAL EXPLOSION AT FOLKESTONE. LOSS OF THIRTEEN LIVES.

On Thursday, at noon, twenty men employed in extending the sea wall of the [illegible] stone, for which means of obtaining the Corn-laws, with the hope that such a mea sure would lead to an immediate advance of wages, by increasing the demand, and lessening the extent of farms, and, also, by rendering farming investments more secure. The petition expressed, further, a hope that the repeal of the Corn-laws would lead to an adjustment of the tithe question, and to various other great reforms. The petition was unanimously agreed to. Three cheers were given for Mr. Cobden, three for Mr. Bright, three for Ekless, and three for the labourers of England, when this extraordinary meeting quietly separated.

IMPORTANT VICTORIES
BY THE
BRITISH TROOPS IN INDIA.

The Overland Mail has brought highly interesting details of the three actions which took place on the 18th, 21st, and 22nd, of December, between the British troops and the Sikhs. An outline of some of the engagements was brought by the previous Overland Mail, received at Trieste, and appeared in our paper of the 7th ult.

The conflicts took place at Moodkee and Ferozeshah, about 20 miles from Ferozepore.

The Sikhs having passed the Sutlej in great numbers on the 12th, 13th, and 14th of December, proceeded to attack the post of Ferozepore, which was held by Sir John Littler, with about 7,000 men. After some feints, the Sikh army, finding the Governor-general and the Commander-in-Chief were hastening to support the Ferozepore division at the rate of 30 miles per day, moved off to intercept them.

In the evening of the 18th, the Governor-General, with the British army, after a long march, had reached Moodkee, and encamped, when the Sikh army, 50,000 strong, came hurrying forward, and attacked. A short but severe conflict ensued; the Sikhs retired, leaving their guns to the British. Amongst the killed was General Sir John M'Caskill. Sir Robert Sale was wounded, and died subsequently

The 19th and 20th were spent by both armies in burying their dead, and in procuring reinforcements.

Sir John Littler, at the head of 5,000 men, joined the British on the 21st, about 16 miles from the camp. The British army then formed itself into four divisions, the right under the command of Sir Hugh Gough, the centre commanded by Major-General W. R. Gilbert, the left by Sir J. Littler, and the rear by Sir Harry Smith. The Sikhs were commanded by Tej Singh, and had formed intrenchments in a jungle country, which rendered the march of infantry exceedingly difficult. The Sikhs have long been remarkable for their artillery; they were provided with heavy guns, which did great execution. Sir J. Littler failed in his attack on their position. General Gilbert was successful. The first position of the enemy was taken: the darkness of the night prevented the continuance of the conflict. The British troops bivouacked on the ground. The Sikhs found on, where the Commander-in-Chief and the Governor-General had taken their station, and they opened a heavy fire on it. The British troops rose up, and drove them off.

On the morning of the 22nd the fight was renewed, and General Gilbert stormed several parts of the enemy's position, although every effort had been made during the night to strengthen it. Thirty large guns were taken. The British soldiers afterwards began to collect their wounded, and to bury the dead; when large bodies of cavalry and of the camel corps, with swivels, attacked them. The British Artillery and Cavalry had retired towards Ferozepore, but the infantry drove the enemy back three several times at the point of the bayonet. The contest of the 22nd appears to have been carried on by General Gilbert and by the Governor-General, who headed the centre. The Sikhs, from their acquaintance with the country, possessed great advantages, of which they profited to the utmost. They worked mines before their intrenchments, and in their front position, which they blew up on the approach of the British, and destroyed hundreds.

The action of the 21st and 22nd is called the battle of Ferozeshah, and is looked upon as one of the severest ever fought in India. The British troops have earned the highest praise for their courage. It caused dismay among the majority of the turbulent Khalsa soldiery. Some of them attempted to fortify their positions between Ferozepore and Hureeka Ghat, the principal passage of the river on the Lahore; but they soon abandoned them. Tej Singh, their commander, had an interview with the Governor-General, who refused to enter into any terms until the British were under the walls of Lahore. Tej Sing retired with some of the Sikhs to an island, where he was threatened by the British and by his own countrymen. At length the whole of the Sikhs retired from the British territory, and on the 31st December the Governor-General issued a proclamation, calling upon the natives of Hindostan, in consequence of the unprovoked hostilities of the Lahore Government, to quit the service of the common enemy and report themselves to the British authorities.

The conduct of some of the protected Sikh chiefs having been found culpable, they have been severely punished. The Rajah of Futteala was hanged on a tree for treachery. The Rajah of Ladwa, on the 4th of January, approached Loodiana, where he burned the European barracks: but it was expected that he would be driven back.

The Sikh troops having been disappointed of their plunder, and driven out of the British territory, doubts are entertained of their uniting to fight another battle. A party under Runjoor Singh has approached Loodiana, as if desirous of plundering there, but nothing was known of the results of their movements. The Queen-Mother, has it is said, encouraged the troops to fight in order to get rid of their turbulent rule.

It was reported at Bombay at the departure of the Mail that the Governor-General had resolved to maintain his position within the British territory, and not to make any attack on the Sikhs until the expedition against Moultan, which was preparing in Scinde, under the orders of Sir Charles Napier, had begun operations.

THE LATE MAJOR-GENERAL SIR ROBERT SALE.—(SEE MEMOIR, PAGE 147.)

Such is the outline of the brilliant but disastrous actions which have taken place, in which so many brave officers have been killed. We give these particulars in order that our readers may understand fully what has taken place: but of the actions themselves, the best opinion will be formed by the following Official Despatches, which were published in an Extraordinary Gazette on Tuesday.

INDIA BOARD, Feb. 23, 1846.

A despatch, from which the following is an extract, has been this day received, at the East India House:—

FROM THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA TO THE SECRET COMMITTEE OF THE EAST INDIA COMPANY, DATED CAMP, FEROZEPORE, DEC. 31, 1845.

(Extract.)

The Sikh army, in large numbers, commenced crossing the Sutlej on the 11th, and, after investing Ferozepore on one side, took up an entrenched position at the village of Ferozeshah, about ten miles in advance of Ferozepore, and about the same distance from the village of Moodkee.

In this camp the enemy had placed 100 pieces of cannon, some of large calibre, with a force exceeding 50,000 men, for the purpose of intercepting the approach of the British force moving up from Umballa, to the relief of Ferozepore, which had been thus treacherously attacked, without provocation or declaration of hostilities.

I had ordered, on the 8th inst., that portion of our army posted at Umballa for defensive purposes, to move up on the 11th; and, after a rapid march of 150 miles, it reached Moodkee on the 18th, where, on the evening of the same day, it repulsed an attack of the Sikh army, and captured 17 guns. On the following day the army was concentrated at Moodkee, and, on the 21st, moved by its left on Ferozepore, and having on the march formed its junction at half-past one o'clock with the 5000 men and 21 guns, under Major-General Sir John Littler, which had moved from Ferozepore that morning, the Commander-in-Chief formed the army in order of battle, and attacked the enemy's entrenched camp, and on that evening and the following morning, captured 70 pieces of artillery, taking possession of the enemy's camp, with large quantities of ammunition and warlike stores.

These successful and energetic operations have been followed by the retreat of the Sikh army to the other side of the Sutlej; the British army being now encamped between Ferozepore and the fords of the Sutlej.

You will not fail to observe that these important and brilliant successes have been achieved by that portion of our army posted at and in advance of Umballa, for the defensive purposes, and that our forces from Meerut and other stations from the rear, ordered to move up at the same time, are in reserve, and will reach this neighbourhood between the 5th and the 9th of January.

I have the honour to enclose two reports from the Commander-in-Chief, detailing the admirable manner in which these important duties have been performed; and I am convinced that the Court of Directors of the East India Company, in concurrence with her Majesty's Government, will highly appreciate the eminent services rendered by the Commander-in-Chief, and by the officers, non-commissioned officers, and soldiers of the Indian Army.

The Commander-in-Chief has successfully accomplished every object I had directed him to effect for the relief of Ferozepore, and the protection of the British states. No accident or failure has occurred during the complicated operations of a combined movement; and our army, whether for defence or attack, has shown, as heretofore, that its power is irresistible.

FROM GENERAL SIR HUGH GOUGH, BART., G.C.B., THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF OF THE ARMY IN INDIA, TO THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA.

Head-quarters, Army of the Sutlej, Camp, Moodkee, Dec. 19, 1845.

Right Hon. Sir,—It would be a superfluous form in me to address to you a narrative of the campaign which has opened against the Sikhs, and the successful action of yesterday, since you have in person shared the fatigues and dangers of our army, and witnessed its efforts and privations, but that my position at its head renders this my duty; and it is necessary, from that position, I should place these events on record, for the information of all Europe, as well as of all India.

You, sir, know, but others have to be told, that the sudden and unprovoked aggression of the Sikhs, by crossing the Sutlej with the great proportion of their army, with the avowed intention of attacking Ferozepore in time of profound peace, rendered indispensable, on our side, a series of difficult combinations for the protection of our frontier station, so unjustifiably and so unexpectedly menaced.

From the advanced and salient situation of Ferozepore, and its vicinity to the Sikh capital, its defence against a sudden attack became a difficult operation. It was always possible for the Sikh Government to throw a formidable force upon it before one sufficiently numerous could on our side be collected to support it: but when, upon the 11th inst., it became known at Umballa, where I had established my head-quarters, that this invasion had actually taken place, the efforts to relieve it followed each other in rapid succession; notwithstanding I had the fullest confidence in Major-General Sir John Littler, commanding at Ferozepore, and in the devotedness and gallantry of the troops occupying it.

The troops from the different stations in the Sirhind division were directed to move by forced marches upon Bussean, where, by a most judicious arrangement, you had directed supplies to be collected, within a wonderfully short space of time.

The main portion of the force at Loodiana was withdrawn, and a garrison thrown into the little fortress there. From this central position, already alluded to, both Loodiana and Ferozepore could be supported, and the safety of both places might be considered to be brought, in some measure, within the scope of the contingencies of a general action to be fought for their relief.

All this is now related; but most harassing have been the marches of the troops in completing this concentration. When their march had been further prolonged to this place, they had moved over a distance of upwards of 130 miles in six days, along roads of heavy sand; their perpetual labour allowing them scarcely time to cook their food, even when they received it, and hardly an hour for repose, before they were called upon for renewed exertions.

When our leading corps reached Wudnee, a small jaghire of the late Maharajah Shere Singh, its garrison shut the gates of the fort against them; and, as our battering guns were far in the rear, it was determined to reserve it for future chastisement, and we remained content with compelling the village to furnish supplies (it could, however, provide little, except for our overworked cattle), under pain of enduring a cannonade and assault: this it did, without the necessity of firing a shot.

When we reached Wudnee, it was evident that the force before Ferozepore felt the influence of our movements, as we heard that a very large portion of that force had been detached to oppose our further advance: their feeling parties retired, on the morning of the 18th, before our cavalry pickets, near the village and fort of Moodkee.

Soon after sunrise, the division under Major-General Sir Harry Smith, with the brigade of that under Major-General Sir J. M'Caskill, and another of that under Major-General Gilbert, with five troops of horse artillery, and two light field batteries, under Lieutenant-Colonel Brooke, of the Horse Artillery (brigadier in command of the artillery force), and the cavalry division, consisting of her Majesty's 3rd Light Dragoons, the body guard, 4th and 5th Light Cavalry, and 9th Irregular Cavalry, took up their encamping ground in front of Moodkee.

The troops were in a state of great exhaustion, principally from the want of water, which was not procurable on the road, when, about three, P.M., information was received that the Sikh army was advancing; and the troops had scarcely time to get under arms, and move to their positions, when the fact was ascertained.

I immediately pushed forward the horse artillery and cavalry, directing the infantry, accompanied by the field batteries, to move forward in support. We had not proceeded beyond two miles when we found the enemy in position. They were said to consist of from 15,000 to 20,000 infantry, about the same force of cavalry, and 40 guns. They evidently had either just taken up this position, or were advancing in order of battle against us.

To resist their attack, and to cover the formation of the infantry, I advanced the cavalry, under Brigadiers White, Gough, and Macfier, rapidly to the front, in columns of squadrons, and occupied the plain. They were speedily followed by the five troops of horse artillery, under Brigadier Brooke, who took up a forward position, having the cavalry then on his flanks.

The country is a dead flat, covered at short intervals with a low, but, in some places, thick jhow jungle, and dotted with sandy hillocks. The enemy screened their infantry and artillery behind this jungle, and such undulations as the ground afforded; and, whilst our twelve battalions formed from echellon of brigade into line, opened a very severe cannonade upon our advancing troops, which was vigorously replied to by the battery of horse artillery under Brigadier Brooke, which was soon joined by the two light field batteries.

The rapid and well-directed fire of our artillery appeared soon to paralyse that of the enemy; and, as it was necessary to complete our infantry dispositions without advancing the artillery too near to the jungle, I directed the cavalry under Brigadiers White and Gough to make a flank movement on the enemy's left, with a view of threatening and turning that flank, if possible. With praiseworthy gallantry, the 3rd Light Dragoons, with the 2nd brigade of cavalry, consisting of the body guard and 5th Light Cavalry, with a portion of the 4th Lancers, turned the left of the Sikh army, and, sweeping along the whole rear of its infantry and guns, silenced for a time the latter, and put their numerous cavalry to flight.

Whilst this movement was taking place on the enemy's left, I directed the remainder of the 4th Lancers, the 9th Irregular Cavalry, under Brigadier Macfier, with a light field battery, to threaten their right. This manœuvre was also successful.

Had not the infantry and guns of the enemy been screened by the jungle, these brilliant charges of the cavalry would have been productive of greater effect.

When the infantry advanced to the attack, Brigadier Brooke rapidly pushed on his horse artillery close to the jungle, and the cannonade was resumed on both sides. The infantry, under Major Generals Sir Harry Smith, Gilbert, and Sir John M'Caskill, attacked in echellon of lines the enemy's infantry, almost invisible amongst the wood, and the approaching darkness of night. The opposition of the enemy was such as might have been expected from troops who had everything at stake, and who had long vaunted of being irresistible. Their ample and extended line, from their great superiority of numbers, far outflanked ours; but this was counteracted by the flank movements of our cavalry. The attack of the infantry now commenced; and the roll of fire from this powerful arm soon convinced the Sikh army that they had met with a foe they little expected; and their whole force was driven from position after position with great slaughter, and the loss of 17 pieces of artillery—some of them of heavy calibre; our infantry using that never-failing weapon, the bayonet, wherever the enemy stood. Night only saved them from worse disaster, for this stout conflict was maintained during an hour and a half of dim starlight, amidst a cloud of dust from the sandy plain, which yet more obscured every object.

I regret to say this gallant and successful attack was attended with considerable loss. The force bivouacked upon the field for some hours, and only returned to its encampment after ascertaining that it had no enemy before it, and that night prevented the possibility of a regular advance in pursuit.

I beg to congratulate you, right honourable sir, on this first defeat of our invaders by the army I have the honour to command. The perseverance by which success was attained you personally witnessed; and the troops, I am sure, felt proud of the self-devotion with which their Governor-General exposed himself to every danger amongst them. I before said that our loss has been severe; it could not be esteemed small if we had no other to record, when I mention that, towards the conclusion of the affair, Major-General Sir Robert Sale, to whom India and England are so much indebted, had his left thigh shattered by a grape shot, and that the wound has since proved mortal. Sir John M'Caskill, an old and valued officer, who has done his country much good service, received a ball through his chest, on the advance of his division, and immediately expired. Brigadiers Bolton and Macfier, and Lieutenant-Colonels Bunbury and Byrne, and other valuable officers, are amongst the wounded. These losses our country and the service will deplore, but not consider unavailing, when Ferozepore shall be rescued from the invader, and the insult to our territory and rule fitly punished.

I have every reason to be proud of, and gratified with, the exertions of the whole of the officers and troops of this army on this arduous occasion; with the conduct and dispositions of the generals of divisions, the brigadiers of the several arms, the general, personal, divisional, and brigade staff, and the commanding officers of regiments; but this despatch is necessarily completed in the utmost haste, and in the midst of most important operations, —I must, therefore, reserve to a future opportunity the pleasing task of bringing especially and by name to the notice of Government the particular merits of individual officers.

I cannot, however, refrain from expressing my deep sense of obligation to the heads of the two principal departments. Major General Sir James Lumley was unfortunately prevented by severe sickness from taking part in the active duties of this great crisis. Major Grant, Deputy Adjutant General, therefore supplied his place, and it is my duty to say how ably this has been done, and how great a loss I have endured by being deprived, for the present, of his services, in consequence of two wounds which he received whilst urging on the infantry to the final and decisive attack of the enemy's batteries. Neither must I fail to record the valuable aid which has upon this, as on a former campaign, been afforded me by the Quarter-Master General, Lieutenant Colonel Garden; his departmental arrangements demand my highest commendation. Major General Sir Harry Smith having been appointed to the command of a division the charge of his office as Adjutant General of her Majesty's Forces devolved upon Lieutenant Colonel Parr, who, not only in the performance of these duties, but in every way in which assistance can be rendered in active operations, has been to me a most valuable staff officer.

I have to thank you, right honourable sir, for having placed at my disposal the services of the officers of your staff, and to thank them for the valuable assistance they afforded me on this arduous day. It shall be my pleasing duty to mention them individually, with the officers of my own personal staff, in the recommendation list I shall have the honour of forwarding, at an early date, to Government.

I have, &c.,

H. GOUGH, General, Commander in-Chief.

FROM HIS EXCELLENCY THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF TO THE RIGHT HON. [illegible] VISCOUNT HARDINGE, VICE-REGENT OF IRELAND, &c.

I have again to congratulate you on the success of our arms. A grand battle has been fought against the Sikh army at this place, and, by the blessing of Divine Providence, victory has been won, by the valour of our troops, against odds and under circumstances which will render this action one of the most memorable in the page of Indian history.

After the combat of the 18th at Moodkee, information was received the following day that the enemy, in increased numbers, were encamped in force at Feroze-shah. A line of defence was taken up in the advance of our encampment, and dispositions made to repel the assault, but the day were away without their appearing, and at night we had the satisfaction of being reinforced by her Majesty's 80th Foot, and the East India Company's 1st European Light Infantry, with our small division of heavy guns.

I must have allude to a circumstance most favourable to our efforts in the field. On this evening, in addition to the valuable counsel with which you had in every emergency before favoured me, you were pleased yet further to strengthen my hands by kindly offering your services at such an important season in my army. I need hardly say with how much pleasure the offer was accepted.

On the morning of the 21st the offensive was resumed; our columns of all arms debauched by four miles on the north-east, bringing the enemy to view that the one by, posted in great force, and with a most formidable artillery, had remained since the action of the 18th, incessantly employed in entrenching his position instead of advancing to the direct attack of which I had given him the option. I manœuvred to their right: the second and fourth divisions of infantry in front, supported by the first division and cavalry in the second line, continued to defile for some time out of cannon shot beyond the Sikhs and Feroze. The desired effect was not long delayed; a cloud of dust was seen on our left, and, according to the instructions sent to him on the preceding evening, Major-General Sir John Littler, with the third division, attacked the enemy's camp, was discovered in full march to unite his force with mine. The junction was soon effected, and thus was accomplished one of the great objects of all our harassing marches and privations, in the relief of this division of our army from the blockade of the numerous forces by which it was surrounded.

Dispositions were now made for a united attack on the enemy's entrenched camp. We found it to be a parallelogram, of about a mile in length, and half a mile in breadth, including within its area the strong village of Ferozeshah; the sandy ridge looking towards the Sutlej and Moodkee, and the longer towards Ferozepore and the open country. We moved in two lines—Littler's on the left, Gough's on the right of which was like the Sikh position in Moodkee, covered with [illegible].

The Division of [illegible] Littler, Brigadier Wallace (who had succeeded Major-General Sir John M'Caskill), and Major-General Gilbert, deployed into line, having in the centre our whole force of artillery, with the exception of three troops of horse artillery, one on their flank and one in support, to be moved as occasion required. Major-General Sir Harry Smith's division, and our small cavalry force, moved in second line, having a brigade in reserve to each wing.

I should here observe that I committed the charge and direction of the left wing to Lieutenant-General Sir Henry Hardinge, while I personally conducted the right.

A very heavy cannonade was opened by the enemy, who had dispersed over their position upwards of one hundred guns, more than forty of which were of battering calibre; these kept up a heavy fire, chiefly directed on the positions of our far less numerous artillery, of much lighter metal, checked in some degree, but could not silence. Finally, in the face of a storm of shot and shell, our infantry advanced, and were furnished with ample opportunities to prove themselves upon the guns, and, with matchless gallantry, wrested them from the enemy; but, when the batteries were partially within our grasp, our infantry had to sustain a most destructive fire from the Sikh infantry, scarped behind their guns, that, in spite of the most heroic efforts, a portion, only, of the entrenchment could be carried. Night fell while the conflict was everywhere [illegible].

Although I now brought up Major-General Sir Harry Smith's division—and he came up, and, long retained another point of the position, and her Majesty's 29 Light Dragoons made charges, and took some of the most formidable batteries—the enemy remained in possession of a considerable portion of the great quadrangle, [illegible] our troops, intermingled with them, kept possession of the remainder, and ally kept upon it, covered by their gallant officers, [illegible] killed.

[illegible], suffering extremely from thirst, yet animated by an indomitable [illegible]. In this state of things the long night wore away.

Near the middle of it, one of their largest guns was advanced, and played with deadly effect upon our troops. Lieutenant-General Sir Henry Hardinge immediately formed her Majesty's 80th Foot, and the 1st European Light Infantry [illegible] led to the attack by their commanding officers, and gained the [illegible] positions by Lieutenant-Colonel Wood (aide-de-camp to the Lieutenant-General) [illegible] was wounded in the contest. The 80th captured the gun, and the enemy, [illegible] fire, fled from the field, and were [illegible] to press on further. During [illegible] night, however, they continued to harass our troops by fire of artillery, [illegible] or moonlight discovered our position.

But with daylight the [illegible] distribution. Our infantry formed a line, supported on both flanks by horse artillery, whilst a fire was opened from our centre by such of our heavy guns as remained effective, aided by a fight of rockets. A masked battery played with great effect upon this point, dismounting our pieces, and blowing up our tumbrils. At this moment, Lieutenant-General Sir Henry Hardinge placed himself at the head of the left, whilst I rode to the head of the right wing.

Our line advanced, and, unchecked by the enemy's fire, drove them rapidly out of the village of Ferozeshah and their encampment; then, closing front to it left, on its centre, our force continued to sweep the camp, bearing down all opposition, and dislodged the enemy from their whole position. The line then halted, as if on a day of manœuvre, receiving its two leaders as they rode along its front with a gratifying cheer, and displaying the captured standards of the Khalsa army. We had taken upwards of 73 pieces of cannon, and were masters of the whole field.

The force assumed a position on the ground which it had won, but even here its labours were not to cease. In the course [illegible] Sirdar Tej Sing, who had commanded in the great last battle, brought up from the vicinity of Ferozepore fresh battalions and a large fell of artillery, supported by 40,000 Ghorepurrus, hitherto encamped. Against these troops I was drove to [illegible] cavalry parties, and made tremendous efforts to regain the position at Ferozeshah; this attempt was [illegible] but its failure had scarcely become manifest, when the Sirdar renewed the [illegible] with some troops which had not been engaged. He commenced [illegible] on our left flank; and when this was frustrated made such a demonstration against the [illegible] village as compelled us to change our whole front to the right. [illegible] during this manœuvre, undaunted on a dreadful fire, whilst [illegible] ammunition being completely expended in these protracted combats [illegible] unable to answer him with a single shot.

I now directed our [illegible] cavalry to threaten both flanks at once, preparing the infantry to advance in support, which apparently caused him sudden to cease his fire, and to abandon the field.

[illegible] 24 hours no a Sikh has appeared in our front. The remains of the Khalsa army are said to be in full retreat across the Sutlej, at Nuggurpurthar and Hurike, or marching up its left bank towards Hurreekeepurthur, in the greatest confusion and dismay. Of their chiefs, Bahadur Singh is killed; Lal Singh said to be wounded; Mehtab Singh, Adjodhih Parshad, and Tej Singh, the late Governor of Peshawur, have fled with precipitation. Their camp is the scene of the most awful carnage, and they have abandoned large stores of grain, camp equipage, and ammunition.

Thus has apparently terminated this unprovoked and criminal invasion of the peaceful provinces under British protection.

On the conclusion of such a narrative as I have given, it is surely superfluous in me to say, that I am, and shall be to the last moment of my existence, proud of the army which I had the honour to command on the 21st and 22nd instant. To their gallant exertions I owe the satisfaction of seeing such a victory achieved, and the glory of having my own name associated with it.

The loss of this army has been heavy; how could a hope be formed that it should be otherwise, when thirty thousand men this force stormed an entrenched camp, defended by an enemy, and sustained two considerable combats with the enemy. Within four days he has dislodged from their positions, on the left bank of the Sutlej, 60,000 Sikh soldiers, supported by upwards of 100 pieces of cannon, 108 of which the enemy acknowledge to have lost, and 94 of which are in our possession.

In addition to our losses in the battle, the captured camp was found to be everywhere protected by charged mines, by the successive springing of which many brave officers and men have been destroyed.

I must [illegible] to the [illegible] in these actions by the whole of the regiments of her Majesty's service employed, and the East India Company's 1st European Light Infantry; the native force seconded in a most spirited manner their gallant conduct.

To Lieutenant-General Sir Henry Hardinge, my second in command, my warmest thanks are due, not only for his personal exertions, which were conspicuous to all, but for the assistance he afforded me through all the eventful scenes of this well-fought action. To the general and my personal staff, I feel deeply indebted for their unceasing exertions. Major-General Sir Harry Smith, Gilbert, and Sir John Littler, and Brigadier Wallace (who nobly fell in the hour of victory), fully realised the high expectations I had formed of their conduct as leaders of divisions.

With the Brigadiers, the Commandant of Artillery, and the Chief Engineer, the Commanding Officers of Regiments, and with the Departmental Staff, I was also greatly pleased; their exertions were most unremitting, and highly praiseworthy.

The reports I have received from the Generals of Divisions of Infantry, the Brigadiers of Cavalry, and the Commandant of Artillery, speak in the highest terms of their respective Staff; and it is my intention, as soon as possible, to forward to you, right honourable sir, a list containing the names of all the officers I have just enumerated, together with the names of all those who appear to me specially to merit approbation and favour.

The hurried manner in which I am forced to collect information, and prepare these numerous details, may, I fear, cause the omission of the names of some officers well deserving of notice; but I shall not fail to send in a supplementary list when I can assure myself of their individual merits, as it would be most painful to me to feel that I had not done justice to any one of the brave men who shared with me the glorious dangers of this day's combat.

I beg now to mention the conduct of an illustrious nobleman, Count Ravensburg, who, with the officers of his suite, Counts Gresben and Orsola, did us the honour to accompany the force during our operations. They were present at Moodkee, and in this great battle. It is with the greatest pleasure and sincerity I can bear my testimony to their gallant conduct on these occasions, worthy of the high reputation of their countrymen, and of the most ancient regime of one of them. I lament to add that Dr. Hoffmeister, the medical attendant on the Count, was killed in the action of the 21st inst.

I have the honour to enclose the report of Lieutenant-General the Right Hon. Sir H. Hardinge, second in command.

I have the honour to be, &c., H. GOUGH, General,
Commander-in-Chief, East Indies.

FROM LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR HENRY HARDINGE, G.C.B., TO HIS EXCELLENCY GENERAL SIR HUGH GOUGH, BART., G.C.B., COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF INDIA, DATED CAMP, FEROZEPORE, DEC. 22, 1845.

SIR,—I have the honour to report to your Excellency, that, when the army under your command had formed its junction with the forces from Ferozepore, under Major-General Sir John Littler, and was drawn up in order of battle, on the 21st inst., I proceeded with the two left brigades, commanded by Colonels Wallace and M'Leod, to attack the enemy's intrenched position at Ferozeshah.

The line advanced with great steadiness, notwithstanding the nature of the ground, intersected with jungle. When the troops had cleared these impediments, and had opened out into the plain, they continued to press on, without a check, under a very heavy fire of grape and musketry from the enemy's batteries, and having borne down all opposition, entered the enemy's camp, and captured the guns in their front.

The portion of the camp was soon after on fire, compelling the troops to desist from their attack of the remainder, and, as it was now dark, the troops formed on the ground, nearly on a line with the burning camp. From that period the fire of musketry and cannon have been very severe, and an incessant fire from the enemy's guns, the darkness of the night being illuminated by the explosion of mines, tumbrils, and shells.

I need not dwell on the events of this night, so remarkable in military history, because your Excellency witnessed them, and, with me, admired the fortitude and resolution of these brave men, ready to encounter any danger, although harassed by fatigue and suffering from thirst.

I have personally reported to your Excellency my admiration of the conduct of her Majesty's 80th Regiment, and the 1st European Light Infantry, in charging with the bayonet under Lieutenant-General Sir Harry Smith to their arms and charge a battery, which bore destructively on our ranks. Lieutenant-Colonel Bunbury, assisted by Lieutenant-Colonel Wood, my aide-de-camp, led the attack, on which every officer was wounded or killed. The gun was spiked, the [illegible] driven away with loss, and this part of our line left undisturbed for the remainder of the night. Their conduct in the preceding part of the action came under my observation, and under your Excellency's observation.

[illegible] ing formed the troops before day-light, led the right of the attack, intrusting the left to me. The whole line instantly advanced, and, animated by your example, carried everything before them, and, having traversed the camp, from one extremity to the other, drew up in a perfect line, expressing, by loud cheers, as we rode up the line, their conscious pride that the victory was theirs.

I again most cordially congratulate you on the brilliant success of the army under your Excellency's command.

It is now my duty to report to your Excellency, that Major-General Gilbert, commanding a portion of this division of the army, gave me the greatest satisfaction.

Colonel Wallace fell bravely at the head of his troops.

Colonel M'Leod led his brigade with his accustomed judgment and resolution.

My own personal staff having been all disabled, with the exception of one most dear to me, and who still remained by my side, I derived, on the morning of the 22nd, the most valuable aid from Lieutenant Colonel Birch, Judge-Advocate-General, from Lieutenant-Colonel Parsons, and from your Excellency's intelligent and brave aide-de-camp, Captain West. These officers, riding several paces in front of the line, regulated the advance, animated the men, and prevented any unnecessary firing.

I have great obligations, during the whole of these operations, to Colonel Benson, a member of the Military Board, and acting as my aide-de-camp, who has rendered me important service in the field, and in whose cool judgment and experienced ability I place great reliance.

My aide-de-camp, Lieutenant-Colonel Wood, has shown all the qualities which make a good officer.

I beg to bring to your notice my aide-de-camp, Lieutenant Hillier, who is wounded; and Lieutenant Peel, of the 37th Native Infantry, acting aide-de-camp, who is slightly wounded. Captain Scarlet, of the Quartermaster-General's Department, attached to my camp, also accompanied me, and I recommend him as a very promising officer.

I have also recommended the officers belonging to the Political Agency of these provinces who acted as my aides-de-camp—Captain Abbott and Lieutenant Lake—and are both wounded. Captain Mills, acting aide-de-camp, took the command of a troop of Horse Artillery, with his usual zeal.

It is now with great pain that I have to record the irreparable loss I have sustained, and more especially the Last India Company's service, in the death of Major Broadfoot, Agent to the Governor-General. He was thrown from his horse by a shot, and I failed in preventing upon him to leave the field. He remounted, and shortly afterwards received a mortal wound. He was brave as he was [illegible] was always foremost where difficulties required to be overcome. I deeply regret his loss.

I have also lost a most promising and brave officer by the death of Captain Patton, on the night of the 18th, at Moodkee.

Lieutenant Munro, of the 10th Light Cavalry, my aide-de-camp, a most amiable and excellent officer, I have also had the misfortune to lose, whilst placed by my General's order to bring up the rear.

Captain Hore, Assistant Military Secretary, and a valuable officer, acting as my aide-de-camp, was killed about the same time as Major Somerset received his wound.

I have now to request your Excellency's notice to the conduct of an illustrious nobleman, Count Ravensburg, who, with the officers of his suite, Count Gresben and Count Orsola, accompanied me in the field. These Prussian officers nobly sustained the reputation of their countrymen.

The Prince's surgeon was struck to the ground by a ball. I saw his Royal Highness instantly spring from his horse to his assistance. The Prince's humanity was unavailing; death had already closed the surgeon's eyes.

I am aware of the respectful regard which your Excellency entertains for this illustrious nobleman and his companions, travellers as they [illegible] and I know that this brief record of their actions will be gratifying to your Excellency.

I have, &c.,
H. HARDINGE.

FROM MAJOR GENERAL SIR JOHN LITTLER, TO THE ADJUTANT GENERAL OF THE ARMY, DATED FEROZ POR, DEC. 23, 1845.

SIR,—In pursuance of instructions received from the Right Honorable the Governor-General, under date the 20th instant, I marched out of my position at Ferozepore at eight a.m. on the 21st instant, with the corps as per margin,* leaving the defence of the cantonments to the 63rd Regiment Native Infantry, under the command of Lieut. Colonel Hearsey, and that of the town to the 57th Regiment Native Infantry, under Lieut. Colonel Carnegy, together with detachments of Sappers, and half a field battery in the town, and 2nd company (reserve) of Artillery in the entrenchments.

I effected a junction with the troops under the personal command of his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, and, agreeably to his instructions, moved into position, in order of battle, on the left of the army, on the 21st inst., the [illegible] advance in line was very steady, and the approach to the enemy's works made under a most galling and destructive fire. The casualties in the ranks were awful. The troops, however, still moved on with great firmness and resolution, and approached the enemy's battery to within about 150 yards, when I considered the prize to be within their grasp.

Brigadier Hicks I fixed upon the order to charge, supported by the left or Brigade of the Honourable T. Ashburnham's Brigade. This charge was commenced with such determined gallantry and spirit, that the result seemed certain. The enemy, however, having great confidence in their guns, continued to serve them with extraordinary activity, and to make such [illegible] in our ranks, as to cause an immediate pause and hesitation in her Majesty's 62nd Foot, which of course had a most effect on the native regiments on the left, notwithstanding all our exertions to induce them to advance by cheering and encouraging them, pointing at the same time to the short distance which they had to proceed when the day would be won for their own. It was all in vain, and they retired out of fire, to where her Majesty's 9th Foot and 2nd Regiment Native Infantry were drawn up in reserve. A part of the 14th Regiment Native Infantry, with their colours, accompanied the two regiments, and entered the enemy's batteries.

At this period it was nearly dark; and, as I had heard that the divisions on the right had also been unable to obtain an entrance, I [illegible] it for the night to join them.

On the following morning, I obtained information of the right division having been directed to renew the attack, and I moved to co-operate, as might be necessary. I then received orders to wait until further instructions, and was moved up to the town and directed to hold it. The result of this attack was most glorious to the British army, and I heartily congratulate his Excellency and the Governor-General on the happy termination of probably one of the most sanguinary engagements that ever took place in India.

With the conduct of the troops in general, under me, I was much gratified; their patience and perseverance in marching through [illegible] day, exposed to the sun and want of water, must have, no doubt, in some measure weakened their energies, but they, notwithstanding, evinced great firmness and resolution in advancing to the attack, and bore down every further impediment, and was hurled up to the town and directed to hold it. The result of this attack was most glorious to the British army, and I heartily congratulate his Excellency and the Governor-General on the happy termination of probably one of the most sanguinary engagements that ever took place in India.

With the conduct of the troops in general, under me, I was much gratified; their patience and perseverance in marching through [illegible] day, exposed to the sun and want of water, must have, no doubt, in some measure weakened their energies, but they, notwithstanding, evinced great firmness and resolution in advancing to the attack, and bore down every further impediments exposed for several months past by Sikh emissaries, have evinced their loyalty to the British Government in a most remarkable manner, not a single desertion having taken place since the enemy crossed the Sutlej, that has come to my knowledge. They have maintained the character of the Bengal army in display- the courage and bravery under a heavy fire

I have much pleasure in bringing to the favourable notice of his Ex- the Commander-in-Chief the services of those zealous and indefatigable officers, Brigadiers T. Reed, the Hon T. Ashburnham, D. Harriot, commanding Cavalry, and E. Hathwaite, commanding Artillery, whose cool courage throughout the attack was conspicuous. To the several Commanding Officers of regiments and divisions, Lieut.-Colonel Gardiner, commanding 14th Regiment Native Infantry; Lieut.-Col. Brooke, commanding 16th Regiment Native Infantry, who lost his arm in the action; Major Wake, commanding 44th Regiment Native Infantry; Major Short, commanding her Majesty's 62nd Foot; Major Pearson, commanding 24th Regiment Native Infantry; and Captain Sanderman, commanding 33rd Regiment Native Infantry; I feel much indebted for the spirited and gallant manner in which they brought up their respective regiments during the attack.

It is with sincere regret that I have to report for his Excellency's information the death of my Aide-de-Camp, Lieutenant Harvey, of her Majesty's 50th Foot, a very promising and intelligent young officer, and devoted to his profession. He was shot during the advance, in the act of cheering on the men, when within about 250 yards of the enemy's works. His death will be a loss to the public service, and deplored by his friends and relations.

Of Captain Egerton, my Assistant Quarter-Master-General, whose activity and zeal were conspicuous, I cannot speak too highly; he was severely wounded on the morning of the 22nd.

It is with much gratification that I also submit for his Excellency's consideration, and acknowledge the obligation to Major P. Innes, my Deputy-Assistant-Adjutant-General, and Captain Burnett, Major of the Brigade, for their faithful and able exertions throughout the affair, as well as for their able assistance on all occasions.

Lieutenant Goodwyn, of the Engineers, has proved himself a most zealous and indefatigable officer during the whole time that the Sikh army has been opposite Ferozepore, as well as on the evening of the 21st, during the engagement, and whom I beg to recommend to his Excellency's notice.

To Captain W. B. Thomson, Commissariat Department, who accompanied me, and to Lieutenant W. Fullerton, superintending the Sudder Bazaar, who volunteered his services as my aide-de-camp, and was particularly useful to me in the field, I feel indebted.

Captain Nicolson, late Assistant Governor-General's agent, and Colonel Van Courtland, late of the Sikh service, who were placed at my disposal by the late Major Broadfoot, C.B., afforded me every assistance in their power during the engagement and previously, when the Sikhs first crossed the Sutlej.

I have, &c.,

M'jor-General Commanding Infantry Division.

FIRING THE TOWER GUNS.

On Monday night, at ten o'clock, the Park and Tower guns were fired, in honour of the achievements of the British arms, recorded in the present Journal. The night was fine, and the scene at the Tower has been effectively illustrated by one of our artists. So unexpected was this soul announcement at so late an hour, that it was generally misunderstood, and at first supposed, by many loyal subjects, to refer to another joyful event.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

SIR ROBERT HENRY SALE, G.C.B.

Among the many brave men who have perished in our last Indian conflict, is Sir Robert Sale, whose name is connected with the whole of the military history of the East—from the days of Seringapatam, down to the conflict in which, after more than half a century of service, he has found a soldier's death. Sir Robert Henry Sale was the son of Colonel Robert Sale, of the East India Company's service, and was born in India, on the 19th September, 1782. At the early age of fourteen, he had the honour of carrying his Majesty's colours, as an Ensign in the 36th Foot, to which he was gazetted on the 24th of February, 1795. Within two years from that time he was advanced to the rank of a Lieutenant, and immediately proceeded to India.

In the course of the next year he exchanged into the 12th, and served with the army that Lord Harris commanded at the battle of Malavelly, which memorable action took place on the 27th of March, 1799. Again, on the 4th of May, in the same year, we find his name mentioned with honour as having been much distinguished at the siege of Seringapatam, although still a subaltern. He served throughout the whole of the campaign of 1801, under General Stevenson; yet it was not until the month of March, 1806, that he became a Captain, being then in the 24th year of his age.

In little more than three years from that time, he married Florentina, daughter of the late George Wynch, Esq. Within a few months after his marriage, we find that he formed part of the army which, under the command of Colonel Chalmers, stormed the Pyrenean lines; and again, under General Abercromby, he aided in the capture of the Mauritius. Notwithstanding the activity and the efficiency of Captain Sale, his promotion proceeded slowly; he had passed through a distinguished career of eighteen years before he reached the rank of a field officer, his majority dating rate in the year 1813. The regiment to which he belonged was the 2nd battalion of the 12th; and that having been reduced in the year 1818, Major Sale was placed upon the half-pay list.

After three years of inaction, he exchanged into the 13th Light Infantry, and with that regiment proceeded in 1823 to the scene of his early services; and once more we find him engaged in the military operations then going forward in India under Sir Archibald Campbell. He was present at the capture of Rangoon, in May, 1824, and in many of the subsequent operations of that war; the gallantry and ability of his exertions gaining for him the honour of special notice in the general order.

The rank of Lieutenant-Colonel was conferred upon him on the 2nd of June, 1825; on the 1st of November following, he distinguished himself in command of the 1st Brigade, repulsing the Shauns and Burmese at Prome, and attacking the lines and heights in the neighbourhood of that place on the succeeding day. He received a severe wound on the 18th of January, 1826, in storming Malown, or Melloon; but his gallant conduct was immediately acknowledged by the Commander-in-Chief, and he was presented with the badge and riband of a Companion of the Bath. On the 28th of June, 1831, he became a Colonel by brevet.

The advance throughout the campaign in Afghanistan was confided to the 1st Bengal Brigade of the Army of the Indus, and from October, 1838, the command of this fine force was held by Sir Robert Sale. He likewise led the detachment of 2,500 men who were sent to Girishk in May, 1839; and on the 23rd of July he commanded the gallant band which stormed and carried the fortress of Ghuznee. A sabre-wound in the chin, and musket-balls in the left arm and shoulder, were by Sir Robert the results of this formidable conflict; but not the only results, for his services were suitably acknowledged in the general orders of Lord Keane, and her Majesty conferred upon him the local rank of Major-General, with the star of a Knight Commander of the Bath; while Schah Soojah-ul-Mouk added his name to the list of those Eastern knights who constitute the Order of the Dourance Empire.

His subsequent career—his subjugation of the Kohistan country —his capture of Dost Mahommed—his defence of Jellalabad —his receiving the thanks of Parliament— and, lastly, amid the disasters of Cabul, his heroism of himself and his admirable wife —are so well known and familiar to our readers, that it becomes unnecessary here to repeat the brilliant narrative. He returned with Lady Sale to this country at the close of that war, and they were everywhere received with demonstrations of honour and respect. He had attained an age, at which, from his wounds and length of service, he might have well retired from an active military life, and sought the repose so congenial to advancing years; but he was devoted to his profession, and again embarked for India, again commanded the Sikh field force that advanced upon the Sutlej, and there died in battle, falling, like Sir J. Moore, almost in the moment of victory. Towards the close of the action, he was struck by a grape shot on the left thigh, which was so dreadfully shattered, that he did not long survive his wound.

SIR JOHN M'CASKILL, K.C.B.

This is another of the recent triumphant deaths upon the plains of Moodkee. Sir John M'Caskill entered the army in 1797, and rose, through the various gradations of rank, to be a Colonel in 1838. He was also a Major-General in India. During the course of his distinguished career, Sir John served at the landing of Porto Rico and the siege of St. Lucia, in May, 1797. He was present at the siege and capture of Forts Sattarah, Singhur, and Woosattah. He went to India in the fleet which was attacked by Admiral Linois, in 1809. He behaved with great valour and distinction at the reduction of Bandapore, and after the victories in Candahar he was created a K.C.B. Like his gallant companion in arms, Sir Robert Sale, M'Caskill received the thanks of Parliament, and like him also, his deeds of fame have ended in a warrior's grave. Sir John M'Caskill, who was Lieutenant-Colonel of the 9th Foot, perished at Moodkee, the 18th December, 1845.

MAJOR FITZROY SOMERSET.

Arthur William Fitzroy Somerset, another of the victims of the recent battles, was the eldest son of Major-General Lord Fitzroy Somerset, K.C.B., Secretary to the Commander-in-Chief, by his late wife, the lady Emily Wellesley-Pole, second daughter of the Earl of Mornington. Lord Fitzroy Somerset is himself the tenth son of Henry, Fifth Duke of Beaufort.

Major Fitzroy Somerset, the gallant and lamented subject of this notice, was born in May, 1816. He was a Captain in the Grenadier Guards, and Military Secretary to the Governor-General of India. After the terrible engagement of Ferozepore, the 21st Dec., 1845, the body of Somerset was found on the field of battle, on the following morning, benumbed with cold, and a most ghastly spectacle: he was still alive, and quite sensible. Medical aid was procured, but he very shortly expired.

WILLIAM HAWES.

This distinguished composer and musician was born at London, in 1785. When quite a youth he applied himself to the acquisition of music, and at nine years of age he was a chorister at the Chapel Royal; here he remained till 1801: in 1802, he joined, as a violinist, the band at Covent-Garden Theatre; and from that period down to the present time, he continued to retain a prominent and distinguished position in connection with the music of this country, either by holding public appointments, or by taking a leading part in the institution of harmonic societies, or the production of operatic entertainments. While under the direction of Braham, he first introduced to this country Weber's "Der Freyschütz"; this grand and successful achievement of his taste and knowledge, led to his also bringing out many other classical operas by Winter, Paer, Marschner, and Mozart. He was himself the composer of several popular glees, and songs, and duets. Somewhat above the usual height—gifted and much-respected musician terminated on Wednesday, the 18th instant; he died of a disease of the heart. Mr. Hawes leaves a widow and six children, one of whom, Miss M. B. Hawes, an admirable and admired concert singer, seems likely to perpetuate the fame of her father.

ROBERT ARMOUR, ESQ.

This gentleman was formerly a merchant in Old Change, London, and his own life was one of private respectability; but attention is called to his departure, from the fact that he was closely connected with a reputation that is immortal. He was the brother of Jean Armour, the wife of Robert Burns, and the "Bonnie Jean" of his poetry.

The Armours were a creditable family, in trade at Mauchline, in Ayrshire. Burns, in 1785, fell in love with the daughter, Jean, against the will and wish of the parents; he married her two years afterwards, on his appointment to an office in the Excise. To the qualities of this lady, for whom he always preserved the warmest affection, Burns thus alludes, in prose:—

"The most placid good nature and sweetness of disposition; a warm heart, gratefully devoted with all its powers to love me; vigorous health and sprightly cheerfulness, set off to the best advantage by a more than commonly handsome figure; these, I think, in a woman may make a good wife, though she should never have read a page but the Scriptures of the Old or New Testament, nor danced in a brighter assembly than a penny-pay wedding."

Burns also often celebrated his wife in exquisite verse, and some suppose that he meant for her, though avowedly written for Miss M'Murdo, that passage, one of the most famous and the most feeling in the whole range of English lyric poetry:—

As in the bosom of the stream
The moonbeam dwells at dewy eve;
So trembling, pure, was tender love
Within the breast of bonnie Jean.

Mrs. Burns died on the 26th March, 1834, in the seventieth year of her age, and was buried in her husband's grave. Her brother, Mr. Armour, the subject of this notice, was considerably her junior. He had passed his sixty-second year at the period of his demise, which occurred at Brighton, on the 9th inst.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE [illegible]. Monday the arrivals of English wheat [illegible] have been on a very limited scale, consequently the stands have to-day been scantily filled with samples. The finest parcels of both red and white moved off steadily, at very full prices; but the value of all other kinds was [illegible]. In foreign wheat [illegible] but without any improvement in the quotations. Corn under each was dull, at almost [illegible] of last week's currency. Barley [illegible] of fine malting parcels were quite as [illegible] were very difficult of sale. Beans [illegible] of fresh, at extreme [illegible] oats was dull, yet prices were [illegible] firm.

[illegible] Scottish wheat, 2120 barley, 1430 oats, 3150 [illegible]; barley, oats 2460. Foreign, wheat, 11,700 barley, —— oats, 80. Flour 2270 sacks; malt, 4020 quarters.

Tea. Only a moderate business has been transacted in this article during the present week, yet prices remain almost unchanged.

Sugar. The supply of muscovado of raw sugar on offer is by no means large, yet the sale is on a slighter basis, at barely stationary prices. Refined goods are dull, at 60s for fine, and 59s for second quality lumps. English crushes firm, at 34s 6d to 35s per cwt.

Coffee. Only private sales to-day. The public sales have been formerly limited in their description of some consumption coffee, but previous rates are supported. Good ordinary Ceylons nominally quoted at 47s to 48s, ans. low good ordinary, 46s to 46s 6d per cwt. Foreign [illegible]

Rice. [illegible] public sales are progressing well; a fair average quantity has found buyers, at [illegible]

Potatoes.—The supplies of potatoes being still on the increase, the sale for them is heavy, at [illegible]

Oils. Linseed oil steady, at full prices. In other kinds of oil, very little is doing.

Hay and Straw.—Monday to Friday, 2l 8s to 4l 4s per load; old, 2l 15s to 4l 15s; new, 1l 4s to 2l 13s; wheat straw, 1l 14s to 2l 11s, per load.

Provisions. During the present week the arrivals of Irish butter have been considerably on the increase. The finest qualities, however, are steady, at full prices, but all other kinds continue greatly at little command. On account of forward delivery, next to nothing is doing in Irish butter firm, at 72s to 76s 6d per dozen for fresh, and 56s to 60s per firkin for Kerry and Cork. Bacon is in small request at 52s to 52s per cwt for prime, and 48s to 50s for the middling quality of bacon, as other is large, across the sale for it rules dull at a further abatement of 2s per cwt. Prime singed is unaltered, and 60s to 62s per cwt. Hams are 2s to 4s per cwt lower, at 60s to 68s for small. Lard, 48s to 49s, and every 4lbs to 56s per cwt. Bale and tub middles have fallen 2s per cwt. Hams have met a slow sale, at late rates. In other kinds of provisions very little is doing.

FOOT-BALL ON SHROVE TUESDAY, AT KINGSTON-UPON-THAMES.

FOOT-BALL AT KINGSTON-UPON THAMES, ON SHROVE TUESDAY.

On Tuesday last, the ancient Shrovetide diversion of Foot-ball was played most lustily at Kingston-upon-Thames; the inhabitants of which good old town claim this pastime as a right obtained for them by the valour of their ancestors. Kingston was one of the strongholds of the Anglo-Saxons; and tradition relates that the Danes, in a predatory excursion, were stopped here by the firm stand made against them by the towns-people, until assistance arrived from London, when the enemy was defeated; and the Danish General being slain, his head was cut off, and kicked about the place in triumph. This happened on a Shrove-Tuesday; whence the origin of the custom; the foot-ball being regarded as the symbol of victory.

Foot-ball was, however, played many centuries since, at other places besides Kingston, on Shrove Tuesday; so that the above origin must be treated as a mere tradition, unless Kingston may have set the example. It has, for ages, been noted for its popular pageants, sports, and pastimes, as shown by the Churchwardens' and Chamberlain's accounts, containing entries of many payments, from money collected from the inhabitants, in support of these festivals. Among them are the Kyngham, or pageant of the Three Kings of Cologne; Robin Hood; and the May-game.

Foot-ball was played at Kingston, on Tuesday last, by two clubs, one called the Thames-Street Club, the other the Townsend. They began at eleven o'clock in the morning, and kept up the ball till five o'clock in the evening. The rule is to kick the ball throughout the town; and whichever club gets the ball nearest the meeting-place at five o'clock, wins the game. There are no stakes but the honour of victory; and the parties dine together in the evening. The poorer classes play also, for money and beer, subscribed by the townsmen. The annual game is supported by some of the wealthiest inhabitants in and around Kingston; and the majority of the Corporation are understood to be favourable to the maintenance of this old English pastime. When the ball is driven into the river, the sport is "fast and furious:" the antagonists dash into the stream, and wade about in the struggle. A few years since, when the Shrove tide was so high as to be above the arch of the bridge, one of the players leaped after the ball from the parapet into the river, and was carried by the force of the stream through the arch, but was providentially rescued on his reappearance on the opposite side.

Our Illustration of Tuesday's mimic fray in Kingston market-place, shows the scene of many an actual conflict during the Civil War; and it is remarkable that on this spot, about the middle of January, 1641—42, the Royalists made their first attempt to assemble an armed force. The handsome building in the centre of the Engraving is the Town Hall, rebuilt in a light Italian style of architecture in the year 1840, on the site of a town or moot hall of the age of Elizabeth. The figure in the southern front is a leaden statue of Queen Anne, cast in her reign. In the distance is shown the massive tower of the old cruciform church of All Saints, mentioned in Domesday Book, and doubtless of Saxon foundation; although no part of the present edifice appears to be of an earlier date than the reign of Richard II. Our artist has also shown a few of the old gabled houses with which the town abounds.

FIRE AT A SUGAR REFINERY, ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.

FIRE IN ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.

Shortly before three o'clock on Sunday morning, a fire occurred at the extensive sugar refining house belonging to Messrs. Grant and Baldwin, 17½, St. George's-place, Back-road, St. George's-in-the-East, the whole of which, together with the valuable stock, in all worth upwards of £20,000, was entirely consumed. A fire taking place in the night time is always sufficiently alarming, but the consternation created in this instance may be readily imagined from the circumstance of a large building, about eighty feet in height, one hundred feet in length, and forty in breadth, being, within an hour after the above time, one mass of flame, towering several feet above the summit, and threatening destruction to St. George's Church, and the surrounding houses. Though the sugar factory is bounded by the Back-road on the north, Cannon-street on the west, Ratcliff-highway and St. George's Church on the south and east, yet it stood so far isolated from all as to keep them from injury. There was but little wind, and that being south-westerly, the parochial church was preserved.

The engines were promptly on the spot, and there being an abundance of water, immense streams were continually thrown upon the burning pile: but the flames had got too firm a hold; the contents were of too inflammable a nature to admit of the slightest check, and the flames rushed rapidly from the basement, where the fire commenced, to the seven successive stories, until the whole mass was completely encircled in one sheet of fire; and about half-past four o'clock the roof fell in with an awful crash, partially smothering the fire, but only for a moment, as it again burst forth with redoubled fury. Subsequently a great part of the east front fell, and the south wall, with the lofty chimney, was expected to fall.

The immense stores are still partially standing, and that to the eastward, where the fire is supposed to have commenced, it is expected, contains a portion of the stock unconsumed: it is also anticipated that a portion in the lower floor may yet be recovered. The fire was not entirely subdued till nine o'clock in the morning, but throughout the day the engines were incessantly playing on the smoking ruins. The building is fully insured.

Enormous Pike. Last week, a pike was taken by Count D'Orsay, out of the River Trent, which weighed 24 lbs.

General Steam Navigation Company.—The half-yearly general meeting of this company was on Tuesday held at their office, 69, Lombard-street. The meeting was numerously attended. Mr. Wilkin in the chair. The report, which was of a very satisfactory character, was unanimously adopted, and the usual dividend and bonus declared. After which the meeting separated, highly gratified with the prosperous state of their affairs.

General Theatrical Fund. The seventh annual meeting of the subscribers to the above fund took place on Wednesday, in the saloon of the English Opera House, for the purpose of receiving the report for the past year, electing officers for the year ensuing, and also electing four annuitants on the fund. Mr. J. B. Buckstone presided on the occasion. Mr. Cullingford read the report, from which it appeared that the receipts from the establishment of the fund, which has [illegible] for the relief of distressed actors, subscribers to the fund, amounted to £459 15s. 5d. The subscription during the past year amounted to £312 9s. 4d., and the expenses to £45 19s. 7d. Of the total receipts, £2603 11s. 9d. has been invested in the funds, and a balance remains in the hands of the treasurer of £47 4s. 4d. The report of the finance committee recommended that the sum of £25 per annum each should be paid to four annuitants who had been subscribers to the fund from its commencement, and who were now in indigent circumstances. This having been adopted, and two actors and two actresses elected annuitants, Charles Dickens, Esq., B. B. Cabbell, Esq., and Mr. Sergeant Talfourd, were elected trustees.

Railway Esquires. In the course of the proceedings in the Committee on the Boston, Newark, and Sheffield Railway, on Monday, an objection was taken, that in the subscription contract after the names of two of the subscribers, of the names of Beard and Bagsley, was added the important appendage "squire." A witness was called, who proved that Mr. Beard, of Huntingford Hall, "squire," was no other than the cook in Mr. Bagsley's establishment, and that Mr. Bagsley's occupation was to transfer Mr. Beard's dishes from the cooking department to the parlour. The couple of kitchen "squires" were dressed like gentlemen when they signed the deed, and a witness who was called to speak to the respectability of their dress, and the elegance of their manners, was of opinion that even if Mr. Beard had on his white cap, and Mr. Bagsley was decked with the official shoulder-knot, he would still have considered them "gentlemen," or, at any rate, "genis." The Chairman, however, was of a different opinion, and decided that the standing orders had not been complied with, inasmuch as the two squires had assumed a designation to which they were not entitled.

SCENE FROM THE NEW FARCE OF "LEND ME FIVE SHILLINGS," AT THE HAYMARKET THEATRE.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.

The Illustration represents one of the most laughable scenes in the amusing farce of "Lend Me Five Shillings." Mr. Golightly (Mr. Buckstone) has involved himself in a duel with Captain Phobs (Mr. Tilbury), at the Assembly Rooms, through a mistaken impression of the latter, that his wife is the object of Mr. Golightly's attachment. The irascible, fire-eating nature of the Captain, and the acute misery of his luckless adversary, form an admirable contrast. The piece has been received every night with roars of laughter.

GREAT FIRE AT LIVERPOOL.

One of the most destructive fires which has lately taken place in this great commercial city, commenced about ten minutes past one on Tuesday afternoon, (the 17th inst.,) in a large warehouse in the vicinity of St. George's Dock, and in what is called the Back Goree, at the rear of a large pile of warehouses, which, about twenty years ago, were destroyed by a similar conflagration. The flames spread with amazing rapidity, and, at one time, the appearance from the Cheshire shore of the Mersey was truly grand. The fire-engines of the town were not fairly at work until nearly an hour after the fire was first discovered, so that all chance of saving the building in which it broke out was hopeless, and, consequently, in a few hours, all was destroyed. The fire-police, and those connected with the different fire offices, used every exertion to prevent the burning ruins from communicating with the adjoining warehouses; and, at three o'clock on Wednesday morning, Mr. Dowling, the head constable, left the place, it being then thought that the flames were so far subdued, that their further extension was not to be apprehended. However, at seven o'clock, they burst forth in the adjoining warehouse with great fury, ignition having been communicated, it is supposed, by the ends of the beams from one building to the other, in the upper stories, the rooms of which were covered six or eight feet deep with corn.

The warehouse in which the fire commenced, was the property of the Rev. Mr. Monk, and was heavily stored with cotton, corn, and flour. In the cellar was a large quantity of tallow and rum, which were saved by flooding them.

In one story of a building there was East India and Mauritius sugar to the value of £10,000, the property of a respectable firm, members of the Society of Friends, named Crossfield, of which not a single bag was saved.

The destruction of other merchandise has been equally great, but the owners fortunately are insured.

It is believed that the fire originated with the carelessness of some of the porters, who very culpably have been allowed to smoke in every part of the building.

Our artist has sketched the ruin, as it appeared on Wednesday afternoon; when the front of one warehouse had just fallen, and the vast piles of half-burnt cotton, resembled heaps of cinders.

According to the official return of the losses, the fires that happened on Tuesday and Wednesday, at Liverpool, were the most destructive that have occurred in the town for the last two years. The destruction of property is estimated at about £65,000. The warehouse burned down on Tuesday was insured for £2,500 in the Imperial Fire-office, and goods therein in the Royal Liverpool (a new office), Sun, Phœnix, Alliance, North British, Leeds and Yorkshire, Manchester, London Union, and London Insurance Offices. The second warehouse destroyed, (that known as Rawlinson's), also situate in the Goree, was insured in the Royal Liverpool Office for £3,700, and the contents for £3,000. The owners are insured in all the above offices, as also in the Guardian and others, their names not ascertained. The Royal Insurance Office (Liverpool) is the heaviest sufferer by the fire—to the extent, it is stated, of £20,000. The other offices are sufferers in the following proportions: Phœnix, £9,000; Alliance, £6,800; North British, £4,000; Atlas, £4,000; Imperial, £3,000; London, £3,000; Manchester, £2,000; Leeds and Yorkshire, £1,000; other offices, £5,000. The property consumed consisted of rum, coffee, sugar, cotton, tallow, Indian corn, wheat, flour, currants, &c.

NEW PAROCHIAL SCHOOL, AT CRAYKE.

This neat little parochial School-House has lately been erected at Crayke, from the design of Mr. Jones, the architect, of York, who has succeeded in giving to it, both internally and externally, some pleasing architectural features, not often to be traced in school buildings of our time. Until very lately, architects betook themselves to Greek and Roman models; apparently, forgetting how closely the olden grammar schools of Old England are associated with its brightest glories; whether they be of the worthies taught within their walls; of the active benevolence which gave rise to them; or, of the picturesque scenes in which they are generally located. Keeping this trait of association in view, we regard this instance of return to the Old English style in buildings for educational purposes to be dictated by good taste and right national feeling. In the design before us, we have the arched doorway, the high pitched roof, the loop-hole window, and the lofty bell-gable; carrying us back, in memory, to the institution of those excellent foundations, in which have been nurtured some of the brightest ornaments of our historic roll

The School-House at Crayke was opened last New Year's Day, in a manner worthy of the days of Old English hospitality. The day was begun by celebrating in the village church the appointed service—(it being the festival of the Circumcision) services calculated to awaken a careful retrospect of the past, and hearty aspirings after greater progress in the "race set before us," for the coming year. At twelve o'clock, the school room was prepared with a substantial feast of good old English fare, plum pudding and roast beef, for the children of the parish. Thirty-seven girls and thirty-five boys did ample justice to the bounty of the Rector, the Rev. Edward Churton. He himself, with his wife and family, and Dr. and Mrs. Whytehead, presided over the feast, and dealt it out to the little pupils. His blessing preceded and ended the feast. The happy children were then dismissed, and the abundant fragments distributed to poor widows. The farmers of the parish, and several friends, then dined with the Rector; and the day was thus happily passed by all grades.

The School-House, we should add, has been erected at the expense of the Rev. Mr. Churton, Dr. Whytehead, and some other benevolent individuals, for the free education of boys.

ANOTHER RESIGNATION. The Hon. Captain Gordon, M.P. for Aberdeenshire, announces to his constituents that he has seen it his duty, in reference to the present measures of Government, to take his stand on the side of Protection to the native industry of the country; and, in order to leave himself free and unfettered on the subject of the Corn-Laws, has resigned his seat at the Admiralty Board.

GREAT TROTTING MATCH FOR £100.—On Tuesday the match to trot five miles, between Mr. Russell's and Mr. Jenk's horses, was decided on Sunbury Common, in favour of the cob. The horses are much celebrated as first-rate trotters.

GERALD GAGE; OR, THE SECRET.

LD Mr. Livingstone was sitting, as usual, with a file of Indian papers before him, when the lawyer and his protégé were announced; but he arose with all the alacrity he was master of, and as much gallantry as he could assume, when he saw the young lady. In doing this, he dropt his spectacles, and Emily, with the natural deference for age of well-bred young people, stept hastily forward, and picked them up for him.

"Thank you my dear," he said, holding her hand for a moment, as he took them from her, in order to get time to look at her. "Thank you," said he again, more warmly, and shaking the hand in a manner betokening that the result of the inspection had been satisfactory. "Sit down, sit down. Well, what do you say? Do you think you could put up with the humours of a gouty old Indian like me?"

"I dare say I could, Sir," said Emily, blushing.

"At least," you are disposed to try, eh?" said Mr. Livingstone. "I don't know whether I am much worse than my neighbours," continued he, "but I know that age and India make one selfish, arbitrary, and impatient. Don't they, Nicky?" for the long habit of appealing to her made him forget she was deaf.

"What is it?" enquired Nicky.

"Mr. Livingstone is accusing himself of being selfish, arbitrary, and impatient," said Mr. Miller, who was sitting beside her.

"Oh, yes; that's true enough," answered Nicky.

"You hear!" said Mr. Livingstone to Emily, not the least offended by Nicky's sincerity, which, indeed, was one of her prime qualities in his eyes. "Does not that frighten you?"

"There are difficulties to be encountered in all situations," answered Emily; "even independence is not exempt from them."

"That's very true, my dear," said he; "very true, indeed. If that were better considered there would not be so many discontented people as there are in the world. However, it is not exactly the pleasantest thing in life for a young woman to be shut up with two old deaf people; I am very well aware of that."

"But necessity subjects people to much greater evils," observed Emily.

"Well, my dear, all I can say is, that I must endeavour to make it as much worth your while as I can, to bear with me," said Mr. Livingstone; and, after some further conversation, in which, however, the subject of salary was not touched upon, the visit terminated, and Mr. Miller, having placed Emily in his carriage, returned to hold a private conference with the old gentleman.

"Her name is Dering," said he; "she is the orphan daughter of a Colonel Dering; and was recommended to me by the sister of a very old friend of yours and mine, Miss Gage, of Bath."

This communication led to further enquiries; and the information elicited seemed to set Mr. Livingstone a-thinking. He was naturally suspicious; probably, thought he, she is acquainted with that young fellow, old Gerald's son. Who knows but this may be a plot to bring him about me? and the idea took such strong hold of him, that, much as he had liked Emily, he felt greatly inclined to reject her; but, not wishing to communicate his real reason to Mr. Miller, he dismissed him, saying he should hear from him next day.

In the meantime, the lawyer, having finished his business for the morning, returned home to dinner; and, having congratulated Emily on the favourable impression he saw she had made, and on the high salary she was to receive—no less than £300 per annum—he asked her how she liked his client, and if she were fully prepared to encounter the difficulties he had dwelt upon?

"I like him very well indeed," answered Emily. "I should think his was a very bearable sort of temper, in spite of the faults he owns to; and I am sure there is a great deal of real goodness behind it. But, what is his name? I suppose I may learn that now."

"His name is Livingstone," replied Mr. Miller. "He is the rich Obiah Livingstone—perhaps you have heard of him—one of the richest commoners in the country, I suppose."

"Indeed!" said Emily, looking aghast.

"Why, what is the matter? Why do you look so surprised?" asked Mr. Miller.

"How unfortunate!" exclaimed Emily, who saw herself plunged again from ease and affluence into all her existing difficulties; for she felt that there would be a sort of indelicacy in accepting the situation, and placing herself in such an intimate relation with Mr. Livingstone, knowing what she knew; besides, she saw at once to what suspicions she might subject herself.

"Why unfortunate?" inquired Mr. Miller.

"Because," replied Emily, "there are private reasons why I cannot accept the situation."

Mr. Miller expostulated with her; but he found it quite impossible to influence her determination, or to elicit the motive of it. She even wished to return immediately to Bath; but to this he felt too much interested in her to consent; he promised to convey her decision to Mr Livingstone, which he did by a note on the same evening; but he entreated her to remain at his house for a week or two, till he sought out something that might suit her; and seeing that he was sincere in his offers of service, she accepted his invitation and good offices.

Mr. Livingstone felt a mixture of pleasure and displeasure, when he learnt that Emily had declined the situation. He was sorry to lose her, more especially as his suspicions were entirely removed by the circumstance; but, at the same time, he felt a certain disinclination to have anybody connected with the Gage family about him, after what had happened. The cause of her refusal he never suspected, as Emily had forbidden Mr. Miller to hint whence the objection had arisen; and as the next most desirable candidate soon supplied her place, no more was thought of the matter in Portland-place.

In the meantime, Emily remained at the lawyer's. He had found no situation for her—indeed, he had scarcely sought one. His wife was an invalid; and as they had no daughter, she found Emily's society so agreeable, that after a short time they proposed her remaining there altogether, on a salary of £100 per annum. She accepted the proposal, and the arrangement suited all parties extremely well, till young Charles Miller, Gerald's friend, came home. When he heard who she was, he was extremely surprised to find her there; and still more so, when he found she could give him no intelligence of Gerald; for he was the confidant of the latter, and had long been aware of the engagement, which he mentioned to his father. "It is very odd," he said; "surely it must be broken off."

It was natural he should think so, and equally natural that, living under the same roof, and daily sitting at the same table with so attractive a person as Emily, he should become very desirous of success to his friend in her affections. But, doubtful of the actual relation in which the latter stood, he felt at a point of honour not to advance his suit; so, though he did not fail to recommend himself by such little attentions as the circumstances of the case warranted, he said nothing, but bided his time, waiting to see if Gerald would re-appear. But no Gerald came; and as he had generally an opportunity of seeing the letters that were laid on the hall table, he was pretty sure that she received none from him. So, on the strength of this apparent alienation, he ventured to throw a little more warmth into his attentions, and at length declared his suit, but it was met by a gentle refusal. Emily really felt grateful for Charles Miller was the son of a prosperous lawyer, and she saw how entirely disinterested his affection was; added to this, he was amiable and clever, and she liked him exceedingly, but she had not yet torn the image of Gerald from her heart. Perhaps it was fainter; and, certainly, the pangs that his disaffection had for some time caused were much less poignant; but the memory of his love was still dear to her, and she sometimes flattered herself that he might not be so much to blame as he appeared. Besides, even had she been free, she would have felt it an unjustifiable thing to take advantage of her situation, by allowing the son of the house to form an engagement that would, doubtless, be little pleasing to his parents. She even feared that these considerations might have obliged her to quit Mr. Miller's family; but, on her refusal, Charles again left home, and so relieved her from this difficulty. But he did not go without disclosing the secret of his attachment and rejection to his father—in whom he had entire confidence. Mr. Miller, although he would, he knew, vehemently oppose the match, was very well satisfied with the result; and one day, when Mr. Baring was enquiring what had become of Miss Dering, he told him the circumstance—accounting for her declining his son's proposal, by mentioning her engagement to the son of their mutual old friend and school-fellow, Mr. Gage. This led to some further enquiries; and, at length, Mr. Miller was induced to ask Mr. Livingstone, if he could in any way account for her having declined so advantageous a situation as the one he had offered her

"She was frightened at my stern, old, bronzed visage, or at our dearness, I suppose," replied Mr. Livingstone.

"That was certainly not the motive of her refusal," replied Mr. Miller; "on the contrary, she liked you, and expressed herself very grateful for the liberal salary you proposed, and much obliged to me for my recommendation."

"Did she know my name?" enquired Mr. Livingstone.

"Not when she came here," replied Mr. Miller: "but, in the evening, thinking the matter settled, I told her who you were."

"And then she made an objection?"

"She did," answered the lawyer, who thought that, now the transaction was over, there was no necessity for making a secret of the matter.

Mr. Livingstone comprehended the affair in a moment. He saw that Gerald had told her about the will, and that she had declined the situation from the most delicate motives. To a man of his character nothing, she could have done could have recommended her so powerfully to his good opinion. The result of his experience had been so unfortunate that he scarcely believed in the existence of disinterestedness and lofty motives, where money was concerned. He resolved to cultivate her acquaintance, and bade Mr. Miller bring her, with his wife, to dine with him. The halo of brightness with which her dignified proceeding surrounded her in his imagination even extended to Gerald. He considered that surely the man must be worthy that was loved by such a woman; and he remembered that it was a very unjust thing to punish him for Mr. Pilrig's indiscretion. Gerald could not help it, and it did not appear that he had taken any advantage of the information, even though it was clear he must be very poor, or he would not leave his intended wife in such necessity. So he determined to reconstruct a will in his favour, of course not employing the babbling Pilrig, but a stranger, avoiding Mr. Miller for the same reason as formerly, namely, the intimacy between young Miller and Gerald; being still determined that the secret should not be disclosed till his own time.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Cabinet Council. A Cabinet Council was held on Tuesday afternoon, at which all the Ministers, if not all present, at least a full Representation of Westminster.—Mr. Leader, it appears, does not intend to stand again for the representation of Westminster.

The British Museum.—By returns recently made, it appears that the annual estimated charge for the British Museum, to Lady-day next, is £34,975. The return embraces nine divisions, including the number of persons who have visited the institution for the last eighteen years. From Christmas, 1835, to Christmas, 1836, inclusive, the number was 321,151; from Christmas, 1837, to Christmas, 1838, the number was 356,008; to 1839, 380,850; to 1840, 247,999; to 1841, 219,574; to 1842, 215,218; and to 1844, an increase of 10,000 each year. No fewer than 5627 visits by artists were made in the year 1844 to the galleries of sculpture, and 8721 to the print room. It is stated, in respect to the reading room, that the number of books returned to the shelves of the general library from the reading room is 142,179; to the Royal library, 22,408; to the closets where they are kept for the use of readers from day to day, 78,470; and to the shelves of the reading rooms, about 116,400; altogether, 359,457 volumes; on the average, 1230 a day. The number of readers is 71,494.

New Suburban Parks, &c.—We understand that Government has determined upon at once carrying out some part of the report which was published two or three weeks since, and which recommended the formation of a park on the southern side of the metropolis, on the site of, and parts adjacent to, the locality now known as Battersea-fields, lying between Vauxhall-bridge and Battersea-bridge. With this view the necessary measures will shortly be taken, and a bill will be introduced in the House of Commons to enable the Commissioners of Woods and Forests to take the preliminary steps for securing possession of the fields referred to, and such contiguous parts as may be deemed requisite for the formation of this additional Royal park and great suburban improvement. The extent of ground required will be about 300 acres, consequently the greater part of the "Pleasaunce," the market gardeners' ground, the premises of the celebrated "Red House," and other places of public resort, will be required. As a further measure of improvement, it is determined that an embankment of the river, between Vauxhall-bridge and Battersea-bridge, shall be made.

IRELAND.

Barbarous Murder in the County Donegal.—One of the most barbarous and revolting murders that ever disgraced this or any other country was committed on Saturday, near the sea-shore, about five miles from Ardara, in the parish of Inishkeen, county Donegal; and, what adds to the horror of the deed is, that there is but little doubt the victim's own son and daughter-in-law were the murderers. The murdered man, who was a Protestant, and whose name was Samuel Cranmer, was nearly 75 years of age. The body of the old man was found in a lake within one hundred yards of his house. Round his body was a long iron chain, at the end of which was a heavy stone. The chain was immediately removed on having his body. His chest was literally broken to pieces, his left arm was also broken, and there were several wounds in the back of his neck and head, and one under the chin. Marks of blood were also found in one of the rooms of the house in which the Cranmers lived, and which was, for the time, used as a cow-house. The doctor who examined the body stated that any one of the wounds in the head and also the chest would have been sufficient to have caused death. It is generally supposed that the son, who is a powerful young man, got his father down and broke in his chest with his knees; and that while he was doing so, his wife was stocking him with a gaff or other sharp instrument; and that they afterwards together carried him and threw him into the lake. These, and other circumstances, all tending to implicate Cranmer and his wife, determined the magistrates to commit them.

Famine on the Western Coast. The Galway Vindicator says—"We regret to have to state that we have received various communications from parties in whose veracity every confidence can be placed, representing that there exist the most appalling prospects of a famine in a few months. The darkest, with regard to a large portion of the population of the western coast of Galway, particularly in the district of Gurumna, extending from Cashla Lodge to Letterfrack. All crops of a productive nature failed over the Connemara coast line, for the present season, passed away, and the expectations formed that by the warmth of the sun people would have, in some measure, been enabled to bear the extensive loss which they have incurred by the potato disease, have been completely disappointed."

Sir John Littler.—Sir John Littler, who was created a baronet a little time ago, is a native of Meerkee, in India, is the eldest son of Thomas Littler, Esq., by Diana, his wife, daughter of John Hunter, Esq., a director of the East India Company, and represents a family of considerable antiquity in Cheshire, where, in the Vale Royal, his ancestors were settled in the time of Edward I. Sir John Littler was born on the 6th of January, 1783; and married, the 20th of June, 1827, Helen Olympus, only daughter of Captain Henry Stewart, son of John Stewart, Esq., claimant of the Earldom of Orkney.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

CAMBRIDGE. Feb. 25

At a Congregation held this day, the following degrees were conferred:

B.D.—Rev. George Brown, St. John's College.

M.A. George James Handford, Corpus Christi College; Francis Cranmer Penrose, Magdalene College.

B.A. Richard Gregory Chalk, Trinity College; Julian John Webb Probyn, St. John's College.

Matriculations.—Frederick Thomas Rowell, Pembroke, Emmanuel College.

At the same Congregation the following grace passed the Senate:—To allow Mr. Power, of Pembroke College, to take out of the public library the manuscripts marked Dd. 11. 82; Ee. II. 3; Mm. II. 13; Mm. II. 21, under the usual bond.

HEALTH OF SIR R. PEEL.—The Times says, "We are authorised to contradict in the most explicit manner the reports which have been for some time current as to the health of Sir R. Peel. It has been said that the right honourable Baronet has not been very quietly occupied. He has not even had occasion to undergo this operation during the present Session, and his health, notwithstanding the great fatigue which he has had to undergo, has much improved since the attack of the gout which he experienced in November last. In fact, Sir R. Peel has not required any medical treatment for many weeks, and is at present in the enjoyment of his only tolerably excellent health."

THE NEW BISHOPRICK. It is rumoured that Major General Lord Saltoun, K.C.B. and G.C.H., is to have the 58th Regiment, vacant by the decease of General Sir William Clinton, G.C.B.

PARDON OF THE LOWTH MISSIONARY.—Her Majesty has granted a free pardon to John Potter, a runaway convict; and an order for his immediate discharge has been received at Newgate, from Sir James Graham.

ACCOUNTS to Dec. 27 from the Cape of Good Hope, state, that although Mr. Cloete had been appointed the Lieutenant-Governor of Natal, and the affairs of that colony were expected to become more settled, numerous parties continued to emigrate to the new village of Andries-orig-stad, about eight days' march from Delagoa.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS. Monday.

THE PROTECTION OF LIFE (IRELAND) BILL.—The Earl of ST GERMANS, in moving the second reading of this bill, expressed a hope that the details which he should lay before the House would convince their Lordships of the necessity for it. That the object of the bill was to meet the disorganised state which now existed in Ireland with powers with which it was not at present armed, in consequence of the increased amount of crime, murder, and outrageous assaults in that country. The noble Earl then proceeded to show the necessity for abolishing the necessity of the measure, to read a mass of documentary evidence, proving the increase of crime in Ireland, particularly as regarded offences against property. Hitherto of late no coercion was required to be exercised. Feeling that his responsible position as the Queen's representative in Ireland imposed upon him the duty of a representative to act on the ground of tendering his resignation, that his opinions upon a particular question were not in accordance with the general feelings of his constituents.

Mr. FERRAND followed, and made a speech in his usual caustic style of opposition to Sir R. Peel. The hon member commenced by asserting that the petitions for repeal were surreptitiously obtained, and mentioned an instance where one man had actually attached 14,000 signatures. Mr. Ferrand then made some strong animadversions upon the Ministerial converts to the repeal of the Corn-laws, asserting that the country viewed with unutterable disgust their political apostasy and tergiversation. Mr. Ferrand proceeded to say that he would ask the First Lord of the Treasury who his supporters were in that house? Were they the democratic Roebuck, the democratic Warburton, the democratic Bowring, the democratic O'Connell, who, a short time ago, was a convicted conspirator (Protectionist cheers.) "My opinion is (added Mr. Ferrand) that a great prevalence of the democratic principle would prove destructive to the institutions of the country." Should that unfortunate day ever dawn upon the political horizon when the power of democracy will be paramount, degraded, indeed, will be our fate

> Then when thou, Imperial Troy, must end,
> And they warriors fall, thy glories end

But I will add—

> Not by cold before that dreadful day,
> Shroud with a kind and honourable grave.

Mr. Ferrand then argued that there ought to be a dissolution

Mr. P. MILES suggested the adjournment of the debate until Thursday, and said that in his opinion the subject had been fully debated; and he that state of the debate he thought that the sooner they came to a division the better would the country be satisfied (hear, hear); and he did trust, if the honourable Member who had moved the adjournment of the debate (Dr. BOWRING) would undertake to move it for Thursday, that the debate at any rate would not extend beyond Friday. (Hear.)

The debate was then adjourned till Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. Wednesday.

The House met to-day at half-past four o'clock.

LORD LONDONDERRY AND THE IRISH CHURCH. Mr. STAFFORD O'BRIEN called attention to a declaration which had recently been made by Mr. Evelyn Denison on the hustings in Nottinghamshire, with respect to Lord Lincoln's opinion upon the Irish Church question. The hon. member drew the inference that Lord Lincoln was now favourable to the destruction of that Establishment (Sir JAMES GRAHAM said, most probably Lord Lincoln would in a few days be in the House, to give any explanation himself. He (Sir J. Graham) could say nothing about an alleged conversation between Lord Lincoln and a Member of that House on the subject of the Irish Church, but he (Sir J Graham) never heard that Lord J. Russell had any intention of destroying the Irish Church. —Lord J. RUSSELL said, as the hon. Member for Malton (Mr. E Denison) was not present, he would give an explanation. The Member Lord had in his mind what had taken place between himself and Lord Lincoln, but he (Lord J. Russel.) would say, that in what had passed Lord Lincoln had not given any opinion in favour of the destruction of the Irish Church. He (Lord J. Russell) thought the opinions of Lord Lincoln were perfectly honourable to him. He did not think that any thing had passed in the conversation inconsistent with the opinions Lord Lincoln had formerly held. He (Lord J. Russell) never desired the destruction of the Irish Church, although he thought a portion of the revenue was misapplied. Although he did not think the state of the Irish Church was satisfactory, yet, as a whole, he wished to see the Irish Church maintained.—Sir R. INGLIS said, in other words, after which Mr. O'CONNELL said he did not desire the destruction of the Established Church, but there was a great distinction between the Church and the temporalities. As to the temporalities, he would press upon the House the speedy alienation of them. They would never conciliate Ireland without some better alienation of these temporalities.

Mr. O'CONNELL gave notice of a motion for leave to bring in a bill to allow two members to sit for Cork, in lieu of the two late members for Sudbury.

THE FRIENDLY SOCIETIES BILL.—This bill was read a second time.—Sir J. GRAHAM intimated that, although he did not oppose the second reading, as he wished to support friendly societies, yet he must reserve the consideration of the subject. If the bill was passed for committee on Wednesday next he (Sir J. Graham) would in the meantime see Mr. Tidd Pratt. Mr. T. DUNCOMBE assented, and the committee was appointed for that day.

The London, Hounslow, and Western Railway Bill was read a second time.

The House adjourned at twenty minutes to two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS. Thursday

THE CORN-LAWS.—The Duke of RICHMOND presented a petition, numerously signed, from the Corn in Warwickshire, from persons engaged in the fishery trade, praying for protection to their trade and to agriculture. He thought the late elections proved that the farmers were unanimous against the proposed measure; and he hoped that, if, unfortunately, it should arrive at that bourne, their Lordships would exercise their constitutional privilege, and throw it out.

THE LATE EXECUTION AT MOLLINGAR. The Marquis of WESTMEATH put some questions relative to a deputation from Westmeath which had waited upon the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, to urge him to allow the law to take its course in regard to Bryan Scery.—Earl St. GERMANS read a letter from the Lord Lieutenant to Sir J. Graham, explaining the circumstances, and stating that what had taken place had not the slightest influence upon his mind. In fact, the chief object of the deputation was to represent the lawless state of the county of Westmeath. (The letter was read on Wednesday in the House of Commons by Sir J. Graham.) He (Earl St. Germans) admitted that the proceeding was altogether an unusual one, but he believed the deputation were actuated by the best motives. He was sorry that any the proceeding was a harsh one, but he admitted that it was an unusual one.

The County Works Presentment (Ireland) Bill was read a second time.

The Public Works (Ireland) Bill was read a third time.

Their Lordships adjourned at an early hour.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday.

NEW MEMBER.—Captain VERE, the new Member for the Southern Division of Northamptonshire, took the oaths and his seat.

NEW WAY. A new writ was issued for the borough of Bridport in room of Mr. Baillie Cochrane, who had accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

THE ADJOURNED DEBATE

On the order of the day for resuming the debate being moved,

Mr. ROEBUCK complained of the time which was occupied with it, and in particular, that the hon. member for Knaresborough (Mr. Ferrand) should be allowed to occupy two mortal hours in vituperation. That hon. gentleman violated decency (Cries of order, order)—order—did they cry "order" when the violent bantering language was used? If they were to consume another night in the debate, he hoped it would be by speeches of a different character, and that all swaggering in language and denouncing would be avoided. He hoped for the honour of the great Protectionist party, that such exhibitions would be avoided, for it was not by such exhibitions that their cause was to be supported, and he hoped they had something better that night than they had on the last night of the debate.

Sir R. H. INGLIS did not presume to think that the hon. gentleman was out of order, but he must say that he was showing a very inconvenient precedent. He (Sir R. Inglis) did not think it very fair or manly to attack the hon. member for Knaresborough in his absence. The hon. gentleman himself was guilty of directing personalities to hon. Members in that House.

Mr. BANKES would take that opportunity of saying that all that was said by the hon. member for Knaresborough respecting the part taken by Mr. Wilson, the Chairman of the League, in respect of protection to starch, was utterly untrue. The starch manufacturers wanted no protection; and he would tell the hon. member for Knaresborough, that there was one misfortune attending all his speeches, viz., that he was never able to substantiate his assertions, at least so far as he (Mr. B.) was aware.

Mr. COLQUHOUN thought the discussion was very irregular, and, in the absence of the hon. member for Knaresborough, very unfair; and he would leave the hon. member for Dublin that the hon. member for Knaresborough would reasonably be at his bail before.

Mr. Rose then resumed the adjourned debate on the Government Free-Trade measures, which he most warmly supported.

The other speakers were Mr. B. Denison, Mr. Cardwell, Mr. Finch, Mr. Seymer, and Mr. C. P. Villiers. The debate was then adjourned, and the House rose at half-past one o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS Friday

The County Works Presentment (Ireland) Bill went through Committee, and the Fishery Piers and Harbours (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed. Some petitions were presented, and the House adjourned at six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Friday.

NEW MEMBER.—The Marquis of Worcester took the oaths and his seat for East Gloucestershire, in the room of Mr. Charteris

ABSENCE OF MEMBERS OF THE GOVERNMENT FROM THE HOUSE. Colonel SIBTHORP had put some questions as to the absence of the Secretary of the Colonies, and of the Solicitor and Attorney-General for Ireland. He wished to know whether there was a probability of seeing these honourable gentlemen in their places. He wished to know if there was a likelihood of seeing these hon. gentlemen, or any of them, in order that important questions might be put to them. Sir R. PEEL thought there had been no want of courtesy on his part in answering questions. That, if any questions were asked, he (Sir R. Peel) would be ready to answer them. As to vacancies, the only office vacant was that of Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests. In a very few days that office would be filled up. As to the honourable gentleman's second question when two members of the Government could have seats in the House of Commons (a laugh), he (Sir R. Peel) really could not give an answer. It was true that some members of the Government were absent from the House, but he had every confidence in the policy and justice of the measures he proposed, that he was content to forego the advantage which, in ordinary times, the Crown possessed. (Cheers.)

Mr. FERRAND AND HIS ACCUSERS.—Mr. FERRAND then rose to defend himself from the attacks which he said had been made upon him by no less than four hon. gentlemen last night. He (Mr. Ferrand), however, was ready to defend and justify any statements he had ever made in that House. He had made no statement which he did not solemnly believe to be true, and he believed he should be able to establish what he had so stated. He commenced by alluding to the charge of Dr. Bowring with misrepresenting what he had said on Tuesday evening, with a view to injure him in the estimation of the working classes. He would assert that he had not misrepresented the evidence before a Committee.—Mr. C. BERKELEY could corroborate the statement as to the manufacture of petitions.—Mr. BRIGHT, after controverting the assertions of Mr. Ferrand, said that, to quote the words of a resolution of that House, the statements of the hon. gentleman were untrue and calumnious.—Dr. BOWRING then denied the statements of the hon. member with regard to the alleged cruelty of Mr. H. Ashworth

After a short conversation between several hon. members, the matter dropped.

SIR ROBERT PEEL AND MR. COBDEN.—Sir ROBERT PEEL rose and alluded to a misapprehension on his (Sir Robert Peel's) part, of an expression used by Mr. Cobden about three years ago. He regretted that the subject should now be revived, as he (Sir R. Peel) hoped that his avowal had been sufficient if it were not so, he begged to state that I had been hinted to him at the time, he should have been most happy to have made a complete avowal. He would now distinctly say that, upon the explanation given by Mr. Cobden, he had intended to withdraw, and the construction which he (Sir Robert Peel) had put upon the words used by Mr. Cobden.

Mr. COBDEN, who spoke in a low tone of voice, said that he felt at the time that the right honourable Baronet had not made the disavowal so distinct as he could have wished, but after the declaration of the right honourable Baronet that evening, he (Mr. Cobden) felt that the discussion was complete, and being so, he, on his part, would express his regret at the terms in which he (with the feeling alluded to rankling in his mind) had spoken of the right hon. gentleman. The subject here dropped.

THE ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Mr. G. BANKES resumed the debate. The hon. member condemned the proceedings of Sir R. Peel, who, he said, after he had been compelled to tender his resignation, delivered observations in his Sovereign's private capacity, for which he was not responsible to the country. He believed the right hon. Baronet would be compelled to resort to a dissolution.

The next speakers were Mr. BUCKHAM ESCOTT and Capt. GLADSTONE.

Mr. COBDEN, who was at first not audible in the gallery, complained of the speakers not having addressed themselves directly to the question before the House. The principal remarks had been upon the advantage of a dissolution, and an attack upon the Ministry: in these attacks the country would not sympathise, because that it was merely done to evade the question. In 1841 the same course was followed; and the Leaguers came in for their share. The more the Ministers were attacked, the more would the country sympathise with them, and the right honourable Baronet had actually become popular under the martyrdom inflicted upon him. It has made him a general favourite. "You wish for an appeal to the country" (continued Mr. Cobden), and if its decision is favourable, you will abide by it. If you could depend upon your principles, you would not take such a course. You should say that you will not yield to one defeat or many, but you have no confidence in your doctrine. We have heard much of protection and what is to be done there, but, recollect, there is neither spinner nor manufacturer in that other place: will that express public opinion? You want an expression of public opinion—you shall have it to-night. You talk of a numerical majority, and think that you will obtain it by an appeal to the country. I tell you that you have no chance. I would not have said so three months ago, but your party is broken up—four-fifths of the men in the north would follow the right hon. Baronet. They say there to the Free-Traders who visit them that Sir Robert Peel will give them Free-Trade at the proper time; therefore, in the present state of things you cannot get a numerical majority. Look at the

R. COBDEN, ESQ., M.P.

At the close of the long and important Debate on the Corn-Laws, attention is naturally turned more strongly than ever to the champion of the successful cause, the leader of the Free-Trade party, Mr. Cobden. The hon. gentleman has not attended the House during the greater part of the Debate, having been suffering from severe illness; but he has been frequently referred to by speakers on both sides, and on every occasion with a high degree of respect; the Ultra-Protectionists have always alluded to him in much more favourable terms than to the Premier. We have, in a former number, given a memoir of Sir Robert Peel's once great antagonist, and now great ally. Mr. Cobden sits for the borough of Stockport, for which he was elected in 1841.

RICHARD COBDEN, ESQ., M.P.

CLOSE OF THE DEBATE ON THE CORN-LAWS.

THE DIVISION.

FOR THE GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS .	337
AGAINST THEM	240
MAJORITY FOR THE REPEAL OF THE CORN-LAWS	97

The announcement was received with very enthusiastic cheering; and the House adjourned at a quarter past Three this morning.

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

QUEEN PHILIPPA INTERCEDING FOR THE BURGESSES OF CALAIS.

(See the Print of the Arts-Union Cartoon in No. 197 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS*.)*

On Women! In our adverse hour,
When lightnings flash, and tempests lowr,
When reels the fragile bark of life
Amidst the elemental strife,
Hopeless and hopeless—by its smile
Seraphic beams our woes to wile!
'Tis then thy pure and blessed tear
Pours its balm into the suffering soul!
Thou art the type of mercy here—
And angels hallow thy control.

Who stands before the wrathful King?
His hair is white as driven snow;
And on his eyes a ghastly ring,
Graven by Famine, Care, and Woe,
Appears. Around his neck a chain
[illegible] by a rope—
[illegible]'s halter! Fear and Hope
Also have fled, and calm despair
Broods on his brow? Brave St. Pierre,
The Mayor of Calais, is that man!
Long had he battled with despair
To hold the [illegible] [illegible] wan
[illegible] [illegible]. Now to woe come,
[illegible] [illegible] to their doom:
A [illegible] unworthy of the brave—
A [illegible] [illegible] traitor's grave!

Who bows before the vengeful King?
Who clasps his knees, and lifts her eyes,
All streaming o'er with tears, that wring
E'en the rude soldier's sympathies?
"Oh! Sire," exclaims that suppliant fair,

"Have mercy on his hoary hair
Thyself a noble soldier, then
Will never brand La gallant brow:
Then will not doom him to a death
For dogs and felons only meet.
Honour the soldier's winding sheet,
And spare the aged warrior's breath
Then will, my Edward. Mercy's now,
For virtues which thou must admire!
The [illegible] [illegible]
Thy loyalty that spares [illegible]
Be merciful, great King! [illegible]
Thy Queen to rend the captive's chain!"

Philippa spake. A murmur deep
Of praise and pity seemed to creep
Among the vast and martial crowd,
From bowman to the Baron proud
The citizen heard no many a breast,
In sorrow drooped the hardiest crest.
The patient bishop turn'd to hide
The tear that [illegible] with mild glide
Adown his furrow'd cheek: while round
The group King Edward [illegible]

"Brave [illegible]! at last we take
The Mastery, "I must either break
My trusty oath, or else I woon
Forsake the weakness of my Queen
Arise, Philippa! Thou hast won
The victory through Mercy's pleas.
Lord Bishop grant; sir [illegible]
And, St. Pierre! resume thy keys.

IMPROVEMENT IN THE GENERATION OF STEAM

A French engineer, named Leonard, has taken out a patent for simple means of diminishing the fuel necessary for producing steam. He introduces fish oil into the boiler, with only a small portion of water. When the oil is at boiling heat, the water precipitates itself into the interior, and steam is generated as fast as desired, without the oil being decomposed. The saving in fuel is said to be forty or fifty per cent.

EXPEDITION INTO SOUTHERN AUSTRALIA.

The exploring expedition, headed by Captain Sturt, which left Adelaide about fifteen months ago to proceed northward, had advanced, up to the date of his despatches (18th July, 1845), about 500 miles to longitude 141 deg. 30 min. E., and latitude 29 deg. 40 min. 12 sec., being about 90 miles E. by S. from Mount Hopeless, and near the turning point of Mr. Eyre's expedition in 1840. The extreme northern point to which the party had attained was about 28 degrees of latitude; and to get there they had to encounter a country of extreme desolation, aridity, and high temperature. Indeed, Captain Sturt's description of the heat at the highest northern point he had attained, is really awful. To give some idea of its intensity, he writes, "I found the thermometer, which was fixed in the shade of a large tree, four feet from the ground, stationary at 100 deg. of Fahrenheit, at half-past two p.m., and, in the direct rays of the sun, it rose to 157 deg. It had, on a former occasion, stood at 132 deg. in the shade, and 103 deg. in the sun.

FRUIT TREES BLOSSOMING IN WINTER.

Mr. E. Mitchell, of the Bristol Gardens, Kemp Town, Brighton, has now a brown Bury pear tree in full blossom, and a Jargonel pear tree bearing fruit three-fourths grown.

AN ANTEDILUVIAN SERPENT.

A letter from Gottingen announces that M. Koch, a geologist, of that city, has just discovered, in the United States, in the State of Alabama, at a depth of 111 feet below the surface of the ground, the complete skeleton of an antediluvian serpent, 114 French feet (121 feet 6 inches English) long, the vertebræ of which are from 24 to 30 inches high, and 18 in circumference. M. Koch is of opinion that the animal must have lived in the sea, and that it was carnivorous. He proposes to give it the name of archihydra.—(This appears to throw the account of the great sea-serpent quite into the shade. America must be a famous place for serpents.)

STATISTICS OF PRUSSIA.

We find the following statistical account of Prussia in the German journals:—Prussia, the extent of which is 5080 square miles, contained at the end of 1843 a population of 7,721,038 males and 7,750,727 females, of whom 9,428,911 were Protestants and 5,820,123 Catholics. There were 13,230 mills worked by water, 10,572 by wind, and 69 by steam (in 1840 the number of the latter was only 11); 884 printing establishments (447 in 1840), 1202 presses (1109 in 1840); paper and forges, 9763, employing 80,190 workmen, and producing yearly 42,815,741 livres (about 130 millions of francs); 9,588 breweries, 10,131 distilleries, 2,[illegible] steam-engines, with a collective force of 27,242 horses (in 1840 only 634 engines, of 12,878 horse-power); 136 cotton-spinning mills, occupying 150,436 spindles; 8,300 worsted-spinning establishments, with 405,603 spindles. Since 1840 the latter business has increased 2 per cent.: that of cotton has decreased 22 per cent., but the number of spindles remains the same.

A GROUND FOR CONGRATULATION.

The Frankfort Journal gives the folowing anecdote:—"About a week ago, the Duke of Nassau, while walking on the banks of the Rhine, near Mayence, asked a boatman whether the river continued to rise? 'Yes,' replied the man, using a term equivalent to calling the Duke a stupid ass, 'have been walking an hour here, and ask me whether the water rises!' The Duke turned away laughing. 'Do you know whom you have been talking to?' asked a second boatman of the first. 'No! who was he?' 'Why, it was the Duke of Nassau!' 'Well, I am glad I was not rude!'"

SLEEP.

(Written by the late Dr. Southey, at the age of 18.)

Sleep that loves the cottar's hut
Beyond the Baron's hall,
Sleep that hears the peasant's prayer,
Nor heeds the Monarch's call!

Sleep that seals the wearied eye,
That soothes the throbbing pain;
That shuts the [illegible] evening hour
Of all thy [illegible] train.

Yet surely [illegible] when guilty care
Racks the [illegible] breast,
Thou shed'st no genial influence there,
Thou giv'st no placid rest.

Where guilt is fixed, thou ne'er canst live,
Nor where it reigns abide;
Thy calm dominion it is [illegible] shared
By Avarice or Pride.

Though man all other Nature's gifts
Summon by force or skill,
Nor art can force thee to stay,
Or bend thee [illegible]

From the hill and vale,
Thy presence [illegible]
But whomsoe'er thou visit'st not,
How a pain the wretch's soul!

From the MS. in the possession of the nephew of Dr. Southey.

ORIGIN OF THE LEAGUE.

The seven persons who originated the movement which gave rise to the National Anti-Corn-law League, were—Edward Baxter (now of Belfast), W. A. Cunningham, Andrew Dalziel, James Howie (now of Edinburgh), James Leslie, Archibald Prentice, and Philip Thomas Bousfield. At the second meeting of the Association, although about fifty persons had given in their subscriptions, there was again an attendance of seven, the place of Mr. Baxter, who was absent, having been taken by Mr. William Rawson, now the treasurer of the League. Mr. Rawson was the first Englishman who joined the Association. Of the original seven, six were natives of Scotland, and one of Ireland. The grand impulse to the movement was given when Mr. Cobden, who was abroad at the time of its origination, joined it. The first person who subscribed more than five shillings was Mr. Robert Stuart, now one of the magistrates for the borough, who, on being up-lad to, said, "What is the use of subscribing five shillings? Put me down for ten pounds."

STATISTICS OF PARIS.

Paris is inhabited by 912,634 individuals, who occupy 34,396,800 square yards of surface, or nearly 8600 acres. It contains 42,000 houses, 1922 streets, 97 quays, 46 military roads, 37 quays, 15 boulevards, 37 avenues, 153 squares, 37 bridges, 105 courts, 9 palaces, 23 remarkable edifices, 6 public gardens, 4 triumphal arches, 5 columns, 1 obelisk, 16 libraries, 15 museums, 28 monumental fountains, 38 churches, 25 convents, 20 hospitals, 4 equestrian statues, 24 theatres, and 29 barracks.

A NEW COLOUR FOR DYEING.

The Courrier de Lyons announces a discovery of much importance in dyeing. A dyer of Vienne, who lives in Lyons, has discovered a means of producing an orange-coloured yellow from the citron, and by one dipping only. By this means fustic, cochineal, madder, and a preparation of tin, now used, will be no longer required: and it is said that this discovery will save time and money, and produce a superior colour.

A YOUNG GIRL POSSESSED OF ELECTRIC POWER.

A great sensation has been excited in the scientific world of Paris, by the extraordinary phenomenon of a young girl from Normandy, who possesses the electric power belonging to the torpedo. M. Arago, who has witnessed several proofs of this singular quality, made a very interesting statement on the subject to the Académie des Sciences, who have formed a commission to investigate the facts.

A DISCOVERY CONNECTED WITH ELECTRIC LIGHT

A Belgian savant has just discovered that electric light, directed on the human body, makes it so diaphanous as to enable the arteries, veins, and nerves to be seen at work, and their action to be studied.

A CURIOUS ACCOUNT ABOUT THE WEATHER.

The Piedmontese Gazette, which is in the habit of dealing in the wonderful, says, "The mildness of the present temperature is attributed to a large cavity or crater, observed by Professor Grandisson of Monaco on the eastern limb of the sun, corresponding with a spot which inclines towards the north. This great cavity appeared on the 17th January, increased, and on the 23rd bore towards the middle of the luminary. Its greatest diameter has been measured at 13 seconds, equivalent to 2194 geographical leagues, whence it results that the solar superficies had 22,626,000 square leagues in complete obscurity, while the remaining portion was resplendent with light. About 19 o'clock on that day the heat at Monaco was at 11 degrees of Reaumur, 56½ Fahrenheit."

WAR IN THE WEST.

The intelligence from America is again rather discouraging to the friends of peace; it is a libel on common sense and reason to suppose the existence, in any country, of a war party—that is a mass of public opinion having a perceptible weight in public affairs, that actually seeks for opportunities of bloodshed, and exhibits no reluctance to make causes for it if they should not exist. It is still more degrading to humanity to be compelled to acknowledge that men can be found, who, for their own purposes, foment the causes of difference that do unfortunately and inevitably arise; the many, who do not reason, may be sincere, though mistaken; the few, who speculate on the advantages they may gain in the confusion of a struggle, must exercise thought and calculation. They are, of necessity, criminal; they are neither sincere in error, nor believe in the justice of the course they take. We can find a palliation for those who form the war party in France; there are the dark memories of centuries of feuds between us, renewed with dreadful energy, and worked out to a humiliating catastrophe within the present generation. There is greater cause for hate than love between the Gaul and the Saxon.

> Blood has been shed ere now, in the olden time,
> Ay, and since, too.

We struck down their idol—it was a brazen image, but they worshipped it—and imposed on them an expelled race of rulers. We do not believe that England would take the same part now in a similar conflict; but we must abide by the consequences of our own act; "what is done, is done;" it may be repented, but cannot be recalled; and it is sad to think, though far from impossible to conceive, that thousands on thousands are anxious to see the day that may bring them the chance of retaliation. On such grounds, the existence of a war party in France may be accounted for, with something to palliate it. But America has neither excuse nor palliation for the existence of a war party among her citizens. Her millions are not pent within the narrow bounds which political jealousies confine more strictly even than natural limits; she has example room and verge enough" for all the energies of her energetic sons, for centuries to come; she won her independence from us, but she was goaded into it by folly and ignorance on the part of our rulers, which Englishmen have long thought justified her resistance; she established her liberty by a determination which, as it is the quality of our common race, we can well sympathise with No nation so little grudges America her independence and her constitution as England; no people admire political freedom more, wherever it is found. The Americans were the victors in the strife with our fathers; the advantage was with them, and they may well forgive what we have long since forgotten. We cannot think that the memory of that [illegible] ties; and our differences [illegible] to be more dust in the [illegible] with all the liberal links that bind us to [illegible] language, an [illegible] which as favourably developed the resources of both countries. For the staple produce of America, England is the great market; there is a bond of mutual dependence between us; steam has bridged the Atlantic, and brought the Old World and the New so close together that the arrival of intelligence is almost as regular and certain as the daily post. Every circumstance that can induce nations to be at peace exists in a greater degree between England and America than between any other two nations in the world; and yet this is the time when we hear rising rumours of war about a question of territory! It seems to us that national folly can no further go; and if hostilities should actually occur, the nation that first provokes them will render itself a disgrace to all Christendom, and an example of popular madness to all generations.

But we do not believe that folly will be allowed to decide the question; for it is one on which more than half the agitation is the work of knavery: a political party finds that a war question furnishes the greatest amount of "political capital;" and they work it without one scruple as to its morality or consequences. We can conceive no lower degree of political degradation than that to which a man, or set of men, in a sane state of mind, must fall, before they can lend themselves to the deliberate advocacy of war: the case is made still worse, when those men no more mean to go to war than they contemplate cutting their own throats, but agitate merely to get up "a cry," by which they may keep themselves in office, and their opponents out. The trick is transparent and contemptible enough; but the fact that it is possible to play it, forces on the world a much lower estimate of the intellect of a large mass of the American people, than it would wish to entertain. Can it be the shrewd, calculating, commercial American, that shouts for war—the run of nations—the folly and reproach of reason—the destroyer of commerce? We do not believe that this really is the case; speeches in Congress, or articles in newspapers, are not the voice of a whole people; a few individuals may thus contrive to make a great sensation; if backed by a sense of injury on the part of the community, or of insult offered it, they might produce great results. But in this instance much of the element of hostilities is wanting; all the intercourse between America and England for the last few years has been beneficial to both, and from the tendency of our Legislation is likely to become still more so. What can be alleged as the cause of war? A disputed question of boundary in a territory which is about as worthless a tract as could be found upon the earth's surface. If all Oregon were absorbed by the Ocean, America would never know it, by any effect it would have on her prosperity; and as to England, the loss of a merchantman and her cargo would make more sensation at Liverpool than such an occurrence. What, then, in the name of common sense, is there to make all the noise about? Stripped of the flourishes of eloquence and indignation that have been made about it, it sinks into as worthless a dispute as ever engaged "the inky fingers" of a diplomatist, or cost the penning of a protocol.

The refusal to submit such a question to the arbitration of a third power, which seems to be the determination of America, exhibits a petty feeling, akin to childishness, and a want of that practical ability in meeting a question, which is most surprising in so practical a people. Questions of at least as great importance are perpetually arising among the European Powers, but they are settled without this exceeding talk about war, which only serves to alarm the sensitive, shake the funds, disturb commerce, and cause a general uncomfortable feeling, like that experienced when a party when some one of the circle broaches a topic of conversation exceedingly offensive and disagreeable to all but himself. The decencies of society come between the offender and the punishment that suggests itself to everybody's mind; he is not turned out of it exactly, but a pretty strong opinion is formed of him, and it is possible he may calculate too much on the forbearance shown him, and make the administering a correction a kind of moral and social duty. Englishmen hate and despise all talk and vapouring about war, and it pains them to hear others indulge in it, but this aversion must not be confounded with fear to engage in it if forced on them: hence we have no gunpowder debates in the Legislature, no public meetings for blood and glory resolutions, no journals of the "whole ticket" principles. But we have a surplus revenue, a score of millions sterling in the vaults of the Bank, unlimited credit if required on all the Exchanges of the world, stores and artillery enough for half-a-dozen campaigns, and a fleet that could sail at a week's notice. Which side is best prepared for the struggle? If the American people allow themselves to be hurried into a war by the absurdities of the Oregon fanatics, they are not the sensible men we take them to be. This shall end without the perdition of souls." We have no objection to see a question brought to a crisis, at which a decisive step must be taken; that crisis is produced by the notice of the termination of the Convention as to the occupancy of Oregon; the matter will be a step nearer settlement, not a jot more likely to create a war. But we hate to hear such a contingency talked of as possible, and heartily wish the power of common sense may have full sway on the subject. We perceive indications that this is likely. The tone of the American journals is less hostile; they are in opposition to the Government; and to prove that the results of an outbreak can be anticipated on the other side of the Atlantic, we give the following from the New York Express:—

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS. MONDAY.

VOTE OF THANKS TO THE ARMY IN INDIA. The Earl of RIPON moved a vote of thanks to the Governor-General, the Commander-in-Chief, and the officers and men of the army on the Sutlej, for the late brilliant victories at Moodkee and Ferozeshah. After briefly recapitulating the circumstances which rendered the preservation of the British forces on the Sutlej unavoidable, the noble Lord dwelt on the [illegible] actions themselves, and on the gallantry displayed by the troops on the occasion. Having paid a just tribute to the memories of Sir J. M'Caskill, and Major Broadfoot, his next [illegible] passed an elegant eulogium on the eminent services of Sir H. Hardinge, and Sir [illegible] Gough, and concluded by moving the several resolutions in which the vote of thanks was embodied.—The Marquis of LANSDOWNE gave his cordial support to the resolutions.—The Duke of WELLINGTON eulogised the conduct of Sir H. Hardinge, and said he had a most excellent example by tendering his assistance in a subordinate capacity. The noble Duke proceeded to record his opinion of the conduct of the troops. He said "It is not generally known, my Lords, but I know it, that the fortified position of the army was closed in by entrenchments, and that it ought to be called a fortress, instead of a fortified position. Notwithstanding, also, the [illegible] of the enemy's guns, and the [illegible] which Sir H. Gough carried forward, these troops laboured under the singular disadvantage of being [illegible] of water for nearly twenty-four hours, in consequence of the persons who [illegible] employed to get water being shot to pieces, and the troops, consequently, had not even that refreshment. Under these circumstances it was that the troops carried this position, not, certainly, without great loss, but a loss which I hope has not left them in a state whereby their future efficient, if their services should be required on a different occasion. I really must say that I have not for a length of time heard of an action which has given me such unqualified satisfaction, except in one particular. The troops, with a panic of one moment, (the 53rd) to which the word 'panic' was attached. (Hear.) I have thought it my duty to inquire into the circumstances attending that regiment, and I find that it lost three-fifths of its number in the engagement, and an immense number of officers and non-commissioned officers. I have seen an account which states that in the first quarter of an hour from the moment when the regiment was first engaged one-third of its officers fell. I [illegible] to question the accuracy of the report of the operations made by a general officer (Sir John Littler), but I wish that this officer, when he sat down to prepare an elaborate report of the conduct of the troops under his command, had inquired into the number of killed and wounded, and had inquired what losses this regiment had sustained. If he had inquired, I believe he would have found that when this regiment was compelled to panic, the men were actually mowed down by the fire of the enemy, which they had just advanced." (Hear, hear.) The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH said this last achievement [illegible] the high opinion he had ever entertained of the army with which he had seen recently connected. He had, indeed, supposed, that everything that could been said applied as much to the native as to the European troops. He had the greatest satisfaction what had fallen from the Duke of Wellington respecting the 53rd Regiment, for about the Governor-General would reserve to himself the honour of storming the breach at Lahore. Above all things, it was most gratifying to remark the fidelity of the native army, which Lord remained unshaken under the severest trials. After a few words from Lord AUCKLAND, the resolutions were carried unanimously; and the House adjourned soon after seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—MONDAY.

NEW MEMBER.—T. B. T. Hildyard, Esq., took the oaths and his seat for South Nottinghamshire, in the room of Lord Lincoln. The hon. member was much cheered by the Protectionists.

ALLEGED FORGERIES TO PETITIONS.—Mr. C. F. BERKELEY brought forward the subject of a petition which he had presented on a former day, purporting to have come from Cheltenham, but which it appeared, had emanated from Manchester. Since he had last spoken upon the subject, he had received several letters, which proved that a great number of the signatures to that petition were actual forgeries, and that a great number of the genuine signatures which appeared attached to it had not been originally attached to the prayer of that petition. The hon. member then moved that the said petition be referred to a Select Committee to examine into the manner in which the signatures had been obtained for it, and the parties by whom the signatures had been affixed.

Mr. NEWDEGATE deprecated the manner in which the Anti Corn-law League interfered with the [illegible] of votes.

Mr. BRIGHT, on the part of the League, made an explanation on the subject.

Mr FERRAND wished to know whether he could move an amendment to the motion by the hon. and gallant member. He had received a letter that morning from Sheffield, bearing out the statement which he had made on a previous night in respect to the manner in which signatures were affixed to those petitions. There was also an article in the last number of the Leeds Mercury, which bore testimony to the truth of what he had stated. He had further received a letter from a gentleman residing in London, who gave his name and address, detailing the manner in which his signature to a petition, and others of the ILLUSTRATED NEWS as an excellent authority upon the subject. He informed him that children were in the habit of signing their names two or three times over to these petitions, and making—as [illegible] the leaders of the Anti Corn-law League (laughter from the opposition side of the House), I shall feel great pleasure in addressing you to expose their conduct, by informing you of the names and residences of those who have signed the Anti Corn-law League to procure these signatures. He then stated that he knew of twenty persons who were thus employed, one of whom had affixed signatures to petitions to the number of about 20,000, another 300. As soon as he [illegible] received the letter, he immediately wrote to this person, asking him for a reference as to his respectability, which he at once gave. He had a personal interview with this gentleman, and had ascertained that the statements in the letter were correct. He was prepared, therefore, to produce proofs to prove these facts, and he would, therefore, move, as an amendment, that this Committee do inquire generally into the [illegible] adopted by the Anti Corn-law League to obtain signatures to their petitions. After some discussion, a Select Committee was appointed, but Mr. Ferrand's amendment was withdrawn.

VOTE OF THANKS TO THE ARMY IN INDIA.

Sir R. PEEL, in proposing a vote of thanks to the British army in India, gave a very interesting outline of the policy adopted by the Government, and read some affecting and spirited extracts from letters from that gallant officer. His right hon. Baronet, after some preliminary remarks, said—The resolutions with which I shall conclude will not touch upon any matter of merely political concern, but are framed in a manner conformable to the usual language that usage has consecrated with reason and justice. The resolutions will be confined to the acknowledgment of military skill, ability, and valour; and those words are disposed, if any there be, to question the policy of the late government of India, will not be in the slightest degree compromised by giving a ready acquiescence in the motion I shall submit. (Cheers.) However convinced I may be of the justice, the moderation, and the wisdom, which have characterised the conduct of my gallant friend the Governor-General, yet I shall studiously abstain, even in the observations which I make, from any reference to public policy, excepting such as is necessary to elucidate the military operations in which my gallant friend, which is immediately concerned in the question now before the House. With its position, with its government, with its population, we have become familiar by events that have occurred within the last few years. The seat of the country and the history of the Punjaub are probably well known by every one, from the relation in which it has recently stood during our operations in the neighbouring countries of Affghanistan. The Hon. Baronet proceeded briefly to sketch the ability and energy of an individual (Runjeet Singh), supremacy was established by him in the Punjaub, and that for many years, through that ability and energy, the [illegible] succession of Governors, in consequence of the murder of the predecessor by the successor: it has exhibited a picture of its riotousness and debauchery so extravagant, that it might be calculated to provoke a smile, if it were not for the influence such destitute scenes and such characters have over the welfare of millions. The acts of that Government have been mainly controlled by that powerful soldiery over which Runjeet Singh established his sway; but which, in consequence of the death of that chief, has latterly controlled the conduct of the civil authorities, and even of the military commanders, by repeated acts of insubordination, and repeated murders, for the purpose of exerting increased pay. Perhaps, the best idea can be given of the condition of affairs, and the difficulties of speculating upon any acts that may be committed, or upon any measure that may be resorted to, is this—that it is quite clear that the main object of the governors of that country, and of the princes and leading proprietors and chiefs, has been to provoke collision with the British army, not for the purpose of sustaining the military reputation of their country, but of freeing themselves from subjection to an insubordinate and licentious force, by succeeding in a conflict with Great Britain. (Cheers.) That has been the main object, and the public policy that has for some time guided the decisions and regulated the acts of the rulers of the Punjaub. I well know what was the object of my friend, Sir Henry Hardinge, in undertaking the government of India: he made great sacrifices from a sense of public duty: my gallant friend had a prominent place in the councils of his Sovereign: I believe, without any family connexion or divisions, held in general esteem (cheers), as well by his political opponents (cheers from the Opposition benches), as by his political friends. (Cheers from the Ministerial side.) He was regarded by the whole country as its friend, because he was the friend of justice to all ranks. (Cheers.) It was proposed, to him at a time of life when, perhaps, ambition is a less powerful stimulus than it might have been at an earlier period, to undertake the duty of supreme power in places in the councils of his Sovereign to forego the satisfaction he must have felt at what he could not fail to see that he was an object of general respect and esteem. (Cheers.) He proposed to himself a [illegible] object of promoting the solid happiness of his life, for the purpose of performing a public duty he thought he owed to his Sovereign and his country, by taking the arduous and responsible situation of Chief Governor of the [illegible] possessions, at that time with a high military reputation, but, most of all, sollicitous to establish his fame in connexion with our Indian empire—not by means of conquest, or the extension of military renown, but by obtaining for himself a name in the annals of India as the friend of peace, and the promotion of the social intercourse of the inhabitants. (Hear, hear.) I believe it was, in great part, on account of the military character and high reputation of my gallant friend, that he was enabled to confer [illegible] tions offered to him for the invasion and conquest of the Punjaub [illegible] which my gallant friend took of the policy to be pursued in regard to the Punjaub, was shortly [illegible] the [illegible] dependents of the British. sudden irruption, gave orders that the division of troops at Umballa, consisting of 7500 men, should advance and move towards the Sutlej. On December 11, the very day on which the Lahore army crossed the Sutlej, the British and native troops of that division were on their march from Umballa to the frontier. (Hear, hear.) I must say that I think the whole proceedings of the Governor-General and the Commander-in-Chief, subsequently to that day, as well as before it, were characterized by the greatest prudence, skill, and foresight (Cheers.) From Umballa the troops marched to a place called Busean, where, owing to the prudent precautions of the Governor-General, they received an ample supply of food (Hear, hear.) It was resolved then that a junction should be effected with the Loodiana division, so that it would be better to concentrate the whole force by a junction made at some risk with the division at Loodiana, rail or than have a divided army The troops advanced accordingly towards Ferozepore, and learned by the way that the whole of the army of Lahore, amounting to not less than from 50,000 to 60,000 men, had crossed the river, and were prepared to attack them (Hear, hear.) The expectations of the Governor-General were entirely justified by the result of that determination. There were in Ferozepore 6000 men, 35 heavy guns in position, and 24 heavy pieces of artillery, in addition to the heavy ordnance. The army of Lahore shrunk from the attack of so formidable a post, and Ferozepore was entirely safe (hear, hear), according to the calculations which had been entertained by the Governor-General. (Hear, hear.) The army of Lahore, not attempting to carry out the attack of Ferozepore, then determined to fight the British forces on their march. Accordingly on the 18th of December made a sudden attack on them. On that day the troops had reached Moodkee, after having marched 150 miles by forced marches. The men were suffering severely from want of water, and from exhaustion, and yet such was their discipline and gallantry, that they repelled the whole of the attacking army, though greatly superior to them in number (hear, hear)—defeated a force treble their amount, and succeeding in the capture of 17 of their guns. (Cheers.) The army of Lahore, thus repulsed by the division of our forces from Umballa, retired within very formidable entrenchments at Ferozeshah. These entrenchments, consisting of strong breastworks, were in the form of a parallelogram, of which the opposite faces were a mile, and half a mile in length respectively. In the face of those formidable works, protected by 150 guns of excellent workmanship, and defended by 50,000 men, the Governor-General and the Commander-in-Chief determined to effect a junction with the division of the army which was on its march from Ferozepore. The troops advanced against the three sides of the enemy's position, and unanswered on their right flank, but the commander having given previous notice to Sir J. Littler, made a march on the left of their position, and on the 21st December effected a junction with the Ferozepore division, which thus gave them an addition of 7500 men. (Hear, hear, hear.) At this time there remained but three hours to sunset. It was resolved, however, to attack the position of the enemy. My gallant friend, (the Governor-General) offered his services as second in command (cheers), services which were cheerfully and promptly accepted by the Commander-in-Chief. (Cheers.) Determined not to wait till next morning, the instant they effected their junction with Sir J. Littler's division, the Commander-in-Chief resolved to make an attack upon the enemy in his entrenched camp. (Hear, hear.) The result, Sir, of that attack proved the valour of our Indian forces in a pre-eminent degree, and has entitled them, I believe, to the warmest acknowledgments of this House and of the country. (Loud cheers.) I believe, Sir, that the night of the 21st December was one of the most memorable in the annals of the British empire. (Hear, hear.) The enemy were well defended with their numerous fortified battlements, their guns were served with the greatest precision, and bold on our advancing columns with great effect. The right of the British army was led on by the Commander-in-Chief, while the left wing was headed by Sir H. Hardinge. (Cheers.) Our forces made an attack on the enemy's camp during the three hours which as yet remained of daylight, but they had not sufficient time to complete the victory, which was gloriously achieved on the following day. The British army, however, made good their attack, and occupied a part of the enemy's camp. In the middle of the night the camp took fire, and further conflict was for a time suspended. In consequence, no doubt, of what had passed, the army of Lahore brought forward their heavy artillery, and poured a most destructive fire upon our troops. The details of those occurrences have been given with admirable clearness in the despatches of both commanders, but there have been private letters received which speak of them with less of formality, and perhaps give truer and more faithful accounts of these actions than the official documents. Perhaps the House will excuse my giving extracts of a private letter from the Governor-General to a member of his own family. (Loud cries of "hear, hear, hear.") The right honourable Baronet then proceeded to read the following extract from the letter, which was the most extraordinary of my life. I bivouacked with the men, without food or covering, and our nights are bitter cold. A burning camp in our front, our brave fellows lying down and fighting cannonballs flying in the darkness of both commanders, but there have been private letters received which speak of them with less of formality, and perhaps give truer and more faithful accounts of these actions than the official documents. Perhaps the House will excuse my giving extracts of a private letter from the Governor-General to a member of his own family. (Loud cries of "hear, hear, hear.") The right honourable Baronet then proceeded to read the following extract from the letter, which was the most extraordinary of my life. I bivouacked with the men, without food or covering, and our nights are bitter cold. A burning camp in our front, our brave fellows lying down and fighting cannonballs flying in the darkness of both commanders, with the wild cries of the Sikhs, our English hurrah, the tramp of men, and the groans of the dying. In this state, with a handful of men who had carried the batteries by sheer bravery, I remained till morning, taking very short intervals of rest by lying down with various regiments in succession, to ascertain their temper, and revive their spirits." (Loud cheers.) I really, Sir, (continued Sir Robert) am wonderfully affected by the letter. It is the most extraordinary of the extract. (Loud cheering from both sides.) My gallant friend, as you see, spent that eventful night going from division to division of his army—doing all that human could do to encourage our troops, and to secure victory, and fatigue and loss of rest. (Loud cheers.) "I found," my gallant friend goes on to say, "I found myself again with my old friends of the 29th, 31st, 50th, and 80th, all in good trim. Regiments with which I had served in the Peninsula, and I felt that regiment which has earned immortal fame in the annals of the British army—her Majesty's 80th Regiment.) (Loud cheering) "My answer to all and every man was, I hope we shall lick them to-day." My gallant friend has licked them, beat him, or die honourably in the field. (Cheers.) The gallant old general, kind-hearted and heroically brave, entirely coincided with me." Let the House observe how anxious my gallant friend is to do justice to his companions in arms. (Cheers.) "During the night, I occasionally called on our brave English soldiers to punish the Sikhs when they came too close and were impudent; and when morning broke we were all in English style. (Cheers.) Gough was on the right. I placed myself, and dear little Arthur (his son) by my side, in the centre, about thirty yards in front of the men, to prevent their firing, and we drove the enemy in the first line, one regiment of the army in the other, and in about thirty or forty guns as we went along, which fired at twenty paces from us, and were served obstinately. The brave men drew up in an excellent line, and cheered me, and myself as I rode down the line, the regimental colours lowering to me, as on parade. The mournful part is the heavy loss I have sustained in my officers. I have had ten aides-de-camp hors de combat, five killed and five wounded. The staff of the army have from 100 pieces of cannon. The Sikh army, divided by French officers, and the men the most warlike in India." (Loud and long continued cheering.) From my affectionate regard for this gallant man, I am proud to be enabled to exhibit him on such a night as that of the 21st of December going through the camp passing from regiment to regiment—keeping up the spirits of the men encouraging them animating the ardour after having lost ten aides-de-camp out of twelve (cheers), and then placing his young son, a boy sixteen years of age (cheers), in the front of the lines, in order that the British army might not be induced to fire on the enemy, but drive them back by the force of the British bayonet. (Loud cheers.) It was curious and characteristic of the man to read those details. He says that he had two sons present, one of whom was a civilian, and the other in the army. On the night of the 21st he sent the civilian from the front of the army, saying that his presence disturbed him, and that if he refused to go he would send him there as a prisoner (cries of hear, hear, hear); but the presence, he said, of his son in the field, the only male born of his race was more desperately resolute in the discharge of his duty. (Loud cheers.) On the 22nd, after the battle was over, he took that son with him, when visiting the Sepoys and the wounded, and he

UNION-STREET, ISLE OF WIGHT, ON MONDAY LAST.

THE CEREMONIAL IN THE ISLE OF WIGHT.

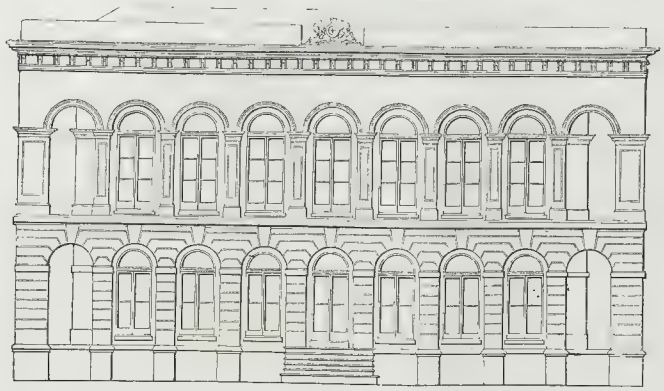
You would have thought the very windows spoke,
So many greedy looks were fix'ing on us!
Through casements darted thousand bold eyes.
SHAKSPEARE

We have resigned ourselves, without a struggle, to the sentence which Taste has passed upon us, on the unanimous finding of the beaux esprits of Christendom—we have suffered the judgment to go against us by default, which declares that we are not a picturesque people. Perhaps there is not to be found, in savage or civilised society, a figure with less of the poetry of costume about it, than that of an English gentleman dressed for a ball—except that of an English gentleman apparelled for an occasion which calls him out of doors, when his dowdiness is crowned by a beaver—when he claps upon the faint twinkle of his propriety, that most inexorable of all extinguishers, "a shocking bad hat." We say nothing of the style common or uncommon to our ladies: the élégantes of Paris pronounce it as bad as it possibly can be, with a constant geometrical progression towards worse. If so, the same origin may be found for it, as for the beneficent ordonnance of Nature, which disposes all dangerous creatures to be magnanimous in the exercise of their powers. The slaughter this occasioned [illegible] is terrible enough it's dreadful to contemplate the result of their taking the field in the undress of the Elgin Marbles, or after the fashion of the Nymphs of Correggio. When, therefore, divested of those appliances and means which naturally offer themselves for getting up a festival in the sunny land of robes and mantillas—we see a fête or ceremonial at home, becomingly put upon the scene, it is well worthy of posterity. For this reason, the late inauguration (that's classic for laying a first stone) in the Isle of Wight is deemed a fitting subject for these remarks, which, with all their influences—as our friend Horace very justly says—would fail to give the true Pierian flavour to the small swipes of Parnassus—or the picturesque.

Mediocribus esse poetis
Non homines, non dii non [illegible]

Not many months since a society called the Royal Victoria Yacht Club was put in train under the especial favour and countenance of her Majesty, having for head-quarters the pretty marine resort known as Ryde, in the Isle of Wight. This society grew fast in ashion an I renowne, soon numbering among its members the first dashing men of the West Riding, all upwards of a fee thousand pound per annum. Indeed it was necessary to [illegible] a high limitation in the [illegible] Club-House, for which end forms were [illegible] fitting size erected on the beach, some hundreds to the right of the Pier [illegible] as it juts forth from the sea. They were, a most respectful request was made to Prince Albert that he would confer on the Club the honour of becoming the founder of their house, to which a gracious assent was returned: and the 2nd of March was [illegible] for the performance of the ceremony by his Royal Highness. In every way the day was becoming the occasion. Everybody knows that this season [illegible] New Year's Morning. The first Monday in Lent ushers the first week of summer, or seemed as if it had, at all events. That morning dispersed from Ryde, if it ever knew such a three, "the winter of its discontent." The sun rose ruddy [illegible] the sea [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] Hyde [illegible] was [illegible] with wreaths, festooned with evergreens, and waving with flags and streamers, just as they get up their Continental carnival scenes, or a fete at the opera, but with a more [illegible] picturesque popular

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT LAYING THE FIRST STONE OF THE VICTORIA YACHT CLUB-HOUSE, AT RYDE, ISLE OF WIGHT.



NORTH ELEVATION OF THE VICTORIA YACHT CLUB-HOUSE.

Of course, the authorities had made ample preparation after the national custom: there was to be no end of the eating and drinking, to say nothing of the speechifying, which promised prodigiously if the town address was to be taken as a sample—a composition that covered a considerable amount of canvass.

The site of the intended Club-House was converted into a temporary theatre, having rows of seats ranged in elevation on either hand, the centre reserved for the great scene of the day—the depositing of the stone of ceremony by the hands of the Royal architect. The pier—a remarkably long and thin individual of its class—wore its decorations, as the practice is with piers of all sorts, on holiday occasions. The Island and adjacents ports contributed a great company; and, if great company were only half as well-looking, and quarter as agreeable, always, Ryde-park would be the most popular promenade on this side the Elysian fields ancient or modern. The programme was a most goodly bill of fare; filled with processions, and feastings, and bands of music.

At noon all was on the qui vive, and in apple-pie order. Indeed, the well dressed and well conducted throng that filled the little borough to repletion, stood in good stead for the loose revellers of a carnival albeit, the balance was against you in the matter of the picturesque. They lounged happily about, and into the shops, and adown the pier, regardless of the remorseless twopences inflicted on every visit, and wondered when the Prince would come. The auspicious arrival took place precisely at five minutes past three, under a royal salute from H.M.S. Superb, lying at Spithead, and the battery at the Club-House. His Royal Highness landed at the pier-head from the Fairy yacht, which conveyed the Royal party from Osborne House, and was received by Mr. Fleming, the Commodore of the R.V.Y.C., Lord Rossmore, Mr. Hareourt, Dr. Lind, bearer of the town address; and the heads of the procession the Royal Marine band playing the National Anthem. The cavalcade, being now duly marshalled, set forth townwards, passing through the company by which the pier was densely lined. Having reached the toll-house, that separates the pier from the shore, Dr. Lind read the address as aforesaid (which want of room compels us to omit); and then the procession proceeded to the place where the stone awaited in suspense the honour intended it. As appropriate to the ceremonial, one of its features was the presence of the neighbouring lodge of Masons. Assisted by that body, the Prince, having spread the mortar with a silver trowel, consigned the first stone of the foundation to the place of its destination, accompanied by a brass plate, bearing the following inscription:

"This stone was laid by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, of Saxe Coburg, &c., assisted by the Right Hon. Charles Anderson Pelham, Earl of Yarborough, &c. (who was present by proxy), Provincial Grand Master of the Free and Accepted Masons of the United Lodges of the Isle of Wight, assembled on the 2nd day of March, A.D. 1846, in the ninth year of the reign of her Most Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria for the Club-House, to be erected for the use of the Members of the Victoria Yacht Club, established on the 24th of May, 1845, under the especial patronage of her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert. This building is intended to be erected by the private subscriptions of the Members of the Royal Victoria Yacht Club, united for the purpose of promoting and encouraging all that relates to nautical science. William Huntley, architect."

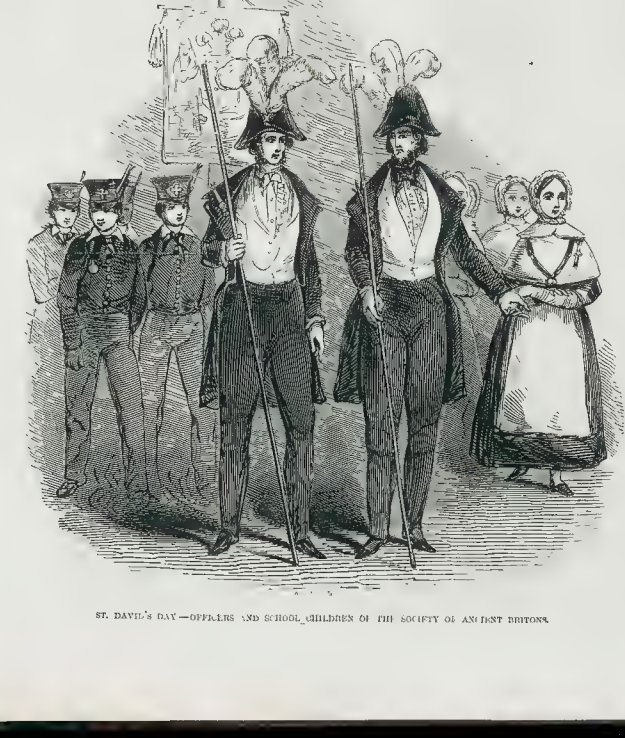
The band then struck up "Rule Britannia;" and, at its conclusion, the Commodore of the Club read his address, to which Prince Albert replied in a very complimentary speech. This ended, a shout arose that split the sky, and the Royal party retired to a luncheon provided at the Pier Hotel. His Royal Highness and suite stayed there but a few moments; and, passing down the pier, re-embarked on board the Fairy for Osborne. The appearance of the standard of Saxe Coburg at the main of the Royal yacht tender was the signal for another Royal salute from the Superb and the battery ashore. In the evening, the members of the Royal Victoria Yacht Club dined together at the Kent Hotel; and, as soon as it was dark, the pier was brilliantly illuminated with coloured fires, and a feu de joie of shells and rockets closed the day. It will be long before Ryde forgets the laying of the first stone of her Yacht Club: we trust, as we believe, it will prove the foundation of her increased popularity and prosperity

ST. DAVID'S DAY.—THE SOCIETY OF ANCIENT BRITONS.

In consequence of the anniversary of the patron saint, David, falling this year on a Sunday, the annual festival of the Honourable and Loyal Society of Ancient Britons was celebrated on Monday last, the 2nd inst. This excellent Association was established for the sacred purpose of succouring the distressed, so long ago as March 1, 1715, in honour of the birthday of her Royal Highness Wilhelmina Caroline, then Princess of Wales, which happened on the anniversary of the Cambrian tutelar saint, David. On that day, the Society dined in Haberdashers' Hall, and one of the post-prandial enjoyments was a song from the pen of the celebrated Tom d'Urfey. Next, the Prince of Wales graciously permitted the Institution to bear the style and title of "The Most Honourable and Loyal Society of Ancient Britons;" and, to this day, their emblem is the famed Royal triple plume.

In 1718, this benevolent example gave rise to the establishment of a school in the Metropolis for poor children of Welsh parents. Next, the Society built a School-house on Clerkenwell-green, in 1737; and in 1771, they built a larger School-house, on the north-east side of Gray's Inn-lane; where, at this time, are clothed and educated from the Society's funds, 200 boys and girls; all of whom were in full health on Monday last, and attended divine service at the Church of St. George's, Hanover-square. Our artist has engraved a group of the children; each of whom wears on this occasion, a Leek, the national emblem of Wales. The officers of the Charity also wear a triple plume, and a leek formed of silver twist, tipped with green satin ribbon.

In the evening, the noblemen and gentlemen more immediately connected with the Principality, dined at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, Lincoln's Inn-fields. The chair was taken at half-past six o'clock, by the Hon. H. C. Cholmondeley, M.P., who was supported on his immediate right and left by the Earl of Powis and the Bishop of Oxford. There were also present Lord Clive, M.P., Colonel Wood, M.P, and many gentlemen of the Principality. The musical arrangements, as usual at the anniversaries of this Festival, were of more than an ordinary character, and were under the management and direction of Mr. Parry, assisted by Messrs. Francis Collyer, Fitzwilliam, Richards, Welsh, Machins, and J. D. Arkins. Mr. E. Roberts also performed on the Welsh harp; and the vocal pieces were accompanied by Mr. H. B. Richards, on the pianoforte. The usual loyal, appropriate, and national toasts were given from the chair, and drunk with the best feelings. The health of the Hon. Chairman was also given, and drunk in the way it deserved. In the course of the evening, the children educated and supported by the School, in connexion with the Society, were introduced to the company, and sung an appropriate Ode, as they passed round the Hall, the Band playing a Welsh march. The piece introduced a stanza to the memory of the late Mrs. C. B. Wilson, who, for many years, wrote the Odes for the children. The company were numerous; and the subscriptions exceeded £1100.



ST. DAVID'S DAY.—OFFICERS AND SCHOOL CHILDREN OF THE SOCIETY OF ANCIENT BRITONS.

MAJOR-GENERAL SIR JOHN HUNTER LITTLER, K.C.B.

The important frontier station of Ferozepore has for sometime past been under the command of this gallant officer, who held it with a force of about 7000 men, a great portion of whom were native troops. Early in December last it was invested by the great army of the Sikhs, who, although they menaced, did not actually attack it. The Commander-in-Chief, Sir Hugh Gough, Bart., in his despatches of the 19th of December, speaks of the "confidence he felt in Major-General Littler commanding at Ferozepore, and the devotedness and gallantry of the troops occupying it;" but finding the town blockaded by the numerous forces by which it was surrounded, Sir Hugh Gough hastened to its relief by forced marches, and was on his way thither, when he was attacked by the Sikhs at Moodkee, and fought there the glorious battle of the 18th of December.

Sir John Littler took no part in that brilliant engagement, being still shut up in Ferozepore; but, during the night of the 20th of December, a communication was opened with him, and the next morning he was on full march, with, 5000 of the men under his command; and, by a movement, "well conceived and admirably executed," after a most fatiguing and harassing march, he effected a junction with the main body of our army, and commanded the left wing, under Sir H. Hardinge, in the glorious battles of the 21st and 22nd of December; and, by his bravery there, entitled himself to a high rank among the "Heroes of Ferozeshah."

MAJOR-GENERAL SIR JOHN LITTLER, K.C.B.

We extract from the Chester Courant the following slight biographical sketch:—

"Sir John Littler, who was engaged in the late battle in India, is the eldest son of Thomas Littler, Esq., by Diana his wife, daughter of John Hunter, Esq., a director of the East India Company, and represents a family of considerable antiquity in Cheshire, where, in the Vale Royal, his ancestors were settled in the time of Edward I. Sir John Littler was born, Jan. 6th, 1788, and married June 25th, 1827, Helen Olympia, only daughter of Capt. Henry Stewart, claimant of the Earldom of Orkney."

These Stewarts claim to be descendants of the Stewarts of Darnley, and to be allied to the Blood Royal of Scotland through one of the Darnleys, Earls of Lennox.

Sir John Littler entered the Indian army (Bengal Native Infantry) at sixteen; his first appointment is dated in 1799; he was at the taking of Java, in 1811. In July, 1839, he took the rank of Colonel of the 36th Native Infantry, a regiment which bears on its colours the ever-memorable words of "Seringapatam" and "Bhurtpoor;" on the 23rd November, 1841, he was appointed a Major-General; and in 1843 we find him in command of a division of the British army, which was marching towards Gwalior to curb the Mahrattas, against whose warlike bands, on the 23rd December, 1843, he led his division in the brilliant action of Maharajpoor. His column commenced the battle by a gallant and successful charge; and in the engagement he received a contusion, and had two horses shot under him. For his gallantry in that battle, her Majesty honoured him with the dignity of a Knight Commander of the Order of the Bath. His command on the line of the Sutlej, as first-class Brigadier, dates from the 7th of April, 1843. At the battle of Ferozeshah, he again had two horses shot under him; and on the 3rd of March, 1846, he was mentioned by name among the general officers who, with the several officers under their command, received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament for the eminent services rendered by them in the recent arduous and successful operations.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

LIEUT.-GEN. SIR JAMES KEARNEY, K.C.H.

How many gallant names have departed from our military records during the past few months! It is now our painful task to add one more to the sad catalogue. Lieut.-Gen. Sir James Kearney, an old and deeply-lamented officer, died on the 23rd ult., in his 69th year. For more than half a century, he had been in the army, and, during the eventful period that followed his first entrance on his gallant profession, saw much service.

At a very early age he was engaged in the East and West Indies; in 1809, participating in the Walcheren Expedition, assisted at the capture of Flushing and Middleburg; and, finally, was with the army in France. In 1843, he succeeded the Marquis of Anglesey as Colonel of the 7th Hussars. Sir James was son of the late James Kearney, Esq., of Blanchville, Co. Kilkenny, and married in 1802, Miss Bayley, eldest daughter of Clayton Bayley, Esq., of Gowran.

CAPTAIN JOHN MUNRO, A.D.C.

This amiable and accomplished officer, aide-de-camp to the Governor-General, and Lieutenant in the 10th Light Infantry, received a mortal wound on the hard-fought field of Moodkee; and, in two days after, closed his short but promising career. He had served in the second Cabul campaign, under General Pollock, and held a responsible situation at Gundamuck. He subsequently participated in the Battle of Maharajpore; and, in the pursuit of the enemy, was twice singled out by Mahratta Chiefs, both of whom he overcame. On Lord Ellenborough's arrival in India, he was appointed to his Lordship's body-guard, and Sir Henry Hardinge selected him as interpreter to the Governor-General; for the duties of which office, his perfect knowledge of Eastern languages peculiarly adapted him.

He fell, in the moment of victory, beloved and admired by all his comrades. At the period of his death he had completed his 25th year. He was second son of Major-General John Munro, of Teaninich, in Ross-shire, who formerly acted as Quarter Master General of the Madras Array, and w. . . . . arbeds Political Resident at Travancore. Warlike achievement and p . . . . al daring are hereditary in the race of Munro. Two chiefs of the clan fell at Bannockburn, one at Holmedoun Hill, and a third on the field of Pinkie.

SIR JOHN FORBES, BART.

The death of Sir John Forbes, of Craigievar, Bart, took place at Fintray House, his seat near Aberdeen, on the 17th ult. He was second son of the late Sir William Forbes, fifth Baronet, by the Hon. Sarah Sempill, eldest daughter of Joun, thirteenth Lord Sempill, and succeeded to the title at the decease of his eldest brother, Sir Arthur, in 1823. He married in 1835 the Hon. Charlotte Elizabeth, second daughter of Geneva Lord Forbes, and niece of the late Duchess of Atholl, by whom he has left two sons and five daughters. The eldest son and successor, the present Sir William, was born in 1836

The family of Craigievar is a branch of the noble House of Forbes, Lords Forbes: their original designation was "Of Corse;" but the direct ancestor of the deceased Baronet, William Forbes, Esq., having realized a large fortune by commerce at Dantzic, returned to Scotland, and purchasing the ancient Castle of Craigievar from the Mortimers, completed the structure in a splendid manner, and took his title therefrom. The castle is seven stories high, and, though not inhabited, is still kept in good repair. The name of Craigievar, or in Gaelic "Creg a Mhiar," means the Rock of Mor; and the place from tradition derives considerable interest. In its immediate vicinity are two or three long trenches, on the top of the Hill of Corse, supposed to be a camp or fortification of Macbeth: and near this there are a great number of small tumuli, now overgrown with short heath, the last memorials of those who fell "when Birnam Forest came to Dunsinane."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 7, 1846.

THE vote of thanks to the Indian army is but a just tribute to its exertions, and the concurrence of all parties in it, is gratifying; but the debate itself was valuable for another reason; it threw some light upon the policy the Government intends to pursue in India. We are glad to gather from the brief reference Sir Robert Peel made to this part of the subject, that any increase of territory is rather to be avoided than sought; he thinks the empire of India is extensive enough; we believe it is greater than we shall be able to govern well and thoroughly for ages to come. That we must resist all incursions upon our territory is certain, for our domination is founded on opinion, and if the prestige of our strength and superiority were shaken, it might have serious results. In this necessity must be sought the explanation of such encounters as the last, in which our military power has been supported at such a sad expence of life. The army will feel grateful to the Duke of Wellington for rendering the full justice he has done to the 62nd Regiment; even an implied censure must have given great pain to the survivors of the awful and unequal conflict in which they were engaged.

We recently referred to the want of any provision for the relief of that mass of juvenile destitution, which, without being actually depraved, is constantly being forced into a career of crime. We have no school for the youthful outcast but the prison: it is one where he soon becomes a proficient; but the results of the teaching are the reverse of satisfactory. The police offices of the Metropolis frequently exhibit the want of some kind of reformatory asylum, in a most painfully distinct manner; such an establishment might save hundreds from the consequences of a first error, by giving—instead of punishment—the chance of reform, and, at all events, the benefits of instruction. Where there is

No hand, to point in time,
The thousand paths that slope the way to crime,

it is not to be wondered at that so many are hurried into the abyss. A Committee has been for some time sitting at the Mansion-House, to consider what steps can be adopted to meet this evil; it has received a series of suggestions from the City Solicitor, which contain a and amount of truth; and that truth is being perpetually illustrated by the police reports of the day. Within the present week, Mr. Sergeant Adams, at the Middlesex Sessions, was compelled to commit a boy only twelve years of age, for a petty theft, to the Westminster Bridewell, completely bearing out the City Solicitor's statement, that,

"Upon summary conviction, short imprisonments are awarded for the smallest offence, and it is no uncommon thing to read in the newspapers of young urchins found, in a state of destitution, in the commission of some petty delinquency, commiserated by the magistrate, who expresses his pity for their unfortunate condition, and laments that he has no other place than a criminal's gaol, to which he may consign them."

Once he has passed the threshold of a prison, he may be considered as lost: one of the greatest impediments in the way of the reformation of criminals, is the difficulty they meet with of getting employment in any capacity, if they wish to return to an honest course of life. The misery of having been the inmate of a gaol, clings to them through life, almost as indelible as the brand that was once fixed upon them. It is for this reason that an institution is wanted, that shall not shed this damning influence on all who enter it: food—shelter—something like decent example, and the knowledge of an occupation, can be afforded, without rendering all these advantages useless to him to whom they are given, the moment he quits the threshold of his refuge. The gifts of a prison are poisoned: though meant to be merciful, they are neutralised by that feeling which, though it is occasionally found in excess, is still one of the great safeguards of society. To avoid this, is the present object: the question has been taken up seriously, and we hope part of the suggestions may be carried out. The following is a sketch of the plan, subject to alterations hereafter:—

To effect these great objects, great changes in the law will be required; for that purpose it is proposed to enact that all children under a given age, say sixteen years, found violating the law, or in a state of destitution which will inevitably lead to crime, shall be taken before the magistrate, and, instead of being committed, as is now the case, to a criminal prison, they shall be sent to the proposed Asylum, and the parents, and failing the parents' ability, the parishes to which they belong, shall pay the city expenses of their clothing—say 2s. or 3s. per week, as the case may be. The effect of such a legal enactment would be, that parents and parochial authorities would exert themselves to control, educate, and obtain employment for their children, or be bound by law to provide; and if they failed to do this, parishes and parents would have no right to complain, that having neglected to perform their duty, the State should interpose until that duty for them. Parishes and parents will have no right to complain if the State places itself in loco parentis for the purpose of making those happy and useful who would otherwise be wretched and useless members of society, charging the parent at the expense of their support; an expense which has hitherto been thrown most unjustly upon the county-rates, or has been defrayed out of the consolidated fund, raised from the taxation of the nation at large.

THE EARL OF LINCOLN.—It is reported that the Earl of Lincoln intends to come forward for a borough in Ireland, a supporter of the Government having consented to accept the office of steward of the Uniform Hundreds.

HOSPITAL FOR CONSUMPTION AND DISEASES OF THE CHEST.—Yesterday evening the General Quarterly Court of the Governors of the above Charity was held at the Board-room, near Marlborough-street; John Labouchere, Esq., in the chair. Among other encouraging matters, it was stated that a bequest of two thousand pounds had been made to the institution by the late Rev. Henry Campbell, of Conley, near Uxbridge. The sum of £52 16s. was on Sunday morning collected at the church of St. Mary's, Bryanston-square, after a very eloquent sermon by the Rev. THOMAS ROBINSON, M.A.

NEWS OF THE DAY.—A paragraph appeared in the papers a few days ago, stating that three baboons, six feet high; one, seven feet high; and a camel, with four feet long, had just arrived at the Surrey Zoological Gardens. We should have given an engraving of such interesting animals had they existed; but, as we suspected, there is no truth whatever in the account.

POSTSCRIPT

APPROACHING MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—We understand that the marriage of Lady Agnes Hay, second daughter of the Earl and Countess of Errol, and Mr James Duff, M.P., eldest son of the Hon. General Sir Alexander and Lady Duff, and nephew of the Earl of Fife, is to be solemnised on Monday next at Paris.

DEATH OF COLONEL HOWARD.—Died, on Wednesday, at Elford Hall, in the county of Stafford, in the seventy-third year of his age, Colonel the Hon. Folke Greville Howard, second son of Chatworthy, first Baron of Templetown, of Temple Patrick, county Antrim, in Ireland, and brother to the present Viscount

DEATH OF THE GOVERNOR OF SIERRA LEONE.—We have to announce the demise of his Excellency W. Ferguson, Esq., Governor of the above Colony and its dependencies, who died on his passage home, on board the Punchal, off Madeira, on the 19th ult. The deceased gentleman was a member of the Army Medical Staff, and had only held the appointment, which is now vacant, a few months.

MEETING AT THE EAST INDIA HOUSE.—A Special General Court was held yesterday morning at the India House, to lay before the proprietors documents relative to the late victories gained by the British and Native troops over the Sikh army on the British side of the Sutlej. The chair was taken by Sir Henry Willock, and votes of thanks were passed to the heads of the army, which are in conformity with those already unanimously agreed to by both Houses of Parliament. The papers laid before the court were similar to those which have already been published.

LONDON AND BRIGHTON RAILWAY (CHICHESTER BRANCH).—On Monday next a further portion of this line, from Worthing to Leomminster, will be opened for passenger traffic. The distance is nine miles. Only one line of rails will be in operation at first, but there is a double line between Brighton and Worthing. Leomminster is about a mile and a half from Arundel, and three from Littlehampton. It is expected that the line will be opened throughout early in May.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE MANCHESTER AND LEEDS RAILWAY.—A fatal accident occurred on the Manchester and Leeds Railway, on Thursday afternoon, in the Summit Tunnel. It appears that the train which leaves Manchester at twelve o'clock, called Hebdenbridge stopper, left Littleborough immediately after the departure of a luggage train. The passenger train left Littleborough at the usual time, although a passenger who got in there called the attention of the station-master to the night's luggage train so soon after a luggage train The passenger train proceeded, and whilst passing through a long tunnel called Summit Tunnel, a tremendous crash was felt by the passengers, and as soon as the screams and shouting consequent on the accident had subsided, it was ascertained that the break and two carriages (in one of which was the guard of the train) had by some means got detached from the luggage train, and had been left behind in the tunnel. The luggage train had gone on, and the guard, apprehending danger, had left the carriage in which he had been riding, and was standing on the up line of rails when the mail train to Manchester came up and killed him on the spot. Fortunately none of the passengers were materially injured

A MAN CONVICTED FOR THE MURDER OF HIS WIFE.—At the assizes at Reading, on Wednesday, William Spicer was tried and convicted of the murder of his wife on the 8th of August last. The evidence went to prove that the prisoner and the deceased had quarrelled, and that the prisoner struck her two very violent blows, and then seized her in his arms and dashed her down the cellar stairs, by which her neck was broken. Mr. Baron Platt sentenced the prisoner to death without hope of mercy.

FIRING AT SIR DAVID ROCHE.—BARON LEFROY swore the County Grand Jury at Limerick, for Crown business on Monday evening, at half-past five. In an hour after, Sir David Roche, Bart., one of the panel, was fired at near Patrick's-well, on his return home to Carass Court. Sir David was in his carriage, accompanied by James D. Lyons, Esq., D.L. Another of the Grand Jury, when two shots were fired, one immediately after another, over the wall of Mr. Michl Dundon's orchard, at the Four-mile-stone, just as the vehicle passed, and within two yards of the object. Providentially, the assassin's aim did not reach its destined victim; and the fact was reported to have passed through his hat, Sir David Roche drove in safety to Patrick's-well, where the murderous outrage was reported, and the police instantly went in search; but, though having traversed the scene of the firing, and the neighbourhood for some miles, no clue to the miscreants could be found. Edward J. Greene, and Hugh Massy, Esqrs., were returning home from the assizes, by the same road, and were not very far removed behind Sir David Roche's carriage, when they distinctly heard the report of both shots fired by the masked assassins.

ANOTHER ATTEMPT AT MURDER IN IRELAND.—The Dublin Pilot of Tuesday says that Mr. Lawler, an under-agent of Mr. St. George, was fired at, near Carlow, on Saturday evening last. The cause assigned for this attempt at murder is, that Mr. Lawler was instrumental in ejecting some tenantry from the property of Mr. St. George, in the County Carlow.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.—The Paris papers copy from the Courrier de Lyon, the particulars of a frightful accident on the Lyons and St. Etienne Railway. That paper, of Monday last, says:—"Yesterday afternoon, were numerous equestrian parties on the quays on the Rhone, enjoying one of the finest days of the season, a sad rumour spread, and soon acquired the consistency of truth. A catastrophe which, in its results, almost equalled in sad interest that of the Versailles Railway, had just taken place on that St. Etienne and Lyons. On arriving at the spot, at eight o'clock, we found the road, to an extent of 100 metres, encumbered with waggons, tenders, and locomotives, fragments of which, in many instances, were broken, and most of them in a perverted position, as to the rails, and supporting each other in this position, in the result of the shock that had occurred. The passengers had already been taken to some dead or severely bruised. The sight that presented itself was horrible, and it is difficult for persons who did not witness it to form a correct idea of it. The following is the information that we have received as to the way in which it happened. At Terrenoire the convoy of the train which left St. Etienne at noon, got out of order, and would no longer set. Two dispatches were then sent off, one for Lyons, the other for Givors, for another locomotive. The locomotive from Givors arrived first, and was placed at the head of the train, which immediately resumed its course. When the train had arrived in the plain of Ivours, at a distance from the tunnel of Pierre-arrived in the drivers of the locomotive saw arriving towards them, at full speed, the locomotive which had been sent off from Lyons. It appears that at this moment they either did not hear the whistle which separated the two locomotives was not sufficient for them to be able to prevent a collision. They turned the locomotive off the rails, and escaped with wounds more or less severe, one of them is said to have had a leg broken. A second afterwards a frightful noise was heard—the rest is more easy to conceive than to express. At eleven at night the bodies of the dead, which had been placed in the house of one of the keepers of the line, were removed, and put into a waggon to be sent to Lyons. As to the wounded, they were sent to different houses where the first assistance that they required could be given to them. It is thought that many of them will not recover. The directors of the railroad state the number of killed to be eight, and the wounded fourteen, besides several cases of slight or mild on."

DISTURBANCES AT MALTA.—The Malta Times gives long details of disturbances in that island. The chief facts are these:—A short time ago an order appeared in the streets saying that this year masks were prohibited on Sunday; upon this, the local press unanimously protested against it, and Sir Patrick Stuart, in his capacity of Governor, on Sunday arrived; at the early hour of one o'clock P.M. the streets began to fill with people; some characters without masks made their appearance, amongst which were several imitations of Protestant clergymen, with books in their hands, paraded the streets, and now the uproar began; the cheering, the hissing, the whistling, and hooting around the palace and Protestant church were at times perfectly deafening. The Inspector of Police and his adjutant used every effort to persuade some of the mock clergymen to retire, but his gentlemanly and moderate manner met with bad success; he was hooted and hissed by hundreds of persons of the lowest class with a fury that could find its parallel in the war-dances of the Indians. He retired; and (adds the Malta Times) in another part of the town, amongst other personal insults, something was thrown at his head, which occasioned a considerable fracture with his left foot. It is unnecessary to recount all the police forces, to which the Governor, and advised the removal of all the police forces, to which his Excellency consented. In the evening, hooting and hissing were very freely indulged in by the mob; troops were called out, and these and the police took into custody 29 persons. Two persons, convicted by the magistrates of having insulted the person who was with the mob against the band of the 42nd Highlanders, as also against the Malta Fencibles, was condemned to 15 days' imprisonment, and two other persons were condemned to six days, redeemable by paying a fine of a large sum of money. On the 9th, the Carnival passed off as usual, and we have not heard of an unpleasant accident."

THE POLISH CONSPIRACY.—The Augsburg Gazette states, from Vienna, the 28th ult., that General de Collin has been compelled to evacuate the town of Cracow, as the number of troops under his command was too small to resist the rebels, and as he was afraid that they would gain the passages of the Vistula, near Podgorze, and thus extend the insurrection to the interior. He was able to reach and occupy this post without an attack from the rebels. A Frankfort journal states, from Vienna, that several officers have been arrested in Galicia on suspicion of having been concerned in the revolutionary movement.

FIRE AT PHILIPPOPOLIS.—A letter from Adrianople mentions that a part of the town of Philippopolis was burned down on the 12th ultimo The details have not transpired, but the number of houses said to have been destroyed was estimated at 2200. A fire broke out in the Frank quarter of Salonica on the 2nd ult., and several khans were burned to the ground. It was, however, extinguished, and the damage had been done.

[illegible] UNITED STATES.—We have received New York papers to the [illegible] by the packet ship Orleans, Captain Richardson, which left Liverpool on the 1st inst. These journals give an extensive [illegible] correspondence which has taken place between the Governments of Great Britain and the United States respecting the joint occupancy of the Oregon territory. Of this correspondence an analysis will be found on page 168. The Oregon resolutions, which had passed the House of Representatives, were under discussion in the Senate on the 12th of February; and at the close of the sitting the House was adjourned until the 16th, when the subject was to be resumed. Mr. J. M. Clayton spoke at great length in favour of giving the twelve months' notice to Great Britain. Mr. C. said he was in favour of this notice, because it was indispensably necessary, as the first step in the way of securing an honourable peace between the two countries. But he insisted that with the President, and with him alone, should rest the responsibility of giving this notice. The chief magistrate, from his position, was best qualified to judge of the whole matter, and to him should be committed the discretionary power. Mr. Clayton ridiculed the idea of a war being likely to result from giving the notice. Neither the President nor the heads of the War and Navy Departments, nor any member of Congress—speaking ex cathedra had given any intimation of the danger of a war; and, in itself, the measure, so far from having a tendency to produce a rupture in the peaceful relations of the two countries, was the only means of preventing that collision between the two classes of settlers in Oregon which must be expected if the joint occupancy were permitted to continue, and which would almost necessarily lead to a war. The notice, then, was a pacific measure, and as such he was prepared to vote for it. He deprecated war. It was a terrible calamity. England was no conquest for. The United States were not prepared for war. But he did not apprehend any war if the notice were given.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE

The Paris papers of course discuss very fully the success of Sir R. Peel's commercial measure. The result of the division in the House of Commons on Saturday morning was received in Paris by telegraph at mid-day.

The Courrier Français states that the English and French Governments have agreed to a new arbitration on the affair of Mr. Pritchard, at which that gentleman is to have an agent charged to advocate his interests.

Accounts from Algiers of the 23rd ult. have been received in Paris, according to which, Abd-el-Kader had spared Marshal Bugeaud the necessity of blockading the Kabyle mountains by a timely retreat. The following statement is given in the Courrier des Pyrenées:—"It appears that, on the 18th, in the morning, Marshal Bugeaud was at Bargiel Fokra with 2000 men. Abd-el-Kader, with several thousands of Kabyle infantry, under Ben Salem, gave orders for an attack upon the French from the mountain, while he made a détour with his cavalry, so as to fall upon their baggage. But when the credulous mountaineers were opening their fire, Abd-el-Kader, instead of making the circuit which would have led him towards the French camp, entered into a defile, which, passing on the south east of the mountain of the Aoled Asis, descends into the plain of Hamza, to the south of the Jurgura. By means of his telescopes, the Marshal observed this movement. The cavalry, and all the baggage of the Emir, were seen marching along the edges below the snow, and on the flanks of the grand chain, which, at that part, rises to the height of nearly 7700 feet. The French troops were instantly directed to the Sock's encampment, in order, if possible, to come up with, or intercept, the Emir and his Arabs. But he had got too far in advance, and almost all practicable paths, and various other obstacles, were in the way of the Marshal's troops. The unfortunate Arabs were left to pursue all the rest of the day, between 3000 and 4000 of them were driven from their positions, and forced to descend a deep ravine, falling, as they went, under the fire of a battalion stationed at the bottom."

A letter from Algiers of the 25th states, that the Governor-General had arrived, with his column in that city on the previous day. "The troops, which had encamped on the heights of Mouzaia, were in a deplorable state. Most of them had parts with coarse cloth and pieces of skins of animals, were covered with dust. We were much affected by the appearance of these brave troops, which had endured and performed by means of the fatigues all the rest of the day. An enemy and protect our colony."

The hostile character of the intelligence received from Washington and New York is confirmed by many of the Paris papers. Some of them calculate on hostilities between England and the United States. Others La Presse, for example—"think that, after all, there will be no war."

The Moniteur publishes the Royal Ordonnance, approving of the statutes of the Paris and Lyons Railroad Company.

The Débats states that recently M. Edouard Fournier, historical painter, was admitted to the presence of the Queen of England, and presented to her a work entitled, "Voyage d'Henri IV. de France to the Queen of England, at Windsor." His Majesty received it very graciously, and complimented M. Pingret upon it. The work consists of a series of lithographs, retracing the splendid events in the visit of the King of the French to England, and the French papers mention the artist in very favourable terms.

SPAIN.

Our letters from Madrid state that, on the 23rd ult., the Minister of Finance communicated to the Assembly his new plan of finance, which was favourably received. He proposed to reduce the Land tax by only 50,000,000 reals. The budget of receipts was calculated at 1,150,000,000 reals. The budget of expenditure was to undergo no diminution, and that of results was to be reduced by 68,000,000 reals. The Minister, in accord with the Committee on the Estimates, agreed to economise 46,000,000 reals out of the expenses of the different Ministerial departments. The Sinking Fund was to remain untouched. M. Pena y Aguayo promised to do everything he could in the interest of the creditors of the State. The dividends on the debt will continue to be religiously paid. The Cabinet will commence the work by the extinction of the coupons. The tax on house-rent was to be abolished, and that on articles of consumption and the commercial subsidy was to be reduced. The Minister, in conclusion, demanded that the Government be authorised by the Cortes to collect the taxes until the 1st of July, 1846. The financial year is hereafter to begin on the 1st of that month. It was deemed almost certain that M. Martinez de la Rosa would accept the embassy to Paris.

BELGIUM.

It appears from the latest Brussels papers, that the expected dissolution of the Belgian Ministry has taken place. The Eluangeliste announces that a Council was held on Monday, at the residence of M. Van de Weyer, and that, after the termination of the Council, reports of resignations circulated in the Chambre. The Independance is more explicit: it announces that two Cabinet Councils were held—one at the Minister of the Interior's, the other at the Palace, at which the King presided—the subject of discussion in both being the project of law on secondary instruction. It adds in a Postscript: It is affirmed that the Council, not being able to agree, all the Ministers tendered their resignations to the King.

"This state of things," says the Journal de Commerce d'Anvers, "was foreseen by M. Van de Weyer, and wished for by his colleagues of the Catholic party—the latter obeying the orders which they have received, to obtain, at any price, the adjournment of the question of education."

IMPORTANT NEWS FROM THE UNITED STATES.

Intelligence of a very important character has been received from the United States to the 11th ult. The House of Representatives has adopted a course which, by some, is considered almost tantamount to a declaration of war against this country. The Senate has passed a series of resolutions, for the year's notice of the termination of the joint occupancy of Oregon treaty, by a majority of 163 to 84 votes, only three members of the House being absent.

The following are the resolutions themselves:—

"1 Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that the President of the United States cause notice to be given to the Government of Great Britain, that the convention between the United States of America and Great Britain, concerning the territory of the north west coast of America, west of the Stony Mountains, of the 6th August, 1827, signed at London, shall be annulled and abrogated in twelve months after giving such notice.

"2. And be it further resolved, that nothing herein contained is intended to interfere with the right and duty of the President of the United States of the two contracting parties to renew or pursue negotiations for an amicable settlement of the controversy respecting the Oregon territory."

The debate was closed by a speech from Mr. Adams, who persisted in the view that there was no doubt but England would in the end concede peaceably all they required.

The question was immediately to be brought to the test by a division in the Senate; and, at the last dates from Washington, it was estimated that the resolutions would even pass that assembly by a majority of nine or ten members.

The President folds his despatches, and prepares to address Congress, his answer to the demand for information as to the correspondence and state of the negotiations; and, according to this message, and its accompanying despatches, the American Government positively refuses to refer the question to arbitration, and declares that England has no rights whatever in respect of Oregon. This is going to the full extreme of his previous declaration, as made in his first message; and is the more determined and offensive, as coming in the shape of a reply to amicable and honourable overtures from our Minister at Washington.

Of such importance is the business now regarded, that a special vessel was despatched from New York to England, supposed to be chartered by Mr. Pakenham, for the purpose of conveying despatches to England, and, as he no doubt anticipated, with a view to obtain further instructions from his Government.

The accounts from Washington state, that on the 7th, quite unexpectedly, a half past two, p.m., which the House were in committee of the whole on the state of the Union, a message was received from the President of the United States, including the correspondence which has transpired since Mr. Pakenham's last communication on the subject of American foreign relations. The President states that no further correspondence is furnished in answer to the resolutions.

The following is the substance of the important correspondence on the question:—

The first despatch is dated December 13, 1845, and is addressed by Mr. Buchanan to the American Minister in London. He desires Mr. M'Lane to call upon the Earl of Aberdeen, in order to procure the reasons of the warlike preparations then making by England. Mr. M'Lane is also required to give his own opinions as to these preparations.

Jan. 3, 1846.—Mr. M'Lane answers, that on the day [illegible] Mr. Buchanan's letter, he called upon the Earl of Aberdeen, by whom he was received with great kindness. In being difficult to obtain a categorical answer to questions upon so delicate a subject as this, Mr. M'Lane put his questions frankly and received frank answers. Definite and precise information was not expected. The Earl of Aberdeen, however, informed him that the preparations making for defence had reference to the possibility of a rupture between England and the United States. They, however, had no particular reference to the possibility of such a rupture; that they were commenced before any difficulties between the two countries were reasonably apprehended—that they would have been made had not the difficulties between the two countries existed—that he believed the nature of these preparations had been overstated: that they had no reference to the defence of remote places, but to all places peculiarly exposed. They were defences proper in time of peace to meet the possible dangers of a war, and such as every prudent nation would make for the security of its own Government. In conclusion, he again declares that the defences made and making have no reference to the United States.

For himself, Mr. M'Lane says, his opinions are that the preparations have no immediate reference to the United States. They originated, in his judgment, in reference to the state of affairs in Europe. Mr. M'Lane says that his interview confirmed him in the unabated confidence he had before entertained in the frankness and straightforwardness of the Earl of Aberdeen. Mr. M'Lane further says that he is not prepared to state how far the United States have a right to demand a disclaimer from England in making preparations for the defence of the country.

On the 27th of December, 1845, our Minister, Mr. Pakenham, sends a letter to Mr. Buchanan, in which he says that, under instructions from his Government, he now renews the offer to refer the question of the disputed part of the territory to any Sovereign or State which may be jointly agreed upon by the two Governments. It is agreed that the effects of this reference will be conducive to the best interests of the two countries that it would have been better for both had the United States previously accepted it. The fact that England consents to renew the offer affords proof to the world of the fact that she still retains the highest confidence in her own claims, and of her sincere desire to preserve the peace between both countries.

Mr. Pakenham, in the same letter, speaks of the smallness of the territory disagreed about, compared with the importance of preserving the friendly relations between two such Governments as England and the United States.

On the 3rd of January, 1846, Mr. Buchanan replies that, as the proposition submitted merely names a partition of the territory in dispute to be referred to the powers of arbitration, and not the question of title, he cannot consent to such an arbitration. The very terms of the proposition received would, he says, exclude arbitration upon the question of title to the whole territory, which has been claimed by the United States. The President, he says, does not believe that arbitration would lead to a clearance of difficulties; upon the contrary, he thinks it would involve the two countries in new difficulties. In conclusion, the President expresses the hope that the present aspect of this question may not lead to a disturbance of the friendly relations so happily existing between the two countries.

Mr. Pakenham makes two answers to this letter. In the first he says he will submit the reply of Mr. Buchanan to his Government, and, in a letter dated January 16th, he says that he has reflected upon the letter of Mr. Buchanan, dated the 3rd, declining, for reasons named, to accept arbitration in the form proposed. He now wishes to state to the American Secretary of State that England has claims to the Oregon territory more incompatible with the exclusive claim set up by the United States. But, supposing the British Government would consent to refer the entire question of title to arbitration, thus removing the form of reference objected to by Great Britain, he wishes to know if it would be accepted by the United States; and, if there should be objections to the reference to crowned head, he submitted that it might be made to a mixed commission, with an umpire, or to a board of commissioners of legal ability, and in whom both should be a mutual confidence. If such reference should result in a disagreement as to an equitable division of the territory, would the United States agree upon the division which might be recommended?

Mr. Buchanan, in a letter dated the 4th of February, answers this letter. He says at first that the last clause named would prevent the acceptance of arbitration if presented in the form which had been named. The United States, if it would consent to arbitrate at all, would never consent to any other question than that of title. A reason is then given why the United States should not consent to arbitration, and this reason is that he does not believe that the claims and interest of the United States will admit of such an arbitration. The American claims are referred to again, and the whole disputed territory claimed again by the President. The question is presented as one of a very different amount of importance from that between America and England. He says there were 13 degrees of boundary upon the Pacific, and but one good harbour—that the 49th degree of north latitude. The territory would make (as further stated) twenty valuable states, while to England they would be a matter of small advantage. He concludes in the following emphatic and determined expression: "To no power, however great and powerful, nor to any body of its citizens, could the United States cede it to refer a claim of a character like that she possesses to the Oregon country."

The correspondence, having been read, was immediately referred to the Committee of the whole house, and ordered to be printed.

The private letters from Washington speak of the greatest excitement in the house on the reading of the last despatch, so positively declining to refer the matter to arbitration. Great confusion prevailed amongst the members, while some remained most completely by surprise, and could hardly believe it possible that such an apparent crisis could so suddenly have been brought on.

MEXICO

According to the latest advices from Mexico, the province of Yucatan has absolutely declared its independence of Mexico, and is now a separate republic.

This flourishing province is one of the best in the whole republic of Mexico. Its inhabitants are energetic and enterprising, and, if they are determined to be independent, the rest of Mexico cannot re-take them.

Just before the post left Washington, on the 10th ult., despatches, said to be of great importance, had been received from Mexico. The report was that the Mexican Government had actually declared war, and all the public offices had been in a state of great bustle. General Scott, in whom great confidence has been reposed in cases of emergency, had been immediately sent for by the Secretary at War, with whom he remained several hours.

DINNER PARTY AT SIR R. PEEL'S.—Sir Robert and Lady Peel had a grand dinner party on Saturday last, in Whitehall Gardens. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, Count Dietrichstein, [illegible] Minister, the Duke of Wellington and the Baroness de Cetto, the Netherlands Minister and Madame de Dedel, the Danish Minister and Countess Reventlow, the Marquis Lisbo, Baron Moncorvo, the Russian Minister and Baroness Brunow, Baron and Baroness Rehausen, Baron Keller, Count Potocki, Mrs. M'Lane, the Earl of Lincoln, Lord Forester &c. constituted the circle.

THE MASONIC KNIGHTS TEMPLARS.—On Friday (last week), Colonel Tynte, of Halswell, near Bridgewater, in Somersetshire, was unanimously elected Grand Master of the Ancient and Honourable Order of Masonic Knights Templars, as successor to his late Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex. Colonel Tynte's installation will, we hear, shortly take place.

SUDDEN DEATH IN THE STREET.—On Wednesday, Mr. W. Carter held an inquest at the Fountain Tavern, Walworth-road, respecting the death of Mrs. Mary Hilton, aged sixty-eight years, the widow of an artist. The deceased recently resided at No. 34, Frederick-place, Francis-street, Newington, and generally enjoyed good health. On Saturday afternoon, the deceased left home for the purpose of calling upon [illegible], Thomas-street, Walworth, and while on the [illegible] home she fell to the [illegible] in a state of insensibility. A policeman and several foot passengers ran for medical assistance, but none could be obtained; they consequently conveyed her about three quarters of a mile to the station-house in Lockerfields, where the divisional surgeon pronounced life to be extinct. The Jury recorded a verdict of "Died by the visitation of God."

FATAL ACCIDENT.—On Monday, Mr. J. Carpenter, of Greenwich, held an inquest at the Pilot Tavern, East Greenwich, for the purpose of inquiring into the circumstances connected with the respective deaths of Francis Reeves, aged 50, Thomas Burgess, aged 26, and Richard Middleton, aged 28, who lost their lives at Mr. Hall's chemical works, on Saturday last. Mr. Frank Clark Hills, of Camberwell, said that he was a manufacturing chemist. The premises rented the East Greenwich works are witness's property, and were used for manufacturing chemicals. Upon the works were two stills working into one condenser: one an old one, and the other quite new. The latter one was completed on Saturday last by some neglect or accident, a chamber between the two stills had not been filled with water. It was the custom to do so, as by that means the gas generated by one still would ascend to the top of the water, and pass off without entering the other still. It was the place of Middleton to have seen that the water chamber was kept filled. On Saturday last, witness, hearing an alarm, went to the [illegible] and found the three deceased persons therein. Knowing the deadly nature of the gas, witness sent to get his men for a rope, in order that he might [illegible] extricate them by the machine to rescue the men. During the time the man was gone for a rope, a piece of string was picked up by witness, with which he entered the still; but, whilst lifting one of the men, he became overpowered by the noxious vapour, and also fell down. He was, however, picked out alive by some of his men. The deceased had been employed in the same vessel during the week, and one of them had complained of a smell of gas. Middleton was, therefore, cautioned to keep the chamber filled. If such had been done, the accident could not have happened. After hearing some further evidence, the jury returned the following verdict:—"That the deceased died from inhaling sulphureted hydrogen gas, that escaped from a working still into an empty one, owing to the neglect of Richard Middleton (deceased) in not supplying the water to shut off the communication between the two stills."

COURT AND PERSONAL.

THE COURT AT THE ISLE OF WIGHT.—Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the Royal Family continue at Osborne House, Isle of Wight; and, we are happy to say, in the enjoyment of their accustomed good health. The Duchess of Kent has left town for Witley Court, Worcestershire, on a visit to the Queen Dowager.

ILLNESS OF THE EARL OF ERROL.—We regret to state that accounts have reached town of the serious illness, at Paris, of the Earl of Errol, Viscount and Viscountess Campden and Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence have, in consequence, left for the French capital.

THE OVERLAND MAIL FROM INDIA.

FURTHER OPERATIONS AGAINST THE SIKHS.

An Express reached London on Thursday night, with the Bombay Mail of the 6th [illegible] It brings important news from the theatre of war, on the banks of the Sutlej. The British army, of about 43,000 men, is thus described in the Delhi Gazette of the 21st [illegible] January:

			Men
11 Troops of Horse Artillery, say	..	..	1,000
8 Companies of Foot Artillery, about	..	..	600

making the proposed army to consist of 42,480 men, with 140 pieces of ordnance of all sizes. There are also 21 mortars of various sizes under despatch from Delhi.

The army is formed into five divisions of infantry and four brigades of cavalry, with a large brigade staff. The cavalry is commanded by Major-General Sir J. Thackwell, and the infantry divisions by Major-Generals Sir H. G. Smith, W. R. Gilbert, Sir H. Dick, Sir J. H. Littler, and Sir J. Grey.

From the 22nd of December, when the victory was won by the British at Ferozeshah, up to the middle of January, both parties appeared to be preparing for the next important struggle on the north bank of the Sutlej. The Governor-General remained at Ferozepore, engaged in raising the bridge of boats, and in making preparations for the crossing of the river by the British army. The boats, which had been sunk, were found to be somewhat injured, and time was required for their repair. The crossing of the river was expected about the 4th or 6th of February, when the heavy guns which had left Delhi on the 10th of January were expected to have reached the camp.

Sir J. Littler's division was stationed at Attaree, about seven miles from Ferozepore; the head-quarters of the Commander-in-Chief were at Arufkee, twelve miles from Ferozepore; and Sir Harry Smith's force was at Aliwal, the others, not far from Hurreeke Puttun, which is one of the great fords of the Sutlej.

In the meantime the Lahore Government was making every effort to reorganize its army. Several attempts had been made in different places to cross the river. A strong force was collected at Phallour, opposite to Loduanah. This force was under the command of the great Sikh army stationed on the way from Hurreeke ghat to Lahore and its neighbourhood, with the object of preventing the capital.

Some skirmishing took place near the Sikh bridge of boats on the 13th, 14th, and 15th of January, without any remarkable effect. On the 16th, the Sikhs came over the river at Phallour, possessed the neighbourhood, and pitched a camp, on the left bank, in the British territory. On the following days they made some further advances, and intrenched themselves near a nullie. Sir H Smith moved his brigade up the Sutlej, driving every enemy before him, and, the 21st, in the morning, when he came upon one of the fortified positions of the enemy, which fired grape shot amongst the British troops. Some of the native troops were said to have thrown down their arms, and to have fled, leaving the Europeans to bear the brunt of the battle. Her Majesty's 53d and 31st were engaged, and are said to have suffered severely, but they demanded to be led anew to the fight, which Sir Harry Smith did not deem it prudent to do, and therefore withdrew the troops. The Agra Ukbar construes the retirement into a defeat; while the Delhi Gazette states, that heavy firing was heard in the direction of Lodianan, during the whole of the afternoon at that day. Nothing positive appears to have been known as to the results of that day when the mails were leaving Bombay.

The preparations of the Governor-General at Ferozepore appear to be of an efficient nature, and it was supposed that the British army would move over the Sutlej, and, before the hot weather set in, in April, take possession of Lahore, the Sikh capital, which is not 50 miles from the Sutlej. There is said to be considerable dissension amongst the Sikh chiefs, many of whom have made propositions to the British authorities, declaring their willingness to join the British standard as soon as it appeared on the right bank of that river. It was supposed that the Sikh troops would try another battle before they would allow their capital to be taken.

The gallant conqueror of Scinde, Sir Charles Napier, was again in the field, and, at the head of about 15,000 Bombay and 5000 Bengal troops, was expected to cause a powerful diversion, by proceeding to attack and to conquer Moultan, and the southern provinces of the Sikh dominions. The very name of Sir Charles Napier inflicts dread among the native inhabitants of the banks of the Indus, and of the five rivers of the Punjaub; he is called by them Sheetanka thase, "the Devil's brother." His troops received to be in movement towards the enemy's frontiers on the 16th of February.

The latest intelligence from the Bombay troops in its expedition describes them as in the highest spirits, for they look forward to victory for themselves, and even to a harvest for their exceedingly limited pay.

The late attempts to produce sedition amongst the troops and inhabitants of Dhanpore, Patna, &c., have failed, and the ringleaders have been arrested and punished.

The latest intelligence from Upper Scinde states, that her Majesty's 86th Regiment had reached Kotree [illegible] Hyderabad, on the Indus, under Captain Jacob, and proceed to Sukkur [illegible] troops had joined them. A circumstance had occurred in the Sikh territory, near Bhawulpore, which it may be useful to explain. Captain Brown, the chief of the Scinde mounted police, went about ten miles into the Sikh district in pursuit of a robber. The head of the village promised to surrender the robber; but, instead of doing so, he collected a number of horsemen (said to be 300), and proceeded to attack the Scinde party. The fire volley killed three men. This proves the spirit of the Sikh authorities to the southward. Moultan was quiet; but great efforts were made to restore the fortifications, as a siege was expected.

An augmentation has been ordered of five regiments of irregular cavalry to the Bengal army, and of three regiments of infantry to that of Bombay.

The Bombay Railway, or, as it is called, the Great Indian Peninsular Railway, has not been successful. The engineers who have examined the districts through which it is to pass into the interior, have found far more facilities for the undertaking than they ever expected.

The utmost tranquillity prevails in the interior of India.

The accounts which have reached us by this Mail fully confirm the Duke of Wellington's prediction and just defence of her Majesty's 62nd Regiment from the stigma so hastily cast upon it by Major-General Littler. It did not flinch until considerably more than half its officers and men were swept from its ranks by a fire of the most furious and destructive description.

Among the Parliamentary papers just issued is a letter from Sir H. Hardinge to the Secret Committee of the India Board, dated Dec. 31, 1845, in which the Governor-General gives a clear and straightforward narrative of the events which preceded a resort to arms. This correspondence in these terms:—

I have now to conclude this despatch by expressing my deep concern for the [illegible] the action of the 21st instant, of that most invaluable officer, Major Broadfoot, my political agent for these states. He was wounded, and thrown off his horse at my side, but I failed in preventing on him to retire. He remounted his horse, and, shortly afterwards, received a mortal wound in leading on the troops against the battery in our front. I entertained the highest opinion of his abilities. He was second to none in his accomplished service, in every qualification by which the political or military merits of the [illegible] can be advanced; and I shall be most gratified if, at a [illegible] some special mark of honour can be conferred, by which his great merits and glorious death may be perpetuated.

Major George Broadfoot was the last of three brothers who held appointments in the Company's army, and all these have fallen in battle in the service of the country.

Captain Nicholson, assistant political agent from Ferozepore, was also killed in the action of the 21st inst., and was a most able and gallant officer.

Captain Abbott and Lieutenant Lake, assistants under Major Broadfoot, were wounded, and have ever since continued their exertions.

Captain Mills, assistant political agent at Lodiana, took the command of a troop of Horse Artillery during the action, and has subsequently been of the greatest use by his intelligence and activity.

I owe great obligations to the Chief Secretary of the Government of India, Frederick Currie, Esq., who has, during all the various and sometimes conflicting duties in which I have been engaged, given his sound advice and active aid, sometimes accompanying me in the field, and at all times evincing the coolest judgment, and exhibiting the resources of his experience, to the great advantage of the Company's service.

Mr Cust, of the civil service, confidential assistant to Major Broadfoot, both in the field and in his own immediate department, has shown great intelligence in duties which were new to him, and I notice him as a most promising officer.

SKETCHES IN THE PUNJAUB, AND THE COUNTRY OF THE SIKHS.

In illustration of the localities of our late Victories in India, we have engraved a very interesting series of characteristic sketches from the pencil of G. T. Vigne, Esq., F.G.S., the author of "Travels in Kashmir, Ladeck, Iskarde," &c.; "A Personal Visit to Ghuznee, Kabul, and Afghanistan:" works alike recommended by the accuracy and picturesqueness of their details.

These Illustrations comprise Portraits, and specimens of the scenery of the Punjaub; to which we affix a few descriptive notes.

GENERAL VENTURA.

General Ventura served under Napoleon in the French army, after which he proceeded to the Court of Runjeet Singh. At first, the Maharajah received him coldly, but his distrust having been entirely removed, he, with the spirit of a man of genius, admitted Ventura into his service, appointing him instructor of his troops in the European system of drill and warfare. The General was of great service to the Maharajah both in the field and in the training of his forces; but he was blamed for not being sufficiently pliant and refined for a Court. Both at Lahore and in India he was acknowledged to be a man of high honour.

GENERAL VENTURA.

GENERAL VENTURA'S HOUSE.

General Ventura's House, built by himself and General Allard, at Lahore, though of no great size, combines the splendour of the East with the comforts of a European residence. On the walls of the entrance-hall, before a range of pillars on the first story, are pourtrayed the reception of the two French officers at the Court of Runjeet Singh; consisting of many thousand figures. The second room is adorned with a profusion of small mirrors in gilt frames, which have an excellent effect; the third is a large hall, extending the entire width of the house, and terminating in the sleeping apartments. At a short distance, behind the house, is an ancient tomb, crowned with a lofty dome; standing in the midst of the garden, which has been laid out with great taste, it forms a striking contrast to the surrounding sandy plain. This spot overlooks an arm of the Ravi, and, eastward, the old city and Necropolis of Lahore, with countless dilapidated buildings and tombs, which, in parts, form small hillocks, without any apparent vestiges of regular edifices.

The neighbourhood of Lahore abounds in saltpetre, which soon destroys any walls that may be left standing.

On the death of Noo Nahal Singh, Shere Singh ascended the throne; when the soldiers, (being instigated to revolt by the Queen—Noo Nahal Singh's mother), attacked General Ventura's house, and completely stripped everything, even to the bare walls—the General himself narrowly escaping assassination.

SIKH OFFICER.

Twenty-three years since, the military force of the Punjaub consisted of a large and undisciplined horde; but recently the Sikh army was considered to have attained a fair state of discipline. They form correct lines, but in manœuvring their movements are slow. The muskets are very inferior, and incapable of throwing a ball to any distance, and on quick and repeated discharges are liable to burst. Their firing is bad, owing to their want of practice. They still present the old system of three ranks, the front one kneeling when firing, and then rising to load.

In person, the infantry soldiers are tall and thin, with good features and full beards; their height is owing to the extraordinary length of their lower limbs, and they are capable of enduring great fatigue. The Sikh cavalry is very inferior, in every respect, to the infantry. The Jemidar, or Lieutenant, has thirty rupees a month, with which he feeds and clothes himself; and as all are allowed to dress as they like, there is a strange medley of costumes.

SUCHET SINGH.

After the death of Shere Singh, and the overthrow of his murderer, Ajeet Singh, by Rajah Heera Singh, the latter placed on the throne Dhuleb Singh, the present Rajah, a boy of ten years of age, and made himself Minister. This roused the jealousy of his uncle, Rajah Suchet Singh, chief of the army at Peshawur, who resolved to supplant him as Minister. He, accordingly, left Jummoo for Lahore, with a small force, in the hopes of gaining over the troops stationed there. He, however, found himself completely mistaken, for Heera Singh, who had notice of his uncle's intentions, assembled and harangued the troops, and, by his promises, so prevailed upon them, that, upon Suchet Singh's arrival at Lahore, he was not joined by a single soldier. In despair he shut himself up, with his followers, in a temple about three miles distant from Lahore: this was soon attacked by several thousand of the Maharajah's troops, and, although the party defended themselves for three hours with the greatest bravery, they were all cut off to a man.

SIKH AT PRAYERS.

Nanac Shah, the son of a salt-merchant, and from his infancy a devout Hindoo, was so strongly impressed with the virtue of charity, that he did not hesitate to bestow his capital for the relief of wandering faquirs. He gave to the poor all he earned, and at length renounced secular occupations, and became a faquir. The unity and omnipresence of God were the tenets he enforced; and the immediate object which his teaching professed to have was to reconcile the conflicting faiths of the Hindoo and the Mahomedan. The result was a very extensive conversion of his countrymen from the Brahminical and Mahomedan religions to a belief in pure Deism. The new disciples of Nanac called themselves Sikhs, a term derived from the Sanscrit, signifying instruction.

The precepts upon which the Sikh religion is now founded may be thus briefly stated. "There is no God but one God. A hundred thousand of Mahomets, a million of Brahmins, Vishnus, and a hundred thousand Ramas stand at the gate of the Most High. These all perish; God alone is immortal."

MESSENGER CAMEL OF INDIA.

PUNJAUB FERRY-BOAT.

The road from Bilaspoor to the frontier ferry, which skirts the river, is paved with flint stones about a foot in diameter, and as often loose as not, dislodging the unsteady foot of a luckless wayfarer, and knocking it violently to one side or the other; the natives, however, step lightly over these stones without once stumbling. For a mile onward, the road adjoins the left bank of the Sutlej; it then leads to a rapid brook, and thence to the ferry-boat, which is nothing more or less than a square box of wood strongly put together, and having different partitions a foot high. The natives swim across the river with the half of an ox's skin inflated with wind in an ingenious way. Having carried this on their shoulders to the shore, they spread themselves upon it on the water, laying fast hold with one hand, while they strike the water with a piece of timber in the other.

MESSENGER CAMEL.

A race of Camels, of which the annexed is a specimen, are bred for speed; their heads and necks are shaven, and they have a leg like a race-horse; they have been known to travel nine hundred miles in eight days; and their enduring swiftness would be almost incredible, were it not corroborated by the best authorities, who all agree in the accounts of the speed of the "Heirie," "El Heria," or "Maherry of the Desert." "When thou shalt meet a Hairie," say the Arabs, in their poetical mode of expression, "and say to the rider, 'Salem Aleik,' ere he shall have answered thee 'Aleik Salem,' he will be far off, and nearly out of sight; for his swiftness is like the wind."

The "Sabayee," of which the above is an illustration, is the fastest breed of the swift Dromedary, and will travel with ease 630 miles in five days.

COLONEL WADE'S HOUSE.

Colonel Sir Claude Wade, universally known and respected for his hospitality, was British Resident at Loodiana, and the Dragoman acting at the interview between Lord Auckland, when Governor-General of India, and Runjeet Singh; which, from its splendour, has been justly likened to "the Field of the Cloth of Gold."

HOUSE OF COLONEL WADE, AT LODIANAH.

GOSSIP OF THE WEEK.

Our brother Jonathan becomes more and more insolent in his tone and arrogant in his demands. The House of Representatives have decided, by a majority of three to one, that notice shall be given for annulling the convention of 1827, by which joint occupation of the Oregon territory was secured for the time being.

If Arbuthnot and Swift had been writing just now, they would not have let slip this opportunity of adding an instructive chapter to their "History of John Bull."

We venture, with fear and trembling, to try our hand at a continuation of that immortal work.

How John Bull, being of a peaceable turn of mind, allowed himself to be bullied; and of the scandalous behaviour of his brother Jonathan.

Well, matters had, by this time, been settled pleasantly enough between John Bull and the Baboons. The present head of that family, (who was of the younger branch, and called Lewis Philippe Baboon), was a more long-headed fellow than most of the name. He had been kicked out into the world to get his own livelihood, in the great smash of the Baboon family, in 1798; and, being of an industrious turn, and able to set his hand to all sorts of odd jobs, he made money, while his elder brothers were starving on such bits and scraps as they could pick up from the friends of the family who had known them in better days, and would give them some broken victuals, often a night's lodging, and others an old coat or so. Lewis Philippe scraped on, and soon got such a character for driving a bargain knowingly, and seeing deeper into a mill-stone than most men, that, when the old Baboon estate had fallen into a sad, ricketty state, in the hands of the last squire, Charles—and he was turned out of doors by the bailiff—the creditors offered Lewis Philippe the house rent free, on condition of his managing the land for their benefit. Once in, there was no getting him out again. He soon gave himself the airs of an owner of the property, and when the unfortunate creditors came for their interest, he would use very bad language to them, and occasionally lock them up in one of the strong rooms. Nevertheless he lived on good terms with his neighbours, and, by sending the most disorderly of the creditors on fool's errands, a long way off, to catch a notorious fellow, one Abd-El-Kader (who continued to give them full employment and broken heads into the bargain), he kept things quiet and smooth, and a good roof over his head. He and John Bull became great cronies. It was "My good friend Baboon," and "My worthy John," every day of the week; and many a good barrel of beer and cwt. of ripe Cheshire cheese (for which John was famous), went as a present to Baboon's house, and he would send John all sorts of nick-nacks in return. Nay, he had Mrs. Bull staying with him, and very many junkettings and pick-nicks, and what-not, they had together.

John began to think all his troubles at an end. He gave up soldiering, and told his tenants to get rid of their muskets, and belts, and sabres, for good hoes and spades and spinning jennies. They took his advice, and you would never have guessed, so quiet and peaceable seemed John Bull's property, that he had ever been bothered by rumbustious neighbours at all.

One day, however, as John was sitting watching from his parlour window some of the tenants, who were amusing themselves with trucking, one a hat, another a shirt, another a loaf or bread, with some visitors from the neighbouring properties, he got a letter with a tremendous red seal stamped with an eagle and a very heavy postage. "What's this?" says John, turning the letter over, "it smells woundily of tobacco-smoke, and the cover is none of the cleanest." After turning it about for a minute or two, he catches sight of the post-mark; and "I'll be hanged," he rapped out, "if it isn't from that wild young brother of mine, Jonathan, who emigrated ever so long ago. I hope he don't want to borrow any more money of me." This brother Jonathan, you must know, had left the country in a huff, and set up, on a property originally belonging to John, in America, from which he used to send John very abusive letters, calling him all manner of hard names, and generally winding up with a request for a loan. John had acted in a brotherly way enough; and, more than once, or twice either, sent the money on Jonathan's acceptances, which were never taken up, somehow

Jonathan's letter was to this effect:—

"DEAR JOHN,—There's a field on my estate here which, you may remember, we had a dispute about. You had some claims to it, and we agreed not to go to law on the subject, but to let my tenants cultivate one half, and you the other. Now I don't mean to stand this any longer. My mind's been expanding very much lately, and I've been walking into a deal of property, and I guess, by the time I've turned out, talk very big, and don't like it—naturally enough; but I calculate I can wop them to tarnal smash (this was a way of speaking Jonathan had taken up since he went abroad), so I don't mind much what they say. I've got their land in a chronic, and I want your half of the cursed field. So, I'll thank you to give notice to your tenants to turn out, bag and baggage, or I'll be down among you some fine morning, and darned if I don't shoot the first man that refuses to give up possession. So, no more at present from your loving brother, as you behave yourself,

"JONATHAN BULL."

John was in a tremendous passion when he read this. His first notion was nothing short of guns and blunderbusses. "The saucy vagabond! the cheating, impudent rogue! I'll teach him to be setting up his claims and expanding his mind, I will. Here, John, Thomas, go to the gun-room, and furbish up the old volunteer muskets—and ask the housekeeper for some powder—and cut up a bit of spouting for bullets. If Jonathan sets a foot on my part of the field, I'll give him a brace of lead pills to cool his hot head, I will." And here John let off a volley of oaths that astonished everybody within hearing.

However, on second thoughts, he began to reflect, that Jonathan could never be in earnest in such a piece of rascality. Though he had borrowed money and never repaid it, and though he was in the habit of bullying John for a cowardly, wife-ridden, Jerry-Sneak of a fellow, still John had a sneaking kindness for the lad. And, ever since he had gone to America, John had been in the habit of sending him all sorts of useful things from his manufactory, which Jonathan was very glad to pay for in the produce of his land, of which he had more than he knew what to do with. And, if the truth must be told, John had driven a very good trade of this kind, and had made many a pound out of Jonathan.

So he sends off one of his lads with a letter for his brother, and offers to take all the corn Jonathan could send him, free of all turnpikes and tolls, which had hitherto been very heavy, and put Jonathan to a deal of expense. John thought this would make Jonathan ashamed of himself; for Jonathan was always talking about justice and enlightenment, and the march of intellect, and such fine phrases; and John, really, had some belief in his high-flying language, being himself in the habit of meaning what he said.

Well, instead of this politely offer having the desired effect, it made Jonathan worse than ever. He sent back an answer, in which he rejected all John's offers of submitting their claims to the arbitration of a friend or a court of justice, and fairly told him "he was a cowardly, sneaking fellow, and afraid to fight it out."

This set John's back up at once. He was as brave an old gentleman as ever stood up in a fair fight. "Oh, that's your notion, is it?" says he; "I'll soon let you know who's afraid." So he goes down to the gun-room, where he hadn't been for many a day, and begins scouring up the old pieces, and calling for powder and shot, and sponges and rammers, and what not, in a style that set his poor housekeeper fairly in a trantic

And here for the present we leave Mr. Bull. What came of it all, we propose to make the subject of a future chapter.

A VEGETABLE TITAN. On Tuesday evening, there was brought to our office a monster specimen of White Brocoli, grown by Mr. George Hide, opposite the Railway Station, Boney-lane, Hertford. Its weight, freed from the [illegible] and the diameter over the flower is [illegible] inches. It is absolutely named, from its great size, "the Cauliflower Brocoli."

TROOPS FOR INDIA.—The 7th Hussars have received orders to move from the Cape of Good Hope to the Indian Seas. The [illegible] 16th Hussars, now at York, [illegible] Lieutenant-Colonel Valentine Quentin Baker, is [illegible] to be promoted to 700 men. [illegible] onwards; the 8th and 32nd Regiments [illegible] Foot, also to be augmented to 1,000 rank, are also under orders for our Oriental [illegible] —which, by the above arrangement, will make an addition of about 3,700 British troops

A GRAND TOURNAMENT was held on the 15th ult., at the Palace of the Chiaja, at Naples, in honour of the Empress of Russia; and proved the most gorgeous assemblage of rank and beauty seen in Naples for some years. We hope to illustrate this magnificent spectacle in our next week's journal.

MUSIC.

BEETHOVEN'S "RUINS OF ATHENS."—PRINCESS' THEATRE.

An extraordinary undertaking was attempted for the first time on Thursday night at the Princess' Theatre, in the production of a Dramatic Masque, called "The Ruins of Athens," written and set to music by Beethoven, on the occasion of the immortal Beethoven. This composer wrote a work under this title, "Die Ruinen von Athen," for the opening of a new theatre in Pesth, in 1812, the libretto by Kotzebue; and in 1823, on the birth-day of the Emperor Francis, at the opening of the new theatre in the Josephstadt, in Vienna, it was revived with a new text adapted to time and place, by Carle Meisel, several new pieces, and a new overture. Schindler, in his Life of Beethoven, states that the music was a total failure, for want of necessary rehearsals. At the Philharmonic Society, in the season 1844, under Mendelssohn's direction, some pieces were given from it. "The Ruins of Athens" with success, and so recently as the second Conservatoire Concert, in Paris, in January last, the March, and Chorus of Dancing Dervishes, excited a great sensation. The original drama of Kotzebue opens in a dark cavern, in which Minerva has been a prisoner for 2000 years, as a punishment, by Jupiter, for not having saved the life of Socrates. Mercury is at length sent to announce the end of her captivity. She desires to see Athens, the city where the Goddess of Wisdom was formerly worshipped, but transports her to the spot, and the second scene displays "The Ruins of Athens." The Goddess is amazed at the change. She interrogates a young Greek and Greek maiden; but, alas! a degenerated Hellenic maiden her delusion is cut, instead of the divine language of Homer, Plato, Anacreon, and Demosthenes. She is disgusted with the ignorance of the descendants of Miltiades and Themistocles; but her indignation is provoked to the highest degree when the Temple of the Winds is desecrated by Musselman Dervishes, who invoke the names of Allah and the Prophet, and dance with fanatical fury to Kotzebue revolts at these absurdities, the climax of her disgust is attained when a troop of Janizaries enter, and want to remove a sarcophagus to make a manger for the Pacha's horse. The Goddess implores Mercury to take her away from Athens, and conducts her to the spot where the Goddess Muse of the "great exportium of the world," with Victory and Victory reign as sisters. The winged messenger triumphantly indicates the statue of "The Duke!"—the trophy of a hundred victories. Minerva exclaims

The hero never dies
He lives in the remembrance of the past.

The scene changes to the interior of a (not the) temple dedicated to Apollo and the Muses, and Shakspeare's leading characters pass in procession. A group of Fairies from the "Midsummer Night's Dream," Prospero and Ariel open the speech "The cloud-capt towers," &c., the witches of Macbeth are pursued before Minerva; after a supplication from the priest of Apollo, the statue of Shakspeare rises, and the Goddess presents it with an olive crown. Prospero delivers a panegyrical effusion from Mercury, who recites Milton's epitaph, "What needs any Shakspeare for his honoured bones," the chorus winds up the piece "Hail! mighty master, hail!"

We regret to state that the resources of the establishment were not equal to the just execution of Beethoven's music. Both orchestra and chorus were at fault, and at times almost broke down. Such a spectacle, with the resources of a great lyrical establishment, might have told for a single occasion, but at the Princess' it was out of place. The audience evidently had no understanding of the matter, and laughed or hissed when their eyes were not gratified by a scene or the procession. Mrs. Stirling's Mercury was beautifully recited, but the Minerva of Mrs. Brougham was very mysterious. Leffler and Miss Smithson were the Greek slaves, and introduced a couple of Beethoven's airs, but produced little effect. The muse en scene was worthy of a better fate. The view of the Ruins of Athens was very fine, but that of the Royal Exchange was applied by a vivacious wag to the Duke of Wellington. The Shakspearian procession was extremely well mounted. The whole company joined in it, not excepting Wallack, who crossed the stage as Hamlet. The dance of the Dervishes was very well done; Mr. Leffler's performance of the principal character displeased himself. A more vivid picture of a wild fanatic could not be imagined. It was not appreciated by the audience, from their ignorance of the existence of a sect of dancing Dervishes. He looked much better the two evenings he again round on the heel the longest. The red fire at the close on the Shakspearian group, did not prevent the house from dividing into two strong parties at the termination, but we think the "ayes" carried it. The house was crowded.

THE SINGING CLASSES.

A second Choral Meeting was held at Exeter Hall, on Wednesday night, in aid of the Hullah Testimonial Fund, for the erection of a Music Hall for the singing classes on the Wilhelm method. It was well attended, and there were several encores; but, at last, Mr. May, the conductor, was obliged to demand a cessation of the compliment. Mendelssohn's part song, "For the fair and gay," madrigals, by Bennett and Ford, were the best specimens. Crotch's beautiful motet, written for Bartleman, "Methinks I hear," was allotted to Mr. W. H. Seguin and semi-chorus. Miscellaneous pieces were from Haydn, Rimaut, Danby, Hullah, Lord Mornington (father of the Duke of Wellington), Callcott, Horsley, Telemann, Jannaconi, Croce, Tallis, &c

QUARTETT CONCERTS.

Mr. Dando's second Concert, at Crosby Hall was given on Monday evening. Mozart's Quartett in E flat, No. 4, Op. 10; Mesdarmen's Quartett, No. 2, in F major, dedicated to Spohr; Beethoven's Quartett, No. 1, in F minor, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello; and Onslow's Quartett in G major, Op. 35, for two violins, viola, violoncello, and double bass, comprised the instrumental scheme. The vocal bands and ballads (Hime and Leonard Lee, pianos), Hill (viola), Lucas (violoncello), Pratten (double bass), and pianoforte, Mr W. Dorrell; all good men and true. Miss Steele, an intelligent vocalist, sang songs by Purcell and Mendelssohn. The next concert will be on the 23rd instant.

ORGAN PERFORMANCE

On Monday night, Mr. Adams, the celebrated organist, tried the qualities of an instrument built for Trinity Chapel, by messrs. Gray and Davidson, at their manufactory in the New-road. The new organ is a good specimen of the builders, but is deficient in brilliancy and homogeneity. Our system of organ construction is still very much in arrear of the continental improvements. The Vox humana and Keraulophon stops, alleged to be new in the Trinidad organ, will be found in Mr. Hill's Improvements.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

We are glad to find from a Milan letter, published in Thursday's Morning Chronicle, that the reports current of the failures of English singers at the Scala are satisfactorily explained. It appears that Miss Birch, Miss Hayes, and Mrs. Bishop, were announced in lieu of first-rate artistes, whereas the two former were only débutantes; and as the Milanese public had long been at warfare with the manager, our countrywomen were made the victims. After seven operas and six prime donne had been condemned, the Committee of Censors stepped in; and it was expected that the obnoxious manager would be removed, and a committee formed to take the direction.

Miss Bassano, formerly a pupil of the Royal Academy of Music, had met with great success in Italy. Lindley, the English pianist, was creating quite a furore at Berlin; and Mr. Travers, the tenor, in Sardzo. It is gratifying to hear of these successes of our countrymen.

From Paris our musical budget is scanty. Grisi had her benefit at the Italian Opera house last Monday, and played Norma, Persiani singing also in one act of the "Somnambula." Mdlle. Rosati and Duprez were also electrifying the Académie Royale audiences. Carlotta Grisi had reappeared with éclat. A new ballet, "Paquita, ou le Portrait," was in rehearsal for her. Last was at Weimar, composing an opera for this great lyrical establishment. Nicolai had written an opera to Shakspeare's "Merry Wives of Windsor," which, it will be recollected, was selected for Balfe's clever work of "Falstaff." The Duke of Coburg's opera had been quite successful at Gotha. Rietzschel has completed a new symphony, and nearly finished his oratorio. Lindpaintner, the Stuttgart Director of Music, has written an opera for Fischek. Madrid letters describe a duel that had taken place between two bards, Bartolini and Salvatore, because the former accused the latter of "shouting" in the Trumpet Duo from the "Puritani," which compliment was answered by a blow. They fought with sabres, and Bartolini received a wound in the arm, which nearly prevented him ever "shouting" again; but he was out of danger at the last account, whilst his rival had fled.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

On Monday night the fifth meeting of the Choral Harmonists and the first concert of the Beethoven Quartett Society. On Tuesday Mr. Sporle's Concert at Crosby Hall. On Wednesday the last Amateur Concert, the Earl of Gosford director. On Friday Miss Mounsey's sixth Soirée Concert. The "Crusaders" every night at Drury-lane Theatre, and her Majesty's Theatre Tuesday and Saturday. The Edinburgh Theatres continue their successful career. Mr. Bunn's, St. James's Theatre on the off nights of the French plays. Mr. Braham and Miss M. B. Hawes appeared, for the first time since their domestic afflictions, last Monday at Bath. Mr. Anderson's Concert, in the Queen's Concert Room, was well attended. Beethoven's Quintett in C, Op. 29, and Mozart's Quintett, in E, played by Miss Macerone, and Beethoven's Quartett No. 5, and Quintett No 1, comprised the programme, the players being Sainton, Goodwin, Tolbecque, Hill, and Lucas. At Queen's Concert of Ancient Direction, was given at Hanover-square Rooms, for the benefit of the widow of the late Mr. Linley, at which Miss [illegible], the Misses Pyne, [illegible] Hobbs, Lockey, Phillips, Lucas, Howell, &c., [illegible] Braham and Hague [illegible] (Saturday), the Catch [illegible] Ear. Howe will be the [illegible] this year, at the 108th Festival of the Royal Society of Musicians.

A drama, in three acts, founded upon Rodwell's romance, "The Memoirs of an Umbrella," is in active preparation, and is to be brought out on Easter Monday, at the ADELPHI Theatre. Charles Dance writes the piece, and Rodwell himself composes the music.

THE THEATRES.

RE-OPENING OF HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

It is very difficult to impart to those of our readers who were not present an adequate idea of such a scene as that we witnessed on Tuesday night. Its splendour—its varied points of interest—the effect produced by the performers, the like of which we have not heard since this great theatre closed its portals last year—the novelty of the whole—all combined to produce the most exciting effect, in which the whole audience appeared to participate.

From the beginning of the evening, surprise and delight were the prevailing sentiments; and truly, that falsely-accused personage, John Bull, had need of more phlegm than is attributed to him, if ever a scene had put kindled his enthusiasm and it was loudly expressed when the sudden lighting of the theatre revealed its beauties

The appearance of Mr. Balfe, taking his stand as leader of the orchestra, was the occasion for another tumult of applause quite overwhelming

To proceed, however, to an event deeply interesting to our love of musical art—the production of Verdi's opera, "Nabucco" or "Nino!" the latter is the new denomination. This opera the first by which the young composer achieved his exalted reputation, and which has been received abroad with enthusiasm as a truly remarkable work. It is decidedly the best of the highest order. This is shown in the splendid finale of the first act—commencing with the charming terzettino, which has been for some time already a favourite with English dilettanti; the canon preceding the grand finale of Nino, in the second act; the duet, "Oh! di qual onta," between the latter and Abigail in the third act, in which the voices are made to combine in the most exquisite manner; the charming chorus, "Va pensiero," flowing and pleasing; and the final prayer, "Terribil fede," sung without instrumental accompaniment.

These morceaux require to be studied in detail, for their beauties to be fully appreciated; but they, nevertheless, produce, at first hearing, an effect which pieces abounding, as they do, in imagination and remarkable excellence of construction, do not always obtain. They are, moreover, highly characteristic. The opening recitative, "Gli arredi tolti all'ara," is full of grandeur and characteristic, and altogether peculiar in its construction. The first aria of Orotope is very remarkable in point of composition. The first part of the solo of Abigail, which is rendered by Mlle. Lorini, is admirable, and produces a deep impression on ourselves; the second part is very good, and characteristic of the vengeful Amazon. The prayer, for soprano, at the end of the opera, "Oh, dischiuso è il firmamento," is a charming little piece of melody. In the music of this opera, the composer has shown himself possessed of all the legitimate sources of success. It bears the stamp of genius and deep thought, and its effect upon the audience proved that its merits were appreciated.

The new libretto of "Nino," alias "Nabucco," is taken from the ancient history of the Assyrians and Babylonians, at the epoch when those two nations were distant. The plot, which is full of interest, is very complex, is engaged in exterminating the Babylonians. He profanes their temple, insults their faith, and finally falls a victim to the vengeance of Iaa. He goes mad. His supposed daughter, Abigail, obtains possession of the kingdom, to the exclusion of his lawful heiress, Fenena, who is about to be sacrificed with the Babylonians, whose faith she has embraced, when Nino, repenting of his evil deeds, recovers his reason in time to save her from the fatal destiny. Such is very clever adaptation of its plot to incidents so thoroughly English that we lose all traces of its foreign origin. Indeed, had we not been acquainted with the original piece, "The Irish Post," for so it is called, would have passed off for a thorough bred, home-made, native farce. If we mistake not, a version of the same play was produced some time ago at the Princess' Theatre, and entitled "The Lost Letter." The hero of the farce, Mr. Terence O'Grady (Mr Hudson), is a clerk to a stock-broker, with the comical name of Mr. Bartholomew Lane (Mr. Tilbury). He has some time before, been unjustly struck with the beauty of a lady, with whom he voyaged across from Ireland to Bristol; and, whilst he is writing to inform Mr. Sheriff Capsicum (Mr. H Bland) that the shares in the "To fire-ation Steam Grand Junction," are to be sold at a sacrifice, he finds himself into a grocer's shop opposite. He immediately forgets everything else; and, overlooks of a rapid declaration of love, which he sends to the lady. Now, as Mr O'Grady is an Irishman, the result of this proceeding is inevitable. Mrs. Capsicum (Mrs Buckingham) is frightened also, and joins her prayers to Mr. O'Grady's, who at last comes the letter-carrier, and opens a money letter, getting himself into a still more terrible scrape. In the midst of this embarrassment, the confusion becomes more confounded by the arrival of Mr. Sheriff Capsicum, who proceeds to read his letters. The terror of the others is almost beyond endurance, and there is no overwhelming joy, Mr. O'Grady discovers that the letter never went at all, but has been in his pocket all the time; so that all mischief is averted, and the dramatis personæ and the audience are equally satisfied

Mr. Hudson played the Irishman in his best style. His rattling bustle was capitally sustained, and his spirits were buoyant and natural. He is the best representative of the Irish character that we have now upon the stage; indeed, he is altogether an actor of no ordinary talent. Mrs. Humby was a delightful shopkeeper: and Mr. James Bland a becoming Sheriff. Mr. Tilbury is a very useful performer, but he clings too fondly to stage conventionalities in comedy. When will actors dress as they see people in social life at the present day, instead of as they saw them on the stage years ago? There is no abstract fun in nature.

The piece was entirely successful, as we have said. It has been nicely put on the stage. The grocer's shop, in the second act, got a round of applause for its natural appearance. It was as graphic in its detail as a description by Mr. Dickens. Mr. Hudson, on being called for, announced the piece for repetition every evening, amidst general acclamation.

LYCEUM

On Thursday evening was produced "an entirely new and peculiarly original Terpsichorean Rhythmical Fantastic Necromantic Operatic Extravaganza (being a Ballet, in one act, interspersed with explanatory rhymes)"—we speak on the authority of the bill—called "The Marble Maiden." It is a burlesque upon the ballet of the same name, in which Mdlle. Adele Dumilatre appeared to such advantage last season at Drury-Lane. The plot—into the probability of which it will not do to look too closely, any more than in that of the original it is—is as follows. Cosmo de Castelnau, a sculptor (Mr. A. Wigan), is very fat gone in love with Emily Bradford (Miss Laidlaw), and has sculptured a figure of her, while he keeps carefully concealed, behind a curtain in his studio. His rival, Michael Angelo Bigos (Mr. Keeley), is in love with Phœbe Briggs (Mrs. Keeley), who is a servant of Emily. Phœbe, who comes on a message to the sculptor, with true woman's curiosity, takes a peep at the statue, and, in her admiration at its resemblance to her "missus," knocks it over and breaks it to pieces. Frightened to death at the probable consequences of the act dent, she seizes a pewter-pot and ale-glass to replace the vase and cup which the latter was holding, and stands in the same attitude. Her sweetheart, Michael, arrives, and a scene takes place between them, he scarcely believing his eyes for some time, until their tete a tete is interrupted by a knock at the door. This is Emily, who comes to see Cosmo. Phœbe makes a confession of the damage, and implores her to take the place of the statue. Emily consents, and, on Cosmo's return, he sees, to his surprise, a better resemblance of his love'd one than he has given. There is then a burlesque on the Wills' dance in "Giselle," and a final tag is musically given by the panting quartette

The little piece was thus favourably received; its puns, jokes, and allusions to passing events, "telling" in every instance, and its inferior situations, in which the passions of the ballet are curiously brought into contrast with the proprieties of domestic life, stirring roars of laughter. The pantomimic scenes and dumbshow were executed with much spirit, and were warmly applauded. It was admirably acted, and it is hard to say whether Keeley's intentionally "pompous invites Mrs Keeley's piquant delivery and caricature pas, the pouted and "shoving airs of Wigan, or the pretty looks and excellent dancing of Miss Laidlaw (a debutant, here, and a decided acquisition), most aided in its success. At one time or another in the course of the evening every individual performer was greeted throughout with loud applause, and all the performers were called before the curtain. The "Marble Maiden" will have, and deserves, a run. The credit of the authorship belongs to Mr. Stocqueler, the writer of "Po Inamina," and of many other rattling farces whose success we have had the pleasure of chronicling.

OLYMPIC.

Professor Keller opened this unhappy little theatre on Monday evening with a miscellaneous entertainment, at which the audience to adapt a French term "assisted" in the real sense of the word. Assistants in abundance delayed the programme of amusements called forth a ceaseless outpouring of that peculiarly comical undisage which a jovially-disposed audience, when kept waiting, is so ready to indulge in, for good-natured purposes.

After the band not a bad one by the way—had played the overture to "Massaniello," a long pause supervened—so long that, although a facetious gentleman in the pit cried, "Ladies and gentlemen, the performance will begin in a few minutes, please, we are quite ready"; and an individual in the gallery shouted out "All in to begin?" in a voice that would have insured him an immediate engagement to First Rate Harley's; still nothing took place, and the band, after a while, replayed again. At last the curtain drew up, and discovered in a front chamber; and a frightened foreign gentleman, whose very mustachios seemed trembling, appeared with a paper inside a box, after which he sang the most indifferent song we ever heard, and bowed himself off again; and then there was another long pause, and the audience were funnier than ever. At last, after more music, and a great deal of rushing and shouting, in the midst of which the curtain went up by mistake, and discovered all sorts of people on the stage including a tight-whale statue, who was shifting a scene, and who joined the rest in a most peculiar fugue, to the screaming delight of the audience, the real performances commenced with some astonishing tours de force by Professor Keller. These were good—very good indeed, and brought down thunders of applause. Then, four little boys, in Polish costume, and red sashes, played a Polonaise very creditably; and, on being encored, performed a Polka equally well. Then followed what, in our opinion, was worth all the rest, a Bolero sung and danced by two of the most clever little boys we ever saw; we regret their names were not in the programme. The little boy sang and attitudinized in a marvellously quaint fashion, and the little girl's coquetting pas and general expression was most charming. These children were evidently foreign, by their accent. They were cheered in a most uproarious manner, and forced to repeat their song and dance until they had scarcely power left to put their little legs and voices into play. For their sakes we hope they possess better, either by the Enfans Castelli or the trompe of the Gymnase Enfantine. We did not stay for the "Peasa Plastiques," having before noticed them

The great feature in the entertainment was the evident want of management in conducting it. Nothing could be better than its component parts; but there was either no head in the coulisses, or no hands to do its bidding. We hope to see all this smoothed at a future performance.

Several rumours are current in theatrical circles about the future fortunes of this theatre. Mr. Speer, the author of "Honesty," has been for some time spoken of as a probable lessee; and a gentleman living in the perfumery quarter of Grosvenor-square is also talked about: with respect to the latter, however, no conditional engagement of Miss Kate Howard appears to offer an obstacle to closing the union. Mr. Walter Lacy is also treating for it; and, amongst the many reports, for the foundation of which we cannot vouch, it is said that Mrs Warner may possibly quit Sadler's Wells for the Olympic, and that Madame Vestris has in contemplation to resume the management of the same theatre. Any change will be an improvement upon the late infelicitous direction.

CROSBY HALL

The entertainments offered to us by ventriloquists are exceedingly remarkable when considered in the abstract, and in a social matter-of-fact point of view. We can generally anticipate what we are about to behold, though. We know there will be a cornelial huckaver on the roof of the house, who prefers that situation to coming down, and will keep singing, to the great annoyance of the audience and we are disappointed, and out of humour with our powers of observation, if he does not gradually—perhaps knocking bricks out the chimney as he comes down; what his voice gets stronger and stronger, until he arrives at the level of the performer. And he sure there will be represented a curious position of domestic comfort, in which some old gentleman with a couch is left by himself in his house, behind a screen; and a humorous traveller arrives, and, to the bottle by that annoys him, frees him on omelette, nurses his grandchild, and finally marries with all the servants, who return very unexpectedly, and get down in the cellar, and behind the wine-coat, and above the ceiling and into hampers, and boxes, and all sorts of impossible and preposterous places.

But although we are pretty sure what to expect, when we know that we are coming, we laugh very much, and consider ourselves a capital audience. A more sympathetic forces everybody to keep their wits so very sharp, that there is something refreshing in the light manner in being deceived, if only for an hour or time. And, therefore, we especially incline to Mr. Love's clever polyphonic entertainment. Mr. Love, the "polygamist," as a cheerful old lady called him, who was near us at Crosby Hall on Wednesday. His imitations in his transport [illegible] burgh," are perfectly marvellous. He was an old [illegible], and a Mrs. Malaprop, and an undeniably rough sailor, and a [illegible], apparently all at once. He dived down behind a table, and [illegible], altogether changed, with such strange rapidity—not knowing a more wig differently put on, but an entirely fresh assortment, even to waistcoats, stocks, hats, caps, and moustaches: thus, for a time, we did not believe in him, but thought that he must have a brother in the secret. But as he pocked himself in the bar, to sustain all this without any description of trickery, fraud, assistance, confederacy, collusion, or accompaniment, either in sight or out of sight of the audience," we took him at his word, and applauded as loudly as his stoutest admirer.

Seriously, his entertainment was one, in all senses of the word. The picturesque Crosby Hall was crammed with delighted individuals, and we were compelled to catch a glimpse of Mr. Love when we could, from the side of his platform. But it served us right, for we went fashionably late. We could not, however, see behind his wonderful table. We would give a great deal to do so. It must be a condensation of the City establishments of M[illegible] and [illegible] broker—and a much more luxurious in its usages.

Madame Vestris and Mr. Charles Mathews are announced to appear, for the first time, at the Princess's Theatre this evening.

A new drama will be produced at the ADELPHI on Monday, called "The Cabinet." It is a translation of a French piece "Le Monsse."

At the HAYMARKET, Mr. Jerrold's comedy will be the novelty of importance [illegible] past week

[illegible]

LYCEUM, a two act drama, translated from "Le Lol Salique," (paying at Paris's Well under the title of "Check to the King,") will be brought out on the 10th inst., called, "King or Queen." On the same evening, General Tom Thumb, the eminent American dwarf, will make his début as an actor, in a fairy romance, written expressly for him by Mr. Albert Smith, called "Hop o' my Thumb, or the Ogre and his Seven League Boots," founded on the old nursery tale of the same name.

Owing to Mrs. Keeley's severe indisposition, her part in the "Enchanted Horse" has been sustained capitally by her daughter, Miss Mary Keeley. The fair manageress is now, we are happy to say, quite convalescent.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

NEW STREET FROM LONDON-BRIDGE TO HUNGERFORD-BRIDGE.—In the event of the bills for the South Western Extension and North Kent Railways now before Parliament being passed into a law, it is in contemplation to form a wide and grand street, to extend from the line of road up from London-bridge, intersecting the various streets between that point and Hungerford-bridge, crossing the Turnroad, so as to make one line of street from Westminster to London-bridge. If this project is carried out, as it is contemplated, it will have the effect of making a vast improvement in portions of the parishes of St. Saviour's, St. George's, and Christ Church, at present inhabited by the lowest description of persons.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The total number of deaths registered in the metropolitan districts during the week ending Saturday, February 28, was 1119, a most satisfactory return when compared with the corresponding week of last year, in which the mortality was 1133, as well as with the winter and annual averages, in which the numbers stand respectively 1080 and 968.

APPOINTMENT OF CHIEF COMMISSIONER OF WOODS AND FORESTS.—Lord Viscount Canning, who was so recently Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has been appointed Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests.

NEW CHURCH IN THE METROPOLIS.—The site for a new church has been selected by the Metropolitan Church Commissioners in Old-street, City-road, the first stone of which, it is expected, will be almost immediately laid by the Bishop of London. The architect is Mr. Ferrey. The style of the design is of the early English, with lofty tower and spire. It is to be a three-roofed structure, separated by arcades, and without any gallery, excepting a small one at the western portion, intended for the singing choir. A very large proportion of the sacred building will be dedicated to the poor by free seats. The site is a very open and good one. The contractors for its erection are Messrs. Winsland and Holland.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES

SERIOUS DISTURBANCE AND MURDER ON THE HAWICK RAILWAY.—Between Saturday night and Sunday morning a breach of the peace of the most daring kind, attended with murder, occurred on the North British Railway Company's branch line to Hawick, in the neighbourhood of Fassie Bridge, about eleven miles south of Edinburgh. It appears that about midnight two of the "navvies" employed in the vicinity were taken into custody, charged with stealing a watch or watches, and lodged in the cells of the county police station at Gorebridge. Some time after, a large body of their fellow excavators, to the number, it is said, of about 300, assembled, with bludgeons, pickaxes, wedge-bills, &c., and proceeded to the station-house for the purpose of liberating the two prisoners. One of the fellows, it is stated, presented a pistol at the head of the sergeant, and commanded the liberation of the prisoners under the pain of death; and upon his refusal to unlock the doors of the cells, they broke them open, and their companions being thus relieved, they marched off with them in the direction of Fushiebridge, about half a mile from the scene of their violence. At last point they met the police constable on duty, who was returning from his accustomed rounds, whom they savagely assaulted, and beat in a most inhuman manner, one of the ruffians striking him a blow on the back of the head, it is supposed with a pickaxe, which laid his skull open. The poor man was afterwards found lying on the road in this state, and conveyed home, where medical aid was promptly in attendance, but the injuries he received were such that he never spoke afterwards, and died on Sunday afternoon, at six o'clock.

[illegible] police force placed at his disposal, succeeded in apprehending [illegible] of the rioters, who were identified as being amongst the [illegible] who rescued the prisoners from the station-house

THE EXPLOSION AT DOVER.

The investigation relative to this sad catastrophe (an account of which appeared in our paper last week), involving so deplorable a loss of life, was commenced on Thursday (last week), before Mr. Thompson, the Borough Coroner, and a Jury of 13 householders, in the Guards'-room attached to the town terminus of the Dover Railway. The names of the sufferers, and their respective ages, as handed to the Coroner by Mr. Way, the station master, are as follow:—Joseph Hambrook, aged 24, left a widow and one child; William Gordon, aged 23, a widow; Thomas Hutton, aged 52, a widow and no family; James Rock, 36, left two children, John Pascal, single man; John Wilson, 28, a widow and seven children; Isaac Hughes, 28, single man; John Wilson, 28, a widow; Edward Rock, 38, widow and two children; John Kendal, 24, single man; William Edwards, 38, widow; Joseph Hall, 35, widow and five children: the last-named deceased survived the accident some hours. He died in shocking agony at nine o'clock on Wednesday evening. The Jury having been duly empanelled on the two o'clock, evidence was given to the following purport:—Joseph Hambrook, aged 24, sworn, said: I am a porter on the Dover Railway. On Monday morning last I was employed in the powder-house, which is a brick building, about 30 yards from the engine-house, and about 100 yards from the station-house. I was there with the deceased Gordon, Rock, Pascal, Hughes, and Kendal. We were all employed in the powder-house. I was in the act of weighing out powder when I heard a noise like the report of a gun, and I found myself lying on the ground. I was stunned for a few minutes, and when I recovered I found myself lying on the ground. I was stunned for a few minutes, and when I recovered I found myself lying on the ground. I was stunned for a few minutes, and when I recovered

"Dancing Girl," taken from Pompeii; there a copy from the "Loggie" of the Vatican; here, the "Anacreon of Painting," Albano, ministers to our enjoyment; there the "Aurora" of Guido soars above; while, as if the edifice were destined to convey a history of art, from the most remote to the most modern times, a drop scene, painted by our own artist, Stanfield, is before our eyes. No portion of the edifice but contains a memento of some great name. In the most obscure corners may be found the copy of a scroll or an arabesque, of Raphael, Romano, or some other of the great ornaments of Italian art. Nothing but a true conception and love of art could have worthily carried out so noble a plan. The effect of the whole, however, when bright and lovely faces add to the splendour of the scene, it is impossible worthily to describe.

In an artistic point of view, the decorations of this edifice are doubly curious. To those who have not fully and completely studied the wonders of the Vatican, or of the other Italian palaces (and of these how large is the proportion, even amongst those who have visited them), it will give new views of the genius of those great painters whose names we associate but with works of great size and magnitude. We may here see that nothing has been too trivial, as nothing has been too great for the enterprise and consideration of the great fathers of modern art. The Arabesques, here copied, which include every fanciful device, every poetic dream, which embrace the three reigns of creation, and are perfect in the smallest details; in which fauns, satyrs, centaurs, birds, squirrels, mice, tigers, elephants, flowers, fruit—every possible variety of vegetation; edifices of every description of form, and the human figure under every possible aspect—now dancing, now weeping, now flying, are combined with a fertility of fancy, a grace impossible to describe—were designed as in the Vatican, the Villa Madama, and numberless other Italian Palaces, by the greatest painters of those times. This exquisite branch of the art did not take its rise, however, with the masters of the renascence. There is a more ancient mine of treasure, from the relics of Pompeii, numbers of the models employed at Her Majesty's Theatre have been taken, and the invention is by Pliny ascribed to Ludius, who says he "invented the charming art of decorating the walls of apartments where he scattered pleasure houses, porticoes, shrubberies, plants, forests, hills, ponds, flowers in fact, whatever may please the fancy or caprice of every one."

In an artistic point of view, Raphael may here be considered as the presiding genius, for his spirit breathed even in the works of his pupils and followers, executed under his eye—as for example, in the Vatican, whence so many of the decorations of our great theatre are taken. This is the more appropriate, as it was in the days of Raphael that this style of painting was revived. The recent discovery of the baths of Titus and Livy had brought arabesques into fashion, and Giovanni d'Udine assisted greatly the rising art by composing a species of artificial stucco, consisting of powdered marble, lime, and white turpentine. It was with this vehicle that Raphael produced those wonderful creations of fancy in which Scripture subjects, surrounded by every device that imagination could suggest, and in which it is somewhat remarkable that music and musical instruments have a most conspicuous part, form what is called the "Bible" of Raphael, but while he superintended the whole, Giulio Romano, Giovanni d'Udine, Perin del Vaga, Il Fattore, Pellegrino di Modena, and many others, painted under his direction. The first of these was his favourite and worthiest pupil; not only here did he work with a congenial spirit, and in the famous fresco of the stanze, in which he assisted his great master, appear to have been fully inspired by his conceptions; but in the Villa Madama, in the Te Palace at Mantua, besides others, he shewed himself his worthy follower. Nothing can exceed the elegance, the classical taste, and wonderful invention, which the decorations of these last named edifices display. Giulio Romano is therefore worthily chosen as one of the ruling spirits in the renovation of the Italian Opera House. Amongst Roman painters we also find Carlo Maratti, the last of the school. The Caracci, Guido, Albano, and Cignani have all a place here. A copy of the "Elements," of Albano, holds a conspicuous situation on the ceiling. The poetic fancy, the brilliant colouring of this master, and the cheerful subjects he chose for his inspirations, point him out as peculiarly fitted for a place here. Reminiscences of Giordano, that painter who, studying in all the schools, had stolen a grace from each, are not wanting. Even the Flemish school has a representative, and copies from its greatest master, Rubens, may be found in this new gallery of art.

The manner of execution of these decorations affords another point of some interest, and, in this respect at least, modern art has an advantage over that of the days of Raphael. Encaustic painting, practised by the ancients, and only revived amongst us in the last century, has, for the minuter style of decoration, a thousand advantages over that of fresco, employed by the great masters, and amongst these facility of execution, greater brilliancy, and durability may be enumerated. Encaustic painting takes its name from the operation of fire, used to melt the wax with which the colours are mixed. The manner of making the Punic wax anciently used, and, after all, the principal ingredient in the Encaustic painting of old times, has given rise to much discussion amongst artists and antiquarians since the first experiments were made in this branch of the art by Count Caylus and M. Bachelier; and this will at least show what importance was attached to the practice of a style of painting which has so many advantages to recommend it. It has one drawback that of expense—which does not seem to be considered by the management.

We present our readers, in the accompanying Illustration, with a specimen of the style of these new embellishments. It is taken from the Grand Tier, which contains twenty of the circular medallions like those in the Engraving. The subjects are from Pompeii, from Raphael, from Caracci, from Romano, and the antique unknown. Of the long panels, there are twenty. The subjects of these are from Pompeii and Herculaneum, besides figures from the antique, from Raphael, Caracci, Giordano, Romano, and Maratti. All these panels and circles are painted on a rich full ground.

In the Second Tier, the number of panels and circles are the same as the Grand Tier, but they are only one foot seven in height. In the circle are placed Apollo and the Nine Muses, from the antique. The long panels on this Tier are ornamented with Cupids playing and dancing; the designs are from Raphael, Titian, Rubens, the Caracci, Cignani, and the antique. The same style of decoration is continued to the top, but the figures increase in lightness each successive tier. This arrangement is of admirable effect. (See the Engravings.)

The Ceiling—on which are Albano's "Four Elements," besides numerous other designs, and which is already vaulted—is painted like a dome, thereby increasing the concave appearance, and giving even additional height to the edifice. The "Aurora" of Guido, on the Proscenium, and the Royal Arms just beyond it, have a charming effect. They are framed, as it were, on both sides, by festoons of flowers, executed with a delicacy of touch and brilliancy of colouring that would bear the closest inspection. We must not, en passant, omit to remark the good taste which marks the selection of the figures, very few of which are in an attitude of repose, whilst the design is continuous: the eye is thus necessarily carried forwards, instead of being arrested by them; and, the grand object of the whole—the performance on the stage is, therefore, not for a moment lost sight of.

Before concluding our observations on the renovated appearance of this great theatre, we must not omit to remark that the change has not been merely confined to the ornamental parts of the building, but that essentials have been duly attended to. The long corridors, the lobbies, the crush-room whose dilapidated condition was truly unworthy of so great an establishment, but which was overlooked in consideration of the enormous difficulties under which its maintenance under any circumstances was known to be labouring—have undergone the same process of embellishment, although in the simplest forms, the whole effect being reserved for the entrance to the house. A new chandelier, new curtains and lining to the Boxes—in fact, the fresh appliances of every description, to render the theatre comfortable and salubrious—deserve honourable mention. Indeed, as far as we are yet able to judge, the changes and improvements are as complete as they could be desired.

It will perhaps be thought that we have dwelt over lengthily on the subject of the renewed appearance of Her Majesty's Theatre. But we confess it is one which interests us only our mere abstract love of art, but our national pride. We gladly hail every symptom of better taste, of an increased love of the beautiful, in whatever manner it be displayed, and more especially in public buildings. We rejoice to see it taking a barrier against the encroaches of utilitarianism and the mere money-making spirit of the age, however laudable in some respects. We are not content that the stigma attached to England by Napoleon as a "nation of shopkeepers," should yearly be advancing closer to its verification; and we revolve that art should find her resting-place amongst us, deprived, as she is, of her exalted influence amongst nations which formerly paid her such devoted homage!

NEW DECORATIONS OF HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

SCENE FROM THE NEW OPERA OF "THE CRUSADERS," AT DRURY LANE THEATRE.

CITY THEATRE.

Mr. Homer, the very spirited lessee of this establishment, has entered into an engagement with the proprietor of the two veritable Paris elephants, whose performances at the Cirque National were so successful; and the sagacious animals appear nightly, to the great wonder and delight of crowded audiences. The piece in which they appear is called "The Elephants of the Pagoda," and is derived from the same source as the Astley's drama, the plot being written up to the tricks which the beasts have been trained to perform. There are the same effects introduced, such as the selection of the future Sovereign, and rescue of the Prince from poison by the elephant. He also displays his sagacity in a dozen different ways—dancing with the "Light of the Harem," walking over a sleeping slave, and across a single plank. In all this, truth to tell, he struck us as being quite equal, if not superior, to his Astley's rival. In the last scene the Rajah makes a triumphal entry into Nagpore in a very splendid car drawn by the two elephants.

Mr. Homer was polite enough to show us the members of his present zoological corps dramatique in private life. The elephants have a commodious stable at the end of the stage, which is exceedingly roomy. They live harmoniously together; and it was curious to observe the manner in which they picked up the shreds of hay littered about their bed, and separated it from the straw. They are male and female. Adjoining them, in another large room, are four camels. When we saw them, towards the end of the evening, three were asleep, and the other appeared to be keeping watch over them. The group was exceedingly picturesque; and, by the dim light of a single lantern, which scarcely reached to the walls, reminded one of the hall of a caravan. A visit to the City Theatre will repay any of our readers who wish to be entertained for an hour or two.

THE ELEPHANTS AT THE CITY OF LONDON THEATRE.

BENEDICT'S "CRUSADERS."

This opera will have attained its ninth representation this evening (Saturday), and Drury-Lane Theatre fills every night to excess, box places being secured for some time to come. The success is, therefore, unquestionable; and in every point of view it is deserved. As a spectacle, it will bear comparison with the greatest scenic achievements. The first appearance of the "Man on the Mountain" on the summit of the rock—the realisation of Tasso's description of the "Enchanted Wood"—the siege—the military procession, and the exhibition of chivalric decoration, are enthusiastically applauded. It is not only in numerical force that the stage is well filled, but the groupings have been arranged with care and taste. The chorus singers display an energy in their acting, unexampled in our operatic annals, and rival the great Germans in this respect. As to the music it will gain on every hearing. The composer has written some admirable effects for the orchestra, and in the employment of his instruments has judiciously followed the forms employed with such ability by Meyerbeer.

In the vocal colouring Benedict's inspirations are after the Weberian model. The principal faults that we find in the "Crusaders" are over-orchestration, so that the voice cannot contend with the accompaniments, and too much sameness in the school of writing. The cavatina for Stretton, when he first appears as Hassan, is an illustration of the latter defect. It is a smooth, flowing, and elegant cantabile, quite out of keeping with the oriental fanaticism and fierceness of character of the fearful Man of the Mountain. The song of Mr. King, if well executed, would tell. It is in the minor key, and the accompaniment is quaint and has an Arabian smack, but we think a more marked and distinctive impress ought to have been assigned to the music for the sect of the Assassins. The beautiful ballad of "Ill-fated Ring," nightly encored with rapture, is essentially a Scotch melody; but, as Harrison plays a Knight of Sicily [Tarentum, from which the name of the "Tarentule" ("Lycosa Tarentula") has been derived], the conception, although successful in the result, is not a correct one. The beauties of the opera are, nevertheless, so manifold, that criticism is quite disarmed. The overture is a classical work, worthy of any writer; and when it is heard from any band in which there are brilliant players for the violin passages, will tell with more effect than it does at present, since there is not weight enough in that department of the Drury Lane orchestra, to tell against the brass. The subject of "On! Chieftains, on!" heard in the overture, is wonderfully treated throughout the work: it is quite inspiring. First, it is sung, without accompaniment, by the Chorus of Knights, and then with full orchestra; and it is subsequently reproduced with every variety of contrapuntal treatment. The unaccompanied quintett, in the finale of the second act, is a charming composition. The elegant chorus of bridles, opening the third act, recalls the quartett from Weber's "Oberon," "O'er the dark blue waters." The duet between King and Miss Romer, in the second act, is a master piece. The first movement, "'Tis vengeance that can calm," is deliciously instrumented, and the theme of the concluding movement is animated and catching. The finale duet, between Miss Rainforth and Miss Romer, "However firm and dear the bonds of love," creates the greatest sensation, and is always sung twice. Those amateurs who recollect the first tenor song in the "Gazza Ladra," may, perhaps, trace the motif of Benedict's duet; but it has been beautifully treated by him, and the two prime donne have a glorious vocal duet, which ends in mutual glory, the splendid organ of Miss Romer being set off against the artistical finish of Miss Rainforth. As for the songs, they must make the fortune of the publishers. Miss Rainforth's "I am thine," will be on the European barrel-organs very shortly. Harrison manages to secure encores for his three ballads—the one alluded to above, and "Oh, Love, to whom the fond heart pleadeth," and the romance, "Whate'er thy lot in life may be." But he has a little bit of surpassing beauty, "Oh, Love! to whom the fond heart pleadeth," in the scene of the Enchanted Wood, which, for originality and elegance is one of Benedict's finest thoughts. The odalisque, and, in fact, all the descriptive music of this scene, is very striking and dramatic. To sum up the musical merits of "The Crusaders," it may be safely pronounced as the composer's greatest work. His orchestral skill in the concerted pieces, to avoid the monotony of recitative, is worthy of the gifted pupil of Weber. We must also put in a claim on the ground of nationality: it is our conviction that, if Benedict had not so long resided in Italy and this country, as to Anglicise and Italianise his German science, we should not have had so much spontaneous melody as is found in his opera; and his thorough acquaintance with the French method has also been of material aid. The composer, who is free from prejudice and bigotry, and seeks for beauty wherever it presents itself, must be a man of no ordinary stamp—and such is Benedict.

FASHIONS FOR MARCH.

The season is not yet sufficiently advanced for the London fashions to have acquired all their brilliancy and splendour; we must, therefore, have recourse for our monthly bulletin to the descriptions of those toilettes which at the present moment produce so much effect in the salons of Paris, where fashion is truly sovereign, and where she dictates her commands to the world. From the description of the toilettes worn at the Court Balls of the Tuileries, we may confidently predict that for evening wear plain satins, dresses of tulle, of crape, of gauze-lisse, or of tarlatane, will be in great vogue. For dancing, dresses of light materials are indispensable; they will be universally made in two or three skirts, worn over satin or Gros-de-Naples, and looped up with tufts of ribbons and bouquets of flowers.

FASHIONS FOR MARCH.

London will not long remain in the back-ground as regards Fashion. Already the heads of several of the great magasins, such as that of Vouillon and Lamé, have repaired to Paris, and are bringing home the cargoes of novelties with which our belles will prepare themselves for the season's triumphs. Amongst these, trimmings of every description will form a decided innovation on the evening toilettes of last season. Dresses were then frequently worn without ornament; this year, a profusion of every kind of trimming will be employed. Thus, over a skirt of silk blue satin will be worn two tunics of white tulle: the first ornamented with three rows of blue satin ribbon en rouleau. The upper skirt will open on both sides en Grecque, and will be trimmed likewise with three rolls of satin ribbon; this tunic will be festooned by a garland of foliage descending from the waist. The corsage of this dress should be made full; the sleeves will be open up the middle, and trimmed with rolls of satin.

Another toilette, which will attain the highest favour, is a dress of white crape, trimmed with a quilling of crape, diminishing in width towards the bodice, which [illegible] with a [illegible] of the same material.

On the head, a garland of white camelias and Parma violets; a similar bouquet on the bodice, and one in the hand.

The following costume is also remarkable for its exquisite lightness. Three skirts of pink tulle will be worn over an under skirt of pink satin. These tunics are trimmed with a [illegible] of pink tulle, which hangs in the same direction as the folds of the skirts. The bodice is pointed, and covered with folds of tulle, descending into a point in front, and rising towards the shoulders, the form of trimming being infinitely more becoming than the small bertnes formerly worn. The upper skirt is trimmed en tablier, with branches of green leaves, intermixed with scarabees.

For toilettes of a severer and more matronly character, will be worn dresses in rich damask of a green, pink, cerise, or blue colour, trimmed with two flounces in Brussels point or blond, laid on flat, and fastened with large bows of fringed ribbon, a la Louis XIV.; or in swallow-coloured satin, with two flounces of black lace, looped up a la Camargo, with bows of ribbon of three shades, or dresses of pink Terry velvet, trimmed down each side with point d'alencon, or blonde, and ornamented at intervals with bows of rich velvet or satin. Another favourite toilette is in sea-green satin, covered with three skirts of tulle of the same colour, the second skirt trimmed with pink roses of tulle and with marabout fastenings.

The Coiffures are as varied as the dresses: the petits bords are still worn, and ornamented with curling feathers; the Turbans are often in golden cloth; Jewish Turbans, like the one in the accompanying Engravings, are peculiarly fitted for Opera costume.

Evening Caps are also worn in lace, or in puffings of tulle, with pendant flowers. Wreaths of flowers, for young unmarried ladies, are more than ever in vogue: the form varies greatly, according to the face; the colour is also adapted to the complexion, and to the remainder of the toilette

For Morning Wear and the Promenade, there is, at present, no novelty to record. We must wait the advance of spring, to have any decisive information on this subject to impart to our fair readers. Pamelas are still in the ascendant, and the Manilee termed visites, continue in much favour.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Accounts from Batavia, dated the 31st of December, 1845, inform us that some disorders have taken place among the people of Bantam, which had made it necessary to send a small number of troops thither. The cause of the movement is not yet precisely known, but what is certainly known is, that sixty persons attacked during the night the habitation of a European proprietor, and assailed him, his wife, and their children in the most savage manner, three of the children were killed. It is said that two European keepers were likewise assassinated. The cause of this murder is supposed to be personal vengeance. Tranquillity had been restored.

According to the accounts from Vierzon, the works on the railroad between that town and Orleans are going on actively. The bridge over the Loire has sustained successfully all the trials to which it has been subjected, and it is fully expected that the line will be opened on May 1.

We have received Russian, Frankfort, and German papers, all of which confirm, in a more or less degree, if not the actual existence of a conspiracy for the emancipation of Poland, at least that the apprehension of a general rising of the Poles prevailed throughout Prussia and Germany.

Accounts have reached us from the British colony of Bathurst on the river Gambia, down to January the 21st. Sickness had prevailed to about the usual extent subsequently to the rainy season, but there had been few deaths, and, at the date above mentioned, the settlement was again healthy.

In a private letter just received from an officer in India, he observes that the independence of Scinde will be the result of the engagement; there were 2000 of the Sikhs drowned in attempting to cross the Sutlej.

A letter from Stuttgard, dated Feb. 19, says:—"The marriage of our Crown Prince with the Grand Duchess Olga will be solemnised in August next, in St. Petersburgh."

It is stated from Leghorn that about 50 persons have been arrested at Pesaro and Gano, in the Roman States. Some others had contrived to elude the search of the police, and were concealed in Monte Nuovo, belonging to one of the first families in the country. The individuals comprised in the late affair at Rimini, who to the number of 32 had set sail on the Adriatic, but had been obliged by stress of weather to put into Dalmatia, have been given up by Austria to the Papal government. They lately arrived in an Austrian vessel at Ancona, and have been shut up in the fort.

We learn from Constantinople that the Sultan is to visit the provinces of Roumelia in the course of the present month, and that he is to be accompanied by Reshid Pacha, Minister of Foreign Affairs, and Mehemet Ali Pacha, Minister of Marine. The object of this visit is said to be an investigation of the condition of the population, with a view to further reforms in Turkey. It is also named the persons who are to accompany the new Ambassador, Suleman Pacha, to Paris. They are, Prince Callimachi, as Honorary Councillor of Embassy; Halimi Effendi, Secretary of Legation; Mehemet Effendi, Secretary of Embassy; as Secretary of Embassy; Perati Effendi, as second Secretary; and M. Avedis, as Interpreter.

About eleven o'clock on Monday forenoon, a shock of an earthquake was felt at Comrie (Perthshire). The tremor was not so great as on former occasions, but it had a double shake or crack. The sky was clear at the time, and the weather for the last month or six weeks had been remarkably mild and pleasant, but shortly after the shock the sky became dark and cloudy, foreboding a change of weather.

A letter from Vienna, of the 23rd ult., says:—"According to accounts from Tarnow, attempts have been made in several parts of Western Gallicia to excite the peasants to insurrection, but without effect. On the morning of the 19th, several vehicles filled with nobles killed or wounded, who had failed in their endeavour to excite the people, were brought to Tarnow by the peasants. Efficient measures have been taken by the authorities to prevent these culpable attempts from being repeated."

Madame Grisi has purchased a house in the Rue Neuve de Petits Champs, Paris, for the sum of twenty thousand pounds, which has furnished the occasion of another law-suit with Monsieur de Melfio, her husband, which has, however, been decided in her favour.

It is rumoured, says the Brussels Gazette, that her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent will pass the greater part of the ensuing summer with the King of the Belgians at the Palace of Laeken

A special treaty of commerce has been concluded at Berlin between Portugal and the several States of the Zollverein. It is said that Prussia has made proposals to Spain to conclude conventions of the same kind with the German Union, and that the Cabinet of Madrid has given an answer favourable to important political consideration, that the recognition of the Government of Queen Isabel by the different resident States will be the immediate consequences of this measure.

Accounts from the banks of the Danube, of the 21st of February, state that a report was in circulation of a revolution similar to that of 1830 having occurred in Warsaw, and that Prince Paskewitch had been killed. Letters published in Lithuania. Advices of the 18th of February, from Cracow, an nounced the entry into that city of Austrian troops, the presence of which was rendered necessary by political circumstances of importance.

The Empress of Russia has charged herself (says the Constitutionnel) with the task of forming the marriage trousseau of her daughter, the Princess Olga. A lady has just been sent by the Empress to Paris to give the necessary commands to the first houses. The Ambassador of the King of Wurtemberg has also arrived to select models for the furniture that is to adorn the new palace of the Prince Royal.

THE LATE DUELLE.—Viscount Palmerston, Viscountess Newport, Lady Suffield, and Lady Georgiana Codrington were among the ladies who were accommodated on the last night of the House of Commons to hear the proceedings of the debate, and remained until the division. Some of the members who attended Parliament pleaded memorable drivers were so ill as to be obliged to be assisted, and carried into the house: Mr. Miles was among the number.

THE COURT OF COMMON COUNCIL AND THE NORTH KENT (CITY EXTENSION) RAILWAY.—On Tuesday, at the Guildhall, the Improvement Committee of the City brought up the report of the Improvement Committee upon the report of the Parliamentary Committee on the bill for making this line. It stated that the Committee having fully considered the subject, were of opinion that the North Kent Railway Company should not have a terminus on the north side of the Southwark-bridge, and that the plan produced to the Committee of a railway to cross the Southwark-bridge, with a terminus therefrom to be at the end of Mansion-lane, did not appear to them to possess a sufficient degree of advantage over a terminus on the southern side of the bridge to counterbalance the sacrifice of so much space in an important commercial part of the City, already deficient in spacious thoroughfares. The report concluded by stating that the Committee directed the Remembrancer to prepare the draft of a petition to the House of Commons against the bill. Sir Claudius Marshall presented a petition to the Court on behalf of the Provisional Committee, praying that the members would give their assent and support to so useful an undertaking. The petition was referred to the Committee. Considerable discussion ensued, and the Court decided, and determined in favour of the report by a majority of 21. A petition against the bill was then agreed to.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

One less a reader, at us two divide,
Taught by what nature shows and what reverse
Never to blame our pleasure or our pride
With sour reproach, so long as mute the fault

In every page of the great volume of Nature we have evidence of the two-fold purpose with which it was written; every passage proves that it pursues a design.

"delectando pariterque monendo"

Life is a state of trial, not of punishment: man, indeed, is destined to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow: but of labour comes health, and, with the necessity for exertion, in rich ages—days in which the ocean's bord sets lightly, and flights medicinal will, the sweet remedy, hairy sleep. The song of birds and the perfume of flowers were confirmation strong that such was not born to be sad. While all nature rejoiced, should he, who was sent to rule over it, alone be sorrowful? Consolatory words his earliest provision for his wants was that made by him for his recreations. We will say nothing of the first musical essay—Jubatel plus recorded in Arcadian annals: but, as regards abstract amusement, rural sports constituted the earliest relaxation of the human race. As the present hour they form the favourite pursuit of its leisure. Is it a convenient, legitimate taste?

It is fair for an author to borrow a leaf from his own book, and, therefore, we will answer this inquiry in the spirit with which we have already dealt by it. We are fain that no principle should find advocacy in these columns, which, on just grounds, might give offence to any who refer to them for information or entertainment. The system known in this country as sporting is objected against by many whose good meaning entitles their prejudices to consideration and respect. That it is not free from matter open to censure in this point of view, every day it is depositing its sediment, and, with the process of time, it becomes more and more pure.

Much that was base and brutal has already passed away. The baiting of animals is no more the combat between human beings is all but at an end. We can offer no excuse for them we certainly never pleaded in their favour. But we have ever sought that the right character of our manly, wholesome sports should be understood. The cardinal objection to them is their inhumanity, as established by convention. The maxim of our motto is that of human nature, let its liberties or its pleasures be taken—in the spirit of repression—we ask the enemies of Field Sports to take the evidence of science before they pass sentence of cruelty upon them. Hunting, Shooting, Coursing, Fishing these involve the loss of life for the sustenance pursued; therefore, it is said of them, they are inhuman: is this a moral or a natural truth?

Philosophy cannot explain why death was originally instituted: that it does prevail, we all know. All carnivorous animals are beasts of prey—so are many birds, and almost every species of fish. How dies the trout most to its own satisfaction? by means of the fly-fisher's craft, or between the teeth of the otter? who picks out the infirm, and leaves the extremities to die at their leisure? You pronounce the shooter's a cruel sport. What is that whirling in liquid gyrations —there, in the poetry of motion? Is that graceful creature abroad on business or pleasure? The question is not easily answered; and, were the scene at his call, it floats as in dreamy extacy. Ah! see; it plunges into the yellow stubble; and now it soars again; and, by the beard of St. Hubert—if he wore one—with a plump young partridge in his mouth. We tell you that bank is a nest of ranges; but, see; now he pitches, to enjoy his breakfast behind that barn gable. Well shot! Dead as Donaldson! And these are the relics of his feast; a sorry sight. The villain's meal half consumed, and but half dead. Meeting sportsman, give it a humane knock on the remnant of its head. . . . Oh! ye grandmammas of both sexes, wherefore call the sportsman's occupation cruel? the path by which the pleasant finds its way to your table is one of many compared with that by which the article travels from Smithfield. That haunch of venison scarce quivered with the lightning flash that let out the wild deer's life; the loin of veal was given to the knife as we speak—for calves must bleed to death by a successive stages to insure their whiteness.

As a principle, woodcraft is shown by the naturalist to be void of inhumanity so is the spirit of true field sports free from a base or cruel sense of repression. Is there in the the turf pursued as a pastime—ought of which a gentleman need be ashamed? Is not the cause a gentle type of chivalry? Is not yachting a recreation of which an Englishman may be proud? How fair and manly a game is cricket; and is there one, even of those uttermost of grandmammas already apostrophised that would not rather see the only hope of their houses and heirs towing a wager-boat in a gale of wind than in Westminster? Fancy with less than the substance of a pill-box between him and eternity, than "a smooth, proper prig, with his hair always combed down on his forehead, hands always clean, and without spot or blemish in his whole deportment"—a wholesale.

Them, in the name of Fate, it not of Fun,
Grant Heaven to Lo Chase, the Rod and Gun.

If game must die, as naturalists declare,
Or man has little choice or none to be later:
To keep old Game legends, if the whole
Be sent by Nature's high decree to wholesale,

There is not a naturalist that ever put pen to paper but assures us that unless the lower animals ate one another there would be nothing left for the higher to feed upon. They all prey upon each other, more or less, without previous Lilmeation, from one state of existence into another, suffer little more in the change than in running from one place to another. . . . .

THE MARKETS

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—During the present week the arrivals of English wheat have been again limited, and very moderate; only 1,410 quarters. The arrivals of foreign are rapidly assuming a fair amount, and the demand for that article was steadily and Monday's quotations were well supported. The quantity of free sorts of wheat being very small, the sale for it was limited, but with all any advances. Barley—the supply of which was short—moved off freely at very full prices. Of oats and beans but little was offered, and the trade was steady, and a good clearance was effected. The supply of malt was very small. Most qualities in demand, at an advance of 6d per quarter. Beans, peas, and flour very well.

ARRIVALS.—English—Wheat, 1,410 qrs; barley, 2,840; oats, 1,850. Irish—wheat, ——; barley, 1,310; oats, 1,800. Foreign—wheat, 7,400; barley, ——; oats, 760. Flour, 3120 sacks; malt, 5,410 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, new, 42s to 48s; ditto, white, 50s to 57s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 38s to 42s, ditto, white, 46s to 54s; rye, 30s to 32s; grinding barley, 22s to 23s; malting ditto, 25s to 26s; kilndried malt, 47s to 48s; Kingston and Ware, 50s to 60s; Cornwall, 48s to 52s; per sack. Brown beans, 23s to 25s; potato ditto, 28s to 30s; Lincoln ditto, 30s to 32s; grey peas, 28s to 30s; white ditto, 30s to 32s; maple, 30s to 32s; Harlings, 31s to 32s; tick beans, 28s to 32s; white, 38s to 42s; others, 24s to 4 [illegible]; Suffolk, 28s to 30s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 27s to 28s; per 280 lbs. Linseed, new, 52s to 54s; Baltic, 48s to 50s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 44s to 46s; Hull and Lincoln, 50s to 52s; per quarter. Rapeseed, 36s to 38s per last. Cakes, 5l 10s to 5l 15s; per thousand. Town-made flour, 40s to 42s per sack. Essex and Suffolk, 38s to 40s. Kent and Essex, 36s to 38s. Irish, 32s to 34s. Foreign, 30s to 32s. Canada, 34s to 36s; per barrel. American, 30s to 32s; per barrel.

The Seed Market.—Red clover seed is in full request, at full prices, but all other kinds of seeds are very dull, and quotations are barely supported.

Linseed, English, new, 56s to 60s; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 47s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 44s to 45s. Rapeseed, 36s to 40s per quarter. Coriander, 14s to 15s per cwt. Brown mustard-seed, 10s to 12s; white ditto 6s to 11s. Tares, 7s 6d to 9s per bushel. English Rapeseed, 22s 6d; Belgian, 22s 6d per last. Canary, 50s to 54s per quarter. English, Cloversseed, 40s to 56s per cwt.; Trefoil, 20s to 24s; ditto, fine, 28s to 32s. Foreign, red, 40s to 50s; white, 56s to 64s; extra, 72s per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread, in the metropolis, are from 6d to 7½d. of household ditto, 6½d to 6½d per 4-lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 54s 6d; barley, 32s 7d; oats, 25s 10d; rye, 35s 8d; beans, 34s 2d; peas, 35s 2d.

The Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 54s 9d; barley, 32s 8d; oats, 25s 8d; rye, 33s 9d; beans, 33s 2d; peas, 35s 2d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 18s 6d; barley, 8s; oats, 6s; rye, 8s 6d; beans, 7s 6d; peas, 7s 6d.

Tea.—This market continues in a very inactive state. Buyers purchase only for their immediate wants, and prices are barely supported.

Sugar.—West India sugar has met a ready sale to-day, at a reduction in the quotations of 6d per cwt. In all kinds of rum sugar, exceedingly little has been doing. Refined goods dull, at 42s for lumps, and 42s 6d per cwt. for crushed and loaves.

Coffee.—By private treaty, very few sales have taken place, in any kind of coffee this week; but, in prices, we have no material alteration to notice. Good ordinary Ceylon, 47s to 47s 6d; [illegible]

Rice.—There is rather more doing in Bengal, at a trifle more money. In other kinds, of rice, very little is stirring.

Spices.—Linseed is firm, at unchanged prices. In the quotations of from 3d to 6d per cwt. On the spot, there is now but an 24s 6d; holders are asking 25s 6d per cwt. In other [illegible] remain relatively little to do.

Hops.—Weald of Kent—Meadow Hay £3 3s to £4 4s, clover ditto, £4 4s to £5 5s; Sussex, [illegible] Hay, what straw, £1 14s to £1 19s per load.

Potatoes.—The best parcels of potatoes move off freely, at 80s per ton; but other [illegible] quotations are barely supported.

Provisions.—Prime Irish mess beef, 90s per barrel; middling ditto, 80s; prime Irish mess pork, 80s per barrel; middling ditto, 70s; Irish bacon, 50s to 52s per cwt.; Waterford ditto, 48s to 50s; Limerick ditto, 48s to 50s; Clonmel ditto, 48s to 50s; Cork

IRELAND.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—At the meeting of the Association, on Monday, a long letter was read from Mr. O'Connell, denouncing the bill of Lord St. Germans, for the protection of life and property in Ireland. A letter was also read from Lord Melbourne, expressing a hope that the bill would be passed without delay. Mr. O'Connell, in his letter, says: "An Irishman may, if this bill passes into law, be arrested, or held to bail, or sent to and kept in prison, at the caprice of every officer, superior or subordinate. No legal evidence need be adduced; no legal protection is given; no habeas corpus can serve, or, if it do, the 'sic volo, sic jubeo' of a policeman concludes the question, and leaves the Irishman without relief. And this is called a union, and the Irish are to believe they are united to Great Britain. Yes, Lord Byron was right; it is a union—a union between the shark and its prey, between the devourer and the devoured." Mr. O'Connell also argues that it is time to reverse the order of proceedings, and to begin with such conciliatory measures and laws as will place Ireland on perfect equality in civil, religious, and political rights with England and Scotland. Some angry speeches were made upon the subject. The week's rent was announced to be £237.

CONVICTIONS FOR MURDER.—At the Longford Assizes last week, John Buchanan, aged 20, Bernard M'Greevy, aged 24, Francis Costello, aged 21, and Philip Farrell, aged 21, were arraigned for the murder of Henry Bergin, at Gowlan, on the evening of the 1st of November. The Crown then proceeded to arraign the two first-named, John Buchanan and Bernard M'Greevy. It appeared from the evidence that the deceased, two of his brothers, and a sister-in-law, were in a public-house in Longford, when the prisoners came in and had something to drink. Deceased and his friends shortly after left the house for the purpose of proceeding home, when they were overtaken by the prisoners at a place called Gowlan, and severely assaulted by them. One of the prisoners, Buchanan, struck the deceased a violent blow on the side of the head with a "loy" handle, which caused an extensive fracture of the skull, which terminated in death. For the defence, two witnesses were examined to prove an alibi. The Jury, after retiring to their room for an hour, returned a verdict of "Guilty" against both prisoners. On the following day they were put forward to receive sentence. Both of them knelt down in front of the dock, and Buchanan, who appeared to speak for both of them, said:—"In the sight of God, this Court, and the Jury, I protest I had not hand, act, or part in the murder of Henry Bergin, and may I never see God or his angels in Heaven if I murdered him. I forgive my prosecutors, Judge, and Jury." He then entered into an explanation of how he was employed in Longford on the day of the murder, and closed with the following imprecation—"Hell be my doom, and the Devil my angel, if I murdered you, Henry Bergin." After this he rose, and the Judge (Donnelacher), in a most feeling manner, in which he said that no person who had heard the evidence could doubt the justness of the verdict, called on them both to repent, and, saying he could hold out no hope of mercy to them, sentenced them to be hanged. The day named is Saturday, the 21st of March.

TRADESCANT AT LAMBETH.

At the anniversary meeting of the Imperial Academy of Sciences at St. Petersburgh, on the 10th ult., an interesting discovery, made by Dr. Hamel, was laid before that assembly, which will be of considerable interest, also, to the lovers of science in Great Britain. Dr. Hamel, on his late visit to this country, found that an anonymous manuscript, preserved in the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford, is by John Tradescant the elder, of whom no autograph is hitherto been known to exist. It was known that Tradescant visited Russia, but this manuscript contains an account of the voyages made to Archangel, and gives new proofs, not only of Tradescant's great activity in collecting natural and artificial curiosities, but also of his particular talent for observation. He notes in his diary the peculiar phenomenon of a double flood in the estuary of the Dwina, called in Russ, Mamshka, which of late the Imperial Academy of Sciences has made an object of investigation. He also noticed the great number of erratic blocks found near the Delta of the Dwina, and even relates that the people of the country about Archangel, when asked by him through an interpreter, where all these great stones or boulders might come from, gave for answer that they were brought there by the ice. These words, spoken so long ago as 1618, at Archangel, will be interesting to geologists Tradescant brought with him, on his return, various shrubs and plants, amongst them roses from Rose Island, near Port St. Nicholas: these he transplanted in his garden in the South Lambeth-road, a short distance beyond Meadow-place, almost opposite Spring-lane. The present possessor of the garden is Mr. Thorne, proprietor of the Nine Elms Brewery; and Mr. Fulton, patentee of the pepper-grinding works close by, lives in Tradescant's house, wherein was his museum, or ark, of curiosities, natural and artificial. We have engraved the old mansion as a "Nook" of science. The above curiosities now form the nucleus of the Ashmolean Collection, at Oxford.

TRADESCANT'S HOUSE, SOUTH LAMBETH.

John Tradescant was, by birth, a Dutchman, and is supposed to have come to England about the end of Elizabeth's, or the beginning of James the First's, reign. He travelled in various parts of Europe, as far as Russia; was in a fleet sent against the Algerines; and collected plants in Barbary and the isles of the Mediterranean. In the reign of Charles the First, Tradescant bore the title of "the King's Gardener." He is supposed to have died in 1638; his son inherited his collection, and bequeathed it to Elias Ashmole, who lodged in Tradescant's house; and Ashmole left the museum to the University of Oxford. It has lately been re-arranged under the superintendence of Mr. J. S. Duncan, D.C.L.

POLICE.

REGISTRATION OF RAILWAYS.

At GUILDHALL on Wednesday, Mr. Rogers, jun., the solicitor to the Reading and Reigate Railway, appeared to answer a complaint that he had neglected to duly register the names, residences, and occupations of the subscribers within a month after they became known to him in the months of October and November, 1845.

Mr. Smith, of Lincoln's Inn-fields, solicitor, said it was most important for the public that the regulations made for their protection by the Joint-Stock Companies' Act should be fully carried out, and he attended to support a complaint for a violation of it. Mr. Smith produced the written authority to him to prosecute for these penalties as follows:

I hereby consent to Arthur Smith, Gent., of 58, Lincoln's-inn-fields, in the county of Middlesex, proceeding in my name as Attorney-General, against Thomas Rogers, jun. of Reading, in the county of Berks & c., for certain penalties incurred under Sec. 71 and 8th Vic. c. 110

F. THESIGER.

One of the seven things required to be done by a provisionally-registered company, was to file at the office of the registrar the names of the subscribers, with their places of residence and places of business (if any). This was required because parties had resisted payment of calls, disputing their liability and their connection with the company. Being entitled to inspect the complete list of the Reading and Reigate Railway Company's subscribers, he applied at the Register Office, and found no list there. He applied at the company's office, No 3, Parliament-street, and was there refused leave to inspect the list.

Mr. Alderman Wilson wished for some explanation as to what a subscriber was.

Mr. Smith said it was defined to mean any person who shall have agreed in writing to take or to have taken any shares in a proposed company, and who shall not have executed a deed of settlement or deed required here.

Mr. Alderman Wilson said, then a person who wrote for shares, and received a letter of allotment, but did not come forward to sign an agreement or deed, was not a subscriber

The magistrates (Aldermen Copeland, Kelly, and Wilson) having conferred for a few minutes,

Mr. Alderman Copeland said, they had given great attention to the case, and they were of opinion that the information was not sustained, and therefore it must be dismissed.

Mr. Rogers applied for costs, but the magistrates declined to make an order for them.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD. March 4.

A meeting of graduates in the Faculty of Theology was holden in the Convocation House this morning, at one o'clock, when the nomination of the Rev. W. H. Cox, B.D., of St. Mary Hall, as examiner under the statute "De Disciplina Theologica," was submitted to and approved by the Faculty.

It is stated the names of the following gentlemen will be forwarded to the Vice Chancellor, as having been elected Proctors for the ensuing year, by their respective societies.

Senior Proctor.—Rev. Henry George Liddell, M.A., Student of Christchurch.

Junior Proctor.—Rev. Thomas Chaffers, M.A., Fellow of Brasenose.

CAMBRIDGE. March 4.

QUEEN'S COLLEGE.—Thomas Thackeray, B.A., has been appointed second master of Richmond Grammar School, Yorkshire.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE. John Abraham Carter, B.A., has been appointed assistant classical master of Richmond Grammar School, Yorkshire.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE. John William Duncombe Hernaman has been elected an exhibitioner on Sir Ralph Hare's foundation.

CHURCH EXTENSION IN LAMBETH.

The neat structure shown in our Engraving is one of the twelve new edifices provided for the additional church accommodation It stands in York-street, Lambeth, branching from "the New Cut," a long street, named from its being the line of communication or "cut" from Blackfriars to Westminster-road; a district of spiritual destitution, if we may judge by the great extent of its Sunday trading.

The new Church is dedicated to All Saints; and was opened for Divine Service on Sunday last, March 1st. It is erected on a piece of ground belonging to the Duchy of Cornwall, at the back of the houses on the north side of the New Cut, near the Marsh Gate. It is a neat design, in the Anglo-Norman style, with a Tower and Spire rising 160 feet, and upwards of 100 feet from the body of the Church, with which it is connected by a covered passage, or Cloisters; the Tower and Spire being blue in a line with the New Cut. A district containing 8,000 persons, principally of the operative classes, will be assigned to this new Church; it will accommodate 1900 persons; the seats in the body of the Church being free, and those in the Gallery are to be let.

ALL SAINTS CHURCH, LAMBETH.

We hear that the Bishop of Winchester contemplates the erection of 20 new churches attached to that part of his diocese situated in the Borough of Lambeth and the borough of Southwark; a quarter wherein, notwithstanding its manufacturing wealth, the greatest spiritual destitution and want of schools for the children of the poorer classes exist.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"H. H." When we commend a Problem as difficult, we address ourselves to amateurs, who discover the solution from the diagram. Of course, there is no difficulty to the one to those who solve Problems by moving about the Chess-men; but that is merely child's play.

"R. H."—In your solution of No. 108, you appear to have forgotten that Black can play his K B P two squares, as well as only one: but for that, your variations would be correct.

"Infeld." We believe you are quite mistaken.

"J. K."—See our Notice to Correspondents "Jadouba," and "Nicodemus," in the last Number.

"J. B."—"T. W."—"Juvenis."—"Tau O'Shanter." There are no errors of any sort in the Problems mentioned the sole fault is in your want of perception. If Tyros would only consider that a fine Problem costs an able player many days, sometimes weeks, of hard study—that it then undergoes the careful revision of friends skilled in the game, and, finally, another close inspection by the author himself they would not be quite so ready to pronounce it wrong, simply because the solution happens to be beyond their powers.

"Lancastrian."—The Liverpool Chess Club numbers about one hundred and twenty members. The Manchester, we believe, not more than forty.

"Peter Parley."—Her Majesty and Prince Albert both play Chess. A description of the Chess-board you allude to has already appeared in the Journal

"God-papa." Paris, upon holiday again at our solution of No. 107, will find that the Black Bishop is not protected by the Rook when he takes White's Rook, and, consequently, White can retake the Bishop with his Queen, and mate next move In No. 108, if White takes the Kt, Black may play K B P two squares.

"H. M." In reply to your second letter: when, in the solution you propose, White for his second move plays "B to R 4th," Black takes K B P with his Kt, and the mate appears unpreventable under several moves. By the author's solution, Black, having no other move, takes White King's Pawn in passing, and thus shuts up the square you suggest the Black King should fly to.

"J. M."—In playing a match game by correspondence or over the chess-board, it is mutually understood that each party plays in good faith by his own unaided powers. An undesired who would condescend, in either case, to obtain the assistance of another player, or resort to any unfair means to gain his ends, would deservedly forfeit the stakes, and, with his confederate, be branded as a dishonourable trickster. Look once more at the position by Mr. Andersen, and you will find he is right; you appear to us to have placed the King on Q 7th instead of K 7th.

"G. H."—Bendlay—How do you propose to postpone the mate in No. 107?

"Slow Coach." We trust you have by this time discovered the fallacy of your play in the attempted solution of No. 105.

"Rozzio." Our town edition is published on Saturday. Your solution is incorrect.

"W. H." Grafton-street.—In Problem 108, Black's second move is "P takes P en passing," i. e., Black's P at K 5 th takes White's King's Pawn when it attempts to advance two squares. The solution received of No 110 is quite wrong; according to your mode of play, Black would win instead of White.

"B. M. P."—You are perfectly right: many thanks for the correction.

"Phædo." The problem you have sent us is a beautiful one by D'Orville of Antwerp, and has already been published in several works.

"W. W. R." We do not clearly comprehend your question.

* Had he played the obvious move of K B's P two, White would evidently have won a piece.

† This is remarkably well played, and is as unexpected as it is clever.

‡ Q R P one, or Q K P two, would have been far better than this move, which serves only to consolidate White's Pawns in the centre.

§ In his usual play, Black would at once have seen that the only chance of saving the Pawn, was to bring his King to the support of it. In that case we think there is no doubt the game would have been drawn.

‖ Black has nothing to do. If the Kt is moved elsewhere, White mates at K B 8th.

¶ These two games came off at a short sitting on Monday, and we shall hail the result as fortunate if it tends to rouse the English player to exertion. Hitherto, the games have certainly been of a most common-place character, and fully justify the remark made in all quarters, that there are many players to whom Mr. Staunton gives the Pawn and move successfully who would have made a better fight.

SOLUTION TO PROBLEM NO. 110.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. Q takes P (ch)	P takes Q (best)
2. Q B P one	K Kt to K 2nd or Q takes K R P
3. B to Q K 7th ch	K takes B
4. P takes Kt, becoming a Queen (ch)	K to B 3rd
5. Q to B 7th—mate

PROBLEM, NO. 111.

We have much pleasure in presenting another original problem by the greatest living master in this branch of Chess study, the Rev. Mr. Bolton.

White having to play gives checkmate to his opponent in six moves.

ELECTION FOR NORTH NOTTINGHAMSHIRE.

The nomination for North Nottinghamshire, in the room of Mr. Gally Knight, took place at Mansfield, last Saturday.

W. P. Milnes, Esq., proposed Lord Henry Bentinck, which nomination was seconded by W. H. Barron, Esq. Mr. Thomas Bailey, of Basford, then nominated the Earl of Lincoln. Considerable uproar ensued; and, although Mr. Bailey was repeatedly pressed to state whether he had the noble Earl's sanction, he declined to answer the question in a direct manner. G. M. Cowley, Esq., seconded the proposal. The show of hands was decidedly in favour of Lord H Bentinck, but a poll was demanded on the part of the Earl of Lincoln, which was appointed for Tuesday.

It afterwards appeared that Lord Lincoln had not given his sanction to the nomination, and it was agreed to withdraw the noble Earl from the contest, and to allow Lord Henry Bentinck to walk over the course. The polling, however, was commenced on Wednesday, and, at the close, on Thursday, the total numbers stood thus:

Lord Bentinck	..	..	.. 1,741
Lord Lincoln	..	..	.. 248
Majority	..	..	.. 1,393

Lord H. Bentinck was, therefore, duly returned.

GREAT DESPATCH OF NEWSPAPERS.—The despatch of newspapers on Saturday night last from the General Post-office was so large that it was found impossible to get through the duty before nearly three-quarters of an hour beyond the usual time. The number posted, assorted, and despatched is estimated at 130,000, besides which 38,000 were forwarded by the morning mail.

THE THAMES TUNNEL. The annual meeting of the proprietors of this undertaking was held, on Tuesday, at the London Tavern, Mr. Benjamin Hawes in the chair. The meeting was convened in order to receive a report from the Court of Directors, and to re-elect three of their body, who have retired by rotation. The Chairman, in opening the business of the day, stated that several railway companies had applied to the Company to purchase the Tunnel, but they could not do so without the consent of Government. It would be for the interest of the proprietors to accept of a compromise. Mr. Charnier then read the report, from which it appeared that there had been a decrease of passengers during 1845, as compared with the previous year, the amount received for tolls during the twelve months, ending December 3, 1845, having been £4968 15s. 8d. The debt owing to the Government for advances amounted to £285,500, exclusive of £56,000 on account of interest. In addition to this sum, a further cost had been incurred, in the completion of the undertaking, to the amount of £179,514

THE INSURRECTION IN POLAND.

The Governments that arrogate to themselves the title of "paternal," are singularly unsuccessful in awakening any of that love and gratitude, which are associated with the relations of dependents and protectors; the rulers who do the most for their subjects in their paternal style, are, unfortunately, the most feared and hated; and the connection that bears so auspicious a name, is but a bond of mutual jealousy and suspicion. The condition of the nations under them is much that of the inmates of a prison, watching for an opportunity of escape; and the repose of the rulers is little better than that of the gaoler when the doors are locked—they cannot even then be quite certain that all is safe: the watchers over the chain are nearly as miserable as those who wear it. There is not a "paternal Government" of Europe that can win its children to feel for it anything but hate; they obey only from fear, and wait only to revenge. Immense is the amount of human blindness and ingratitude, if the rulers are really what they describe themselves to be; but men do not like even to be made happy against their wills.

The three Governments of Austria, Russia, and Prussia, the three models of "paternal" despotism, after fifteen years of sway over a nation crushed in an all but successful revolt, are, at the present moment, involved in another struggle with the same people: Poland is again in a state of insurrection. The accounts are too vague as yet to enable any certain conclusion to be drawn from them as to the event: that the odds are great against the insurgents is true; that it is a sudden or ill-planned outbreak is not so certain; whether it is rash or not depends on the result: if it succeed it will be called courage and heroism; if it fail it will be denounced as madness. History has done this in all ages. But the very fact of an insurrection being possible under three such Governments is a most significant one: they are the three greatest military powers of Europe as to numbers and the organisation of their armies, if not in higher military essentials; they have, hitherto, helped each other in the subjugation of Poland, with a unanimity and zeal worthy a better cause; and all that the most ruthless and inhuman use of the most unlimited earthly power could effect to annihilate a people, destroy a language, and root out a nation, has been done, and yet Poland has again revolted! There is a lesson in this the world should not overlook or think a slight one. The present effort may be the first struggle of a reviving and growing energy, or it may be the last throe of national despair; but, in either case, it shows that action is still possible, and that oppression of man by man is never safe.

Since the fall of Warsaw and the defeat of the Poles, in the last revolt, comparatively little has been heard of the state of the country. It is not the policy of either of the three Powers who possess it, to let anything be known of their proceedings; they allow no newspapers to narrate their acts, or to discuss them, even in their own territories, where their power is settled. With respect to Poland, all is necessarily buried in silence; but, as it is some degree of merit not to be worst, Austria and Prussia may have the credit of having the smallest share in the rumours that have, from time to time, ascribed to Russia the blackest and most heartless tyranny in that unhappy land. Austria is ruled by Metternich; he is a man with a clear head, and he takes some care of the physical welfare of the people, as the best substitute for political liberty. Prussia has the smallest portion of the territory of Poland, and is more within the reach of European opinion. But Russia stands alone, with more power than usually falls to a Government, and something less than the average of wisdom, prudence, and humanity to regulate it. The consequence is that its Polish dominions are its European reproach. If, according to Hamlet's description, the world is a prison, having many confines, wards, and dungeons, assuredly Poland is one of the worst. Nicholas is a political Martinet, with a drill-sergeant's theory of Government; he spends his life in reducing the whole of his immense Empire, with all its varied climates, races, religions, and languages, to one uniform, regimental system of policy; it is a mistake, and a fatal one. The population of Russia, the bulk of it scarcely a century emerged from barbarism, will accept, and live with advantage, and progress, perhaps, under a system to which a civilised, high-spirited people, with a noble Literature, and a History which may challenge that of any State for heroism and brilliant achievements in the cause of Christianity and mankind, would prefer death and exile—as they have preferred both, and are seeking them, we fear, again. But the theory of the Emperor is, that everything under the Russian sceptre must become Russian in every respect: on this fixed idea he has for years lavished blood and treasure in the Caucasus; for this he provoked the last Insurrection in Poland; by this he has caused the present outbreak; and, as long as he continues to war with Nature, by attempting to annihilate a race, and root out all national distinctions, he will be the gaoler of a country, but not its ruler, in the better and higher sense of the word.

The present movement naturally suggests the question, what has provoked it? What has been the conduct of the Russian Government since it crushed the last outbreak? What immediately followed the fall of Warsaw, has become History: the execution of many leaders—the exile of thousands of all ranks—the confiscations of property—all this belongs to the past. It is the continual weight of the yoke that has ever since pressed on those who were left, that has again excited the people to revolt. The Emperor has kept his word in some respects: he swore he would leave the Poles no relic of liberty; and he has done his best to fulfil his oath.

In October, 1835, he, for the first time, consented to receive the Town Council of Warsaw; he made them a speech when they appeared in his presence unparalleled in the records of Royal and Imperial addresses; a few extracts from it, as it was given in the Journal of St. Petersburg, may not be without interest at the present juncture; after forbidding them to read the address with which they came prepared, "to spare them a lie, since he knew their thoughts were not such as their words would express," he accused them of black ingratitude (the vice, as we have said, of all people who live under paternal Governments), told them they had destroyed their own happiness, but that he forgave them; that he would repay their evil with good, and was determined to make them happy again "against their own wills: he [illegible] you have now to choose between two courses, either to persist in your delusions of an independent Poland, or to live peaceful, faithful subjects of my Government. If you do persist in these dreams of independence, of popular liberty, and other such empty visions, I tell you, you will only prepare for yourselves great misfortunes. I have built a citadel here, and I now warn you, that on the first revolt, I will raze Warsaw to the ground, and I will not be the one to suffer it to be built again. In that case you will be obliged to address you in this manner; but what I say is for your own good. It rests with you to cause the past to be forgotten; it can only be effected by your good conduct, and your attachment to my Government." He then states he is aware that a correspondence is still kept up with foreign countries, and that "bad writings are introduced, and that attempts are made to corrupt the minds of the people;" but that, since "the best police in the world would be unable to check the [illegible] printers," he expects they will aid the police in that duty, to guard against the evil. He thus concludes: "Amid all the disturbances that have agitated Europe, in the midst of all the theories that have shaken the fabric of social order, Russia alone has remained strong and unmoved; it is a real happiness to belong to such a land, and to enjoy its protection." Mankind are evidently most perverse in their insensibility to their own good; the Poles, at least, cannot see the "real blessing" of Russian protection, and have done and are doing all they can to escape from it. Since that time, a whole generation has grown up, youths have become men, and men have ripened to maturity, by the daily and hourly suffering of an irksome tyranny, that keep-watch on every word and action; makes impossible—at least, very difficult—all correspondence abroad, and dangerous all interchange of thought at home; the Poles are a lively and impulsive race, and to them this leaden despotism is doubly oppressive. Is it any wonder they try to shake off the yoke! Then there are other and more material evils; they are taxed, not to their national revenue, but to the general expenses of the whole empire; they are subject to a heavy conscription, which sends her children to feed the Russian armies; they must not speak their native tongue, nor worship in the church of their forefathers. How intense must be the spirit of nationality that can survive all the means that hounding power can apply to such inhuman ends! In the midst of all this, their physical condition decays; the continual watch kept on the frontiers impedes trade; that which was formerly carried on with the interior of Russia itself is almost destroyed; the once flourishing towns on the frontiers of Prussia, which feel most these impediments on commerce, are fast decaying; the manufacturers whom the spirit of enterprise induced to emigrate from Germany to Poland, have transferred themselves to Russia: throughout the kingdom poverty is spreading more and more through the mass of the people, and the civilization of a nation sinks with its wealth till all is a scene of physical, moral and social ruin. Ten millions will never submit to these results of despotic protection. The faults of the old social system of Poland were great enough; her aristocracy were insolent, exclusive and unsympathising with the mass of the population; they have been bitterly punished for their crimes and feuds; where are they now? Truly the History of Poland is a great lesson to the whole world. There is hope for her yet, but it lies more in the gradual operation of time than in her present efforts. The neighbouring nations of Bohemia and Hungary are advancing, and are likely yet to be the seats of great and free Governments; in them she may yet find support; Prussia will soon have enough to do with its own subjects indignant at being so long cajoled of the freedom that has been so often promised and so long deferred, while not even the power of Austria will always suffice to hold the Italians in subjection. It is something for the Poles to have proved that self defence is still a possibility.

INSURRECTION IN POLAND.

In part of our impression last week, we gave an account of an insurrection which had broken out in the little Republic of Cracow. The accounts since published in the German and French papers are so varied and contradictory, that it is difficult to ascertain the extent or consequences of the movement, but we supply the most complete and accurate version which has reached this country. A letter from Berlin, of the 28th of February, in the Times, gives the following details of the origin of the insurrection:—

"The news was brought to the Austrian Silesian frontier on the 21st ult., by Government authorities, who had been forced to flee for their lives; they described their position to have been extremely perilous, and their escape as attended with great difficulty. Various bands of armed men had for the course of the same day, who stated that the peasantry had fled in great numbers across the Prussian frontier in various places, and that much consternation prevailed. The immediate occasion of the present outbreak is stated to have been as follows:—On Wednesday, the 18th Feb., Austrian troops having marched from Podgorze upon Cracow, took possession of the city, whence a detachment of twenty-five men was sent to Jaworzno to arrest a private house at which arms were reported to be concealed. This was the immediate occasion of the rising, which commenced by ringing the toscin, on hearing which signal, a crowd of insurgents, chiefly smelters and miners, assembled, fell upon the Austrian troops, disarmed them, and liberated 70 prisoners who were in the House of Correction. It is said that some of the employers of these misguided men have been murdered, doubtless while trying to bring them to a sense of their misconduct. The public mind is the more excited [illegible] section or not with the insurrectionists [illegible] caused in Austrian, Russian, and Prussian Poland. Meanwhile the arrests go on uninterruptedly in the Grand Duchy of Posen; and much importance is attached to the seizure of the two brothers, Counts Ignatius and Joseph Brinsky, who are regarded as having been the soul of the conspiracy, and are now safely lodged in the Posen Citadel.

"In Cracow two ringleaders reside, who hold communication with all Gallicia by means of secret correspondents and emissaries. In Lemberg from 60 to 80 individuals have been arrested, chiefly among the upper classes, whether nobles, students, or military. Government, it is said, has for some time been aware that something was brewing; but the great extent of action, by the upper Silesian railway Commotions are reported to have broken out in Russian Poland also, though, indeed, the extreme difficulty of procuring intelligence from that quarter, renders it problematical in the extreme. Many statements deserving of credit accounts are said to have reached the Prussian Government, of very decided occurrences in Poland Proper, Volhynia, and Lithuania, in which more [illegible] sination, and frequently fatal conflicts have been the result. A report, too, was spread of disturbances having broken out in St. Petersburgh itself, the details of which were more limited at, than plainly expressed; but which were [illegible] ter. The public mind is the more ex[illegible]

"Accounts from Breslau, of the 23rd, state further, that the Lemberg post had been stopped by the rebels, and robbed of a large sum of money. Strong detachments of troops are being despatched to the frontiers, and couriers are scouring the country in all directions. On the 22nd, a corps of light infantry was sent off from Breslau towards the scene of action, by the upper Silesian railway. Commotions are reported to have broken out in Russian Poland also, though, indeed, the extreme difficulty of procuring intelligence from that quarter, renders it problematical in the extreme. Many statements deserving of credit accounts are said to have reached the Prussian Government, of very decided occurrences in Poland Proper, Volhynia, and Lithuania, in which more [illegible] sination, and frequently fatal conflicts have been the result. IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Monday.

The News of Minsk.—The Marquis of Londonderry asked if a document which had recently been published, with the signature of M. de Boutenieff, the Russian Minister, in reference to the alleged treatment of the nuns of Minsk, was official; and whether any further authentic information had been received on the subject?—The Earl of Aberdeen said that it had reached him officially, and might be considered the answer of the Russian Government to the report which had been circulated on the subject. He (Lord Aberdeen) reminded their Lordships of his disbelief of the statement, and his opinion that, had it been true, the British Government could have had no direct right to interfere in the affair. His first impression of the falsehood of the story had been fully confirmed.

Crime in Ireland.—Lord Denman moved the second reading of a bill to prevent and punish intimidation to witnesses, jurors, and prosecutors. The noble and learned lord criticised many of the provisions of the Government measure for the protection of life and property in Ireland, and maintained that the 26th clause, relative to the intimidation of witnesses, jurors, and prosecutors, should be a general and not a particular act. The Earl of St. Germans said, he should attend to the suggestions made by the Lord Chief Justice, and should leave the House to decide whether the provision of the 26th clause should be made general or special.—After a short discussion, Lord Denman's Bill was read a second time; and at an early hour the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Monday.

New Writ. A new writ was ordered to issue for the borough of Windsor, in the room of Ralph Neville, Esq., who has accepted the office of one of the Lords of the Treasury.

Anticipated Famine in Ireland.—Mr. O'Connell made a statement of an afflicting character as to the condition of Ireland, and assured Sir R. Peel that the accounts he had received from Ireland were really frightful. In the county which he represented (Cork) the distress was very extensive, and he had accounts from men of experience, detailing the rapid progress and increase in the potato decay. He wished to impress on the Government the fact that this failure of the potato crop would have a fatal effect on the people of Ireland; and also that the sums of money already voted by Parliament would not suffice to give relief to the people. —Sir Thomas Peel re-stated the names of the precautions which the Government have adopted; providing work, food, and placing grants of public money at the disposal of the grand juries. He added that though the efforts of the Government were not inconsiderable, spontaneous charity must, after all, be the main reliance of the destitute, and they confidently expected that the landed proprietors would contribute their aid. The Treasury also, as soon as the resolution was passed, would permit the introduction of Indian corn, buckwheat, rice, &c., at the reduced nominal duties, taking the usual precaution of a bond from the importers, to secure the payment of the higher rates, in case the measure should not become law.

THE CUSTOMS' AND CORN BILL.

The resolutions which were agreed to on Friday night, in Committee on Corn and Customs, having been brought up,

Mr Miles said he was prepared to assent to the admission of Indian corn duty free for a limited period, although Indian corn was very likely to come so far into competition with wheat as to prove injurious to the farmer. He was, however, opposed to its admission as a permanent measure.

After a long miscellaneous discussion, the resolutions relating to the various kinds of grain were agreed to.

The House then resolved into Committee on the Customs and Corn Importation, and, after some conversation, it was agreed that, in the Committee, all further opposition to the measure of the Government should be withdrawn, and that all the objections on a protected points, such as brandy and silk, should be reserved until the report should be brought up.

In reply to questions from several hon. members,

Sir R. Peel said that he would move the second reading of the Corn-law on Monday next.

Mr. Ewart, in Committee, moved that the duties on foreign books should forthwith cease. This proposal elicited a debate, but Mr. Ewart ultimately withdrew it.

The Committee then proceeded with the remaining articles in the Tariff. Ultimately, the whole were gone through, the resolutions were agreed to, and ordered to be reported on Friday.

The House having resumed, votes of supply for the army and navy were taken, all discussion being reserved. The House sat till nearly one o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Tuesday.

Protection of Life and Property in Ireland. The House was engaged for about two hours in discussing amendments proposed to this bill, the principal object of which was to render it less penal and arbitrary. The amendments were ordered to be printed, and the third reading of the bill was appointed for Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS Tuesday.

The Newly-elected Member for Bridport.—A. D. R. W. B. Cochrane, Esq., the recently-elected member for Bridport, took the oaths and his seat.

Frost, Williams, and Jones.—Mr. T. Duncombe presented petitions signed by 1,400,000 persons, praying for the remission of the punishment which the Chartist convicts are now undergoing, and moved an address to the Crown, praying her Majesty to be graciously pleased to take into her most gracious consideration the petition of the people presented during the present Session of Parliament, in favour of a restoration to their native land of Frost, Williams, and Jones. — J. Graham admitted that the petitions presented to the House, and the memorial which he had presented to her Majesty, were numerously signed; still, he denied that the feeling of the country generally was in favour of a pardon to these convicts. He deprecated the interference of Parliament in a matter involving the Royal prerogative of mercy, and took upon himself the undivided responsibility of advising the Crown, in this instance, not to accede to the wishes of the petitioners. The crime committed by these convicts was of the most heinous description. They had been bold in committing treason, and yet cowards in execution; and, when convicted, they had been dealt with most leniently. For such men he had no sympathy; he reserved his sympathy for the widows and families of their victims. At the present time, and under present circumstances, he could not advise her Majesty to restore Frost, Williams, and Jones to liberty. The proposition led to a long debate, and a division. The numbers were—

For Mr. Duncombe's motion	31
Against it	189
Majority against the motion	—158

Vexatious Objections to Voters.—Mr. Newdegate moved for a committee to inquire into an alleged organised and extensive system of fraudulent and vexatious objections to the votes of a great number of duly qualified electors for the northern division of Warwickshire, and the northern division of Staffordshire. After some discussion, Sir R. Peel recommended Mr. Newdegate to adopt a suggestion of Sir G. Grey, and make his committee a general one. Mr. Newdegate assented, and finally a Select Committee was appointed to inquire into alleged fraudulent and vexatious objections to votes claimed or objected by the present system of registration of county voters.—The House adjourned at one o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. Wednesday.

The House met to-day at twelve o'clock.

Second Readings of Railway Bills. —The following Bills were read a second time and ordered to be committed:—The Coventry, Nuneaton, Birmingham, and Leicester Railway Bill; the Ambergate, Nottingham, and Boston, and Eastern Junction Railway Bill; the Leicester and Bedford Railway Bill; the Shropshire Union Railway and Canal (Shrewsbury and Stafford Railway) and the Stamford and Spalding Railway Bill Friendly Societies Bill.—Mr. T. Duncombe moved that the House should resolve into committee on this bill.—Sir J. Graham said that, according to promise, he had consulted with the law officers of the Crown and Mr. Tidd Pratt, and he was bound to say that the difficulties in the way were greater than he apprehended. He would, therefore, suggest that the House should go into committee pro forma, when he could introduce the amendments he proposed, which were very extensive, and would change the character of the measure. This would give an opportunity for the consideration of the alterations he proposed, and the reconsideration of the bill might take place in a fortnight.—Mr. T. Duncombe consented to the suggestion, but said the bill was a new one, and he must hereafter consider the bill as entirely the bill of the Government. The alterations proposed by Sir J. Graham would not at all effect the object which he (Mr. Duncombe) had in view.—After a desultory discussion, the bill went through committee, and was ordered to be further discussed that day fortnight.

The Salmon Fisheries Bill.—Mr. Farrington moved the second reading of this bill. Captain Harris said he should not oppose the second reading; but he should state some objections to the bill in committee.—The second reading was then agreed to.

The Roman Catholic Relief Bill. In the absence of Mr. Watson, the second reading of this bill was moved by Mr. Bickham Escott, who suggested an amalgamation between this bill and that of the Lord Chancellor, now in the Upper House. Sir James Graham, though, of course, preferring the Government measure, supported the second reading of Mr. Watson's bill, as approving of the principle involved.—After a debate, shared in by Lord Morpeth, Mr O'Connell, Mr. Wyse, and other members, an amendment moved by Sir R. H. Inglis, to read the bill a second time that day six months, was rejected by 66 to 23, and the second reading was agreed to.

Limitation of Labour in Factories.—Mr. Duncombe obtained leave to bring in a bill to limit the hours of night labour in all factories where bobbin-net and warp-lace machinery is employed.

A vote for £8,000,000 was taken in Committee of Supply.

The Metropolitan Buildings Bill was read a third time and passed.

The House sat till half-past five.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday.

Protection to Life and Property (Ireland) Bill.—On the question for bringing up the report on this bill, a desultory discussion arose. The Lord Chancellor suggested some amendments to a new clause which he had proposed. After a short conversation, the report was brought up, and the bill ordered to be read a third time to-morrow (Friday).

State of Ireland. Earl Grey gave notice of his intention, on Monday week, to move an address to her Majesty on the state of Ireland generally.

Railway Bills. The Earl of Dalhousie moved the suspension of the second, third, and fourth sections of the 93rd standing order, requiring Select Committees on Railway Bills to take traffic evidence.—Agreed to.

Their Lordships adjourned soon after six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday.

At four o'clock, when Lee Smaker counted the House, there were not forty Members present, and an adjournment necessarily took place.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Friday.

Protection of Life (Ireland) Bill. After a short discussion, this bill was read a third time and passed.

The London and York Railway Bill was read a first time, as was also the Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Bill.

The House adjourned soon after six.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Friday

New Member.—Lord Henry Bentinck took the oaths and his seat for North Nottinghamshire. The noble Lord was introduced by the Earl of March and Major Beresford.

Railway Bills.—The London and York Railway Bill was read a third time and passed; also, the Direct London and Portsmouth, and the Sheffield and Leicestershire Railway Bills. Several other railway bills were read a second time and ordered to be committed. The Grand Trunk, or Stafford and Peterborough Railway Bill was read a second time, after a division, by a majority of 98

State of Ireland.—Lord J. Russell gave notice that on the 26th instant, he should move that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider an Address to her Majesty, on the state of Ireland.

Scarcity in Ireland.—Mr. Poulett Scrope asked the question of the Government, whether their measures for meeting the impending scarcity in Ireland contain any guarantees, that every individual in immediate danger of perishing from want shall be enabled to obtain relief from some local authority, as in England.—Sir J. Graham said the attention of the Government had been directed to the state of Ireland most anxiously, and it was not their intention to give any such guarantee.

Parliamentary Proceedings of Friday (Last Week).—The House of Lords was occupied with the Pacification of Ireland Bill. In the House of Commons a new writ was moved for the borough of Stafford, in the room of the Hon. Spencer Thomas Carnegie, who had accepted the office of one of the Lords of the Treasury. The House discussed the Customs and Corn Importation Bill, and the resolutions which relate to wheat, barley, oats, rye, peas, and beans, and the imported their respective meals, as also those which relate to buck-wheat, maize, maize-meal, and rice, were passed. The Chairman then reported progress, and the House adjourned at half-past eleven.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The 62nd Regiment The following extract from a letter, dated Ferozepore, January 15, will be read with interest, as showing how little foundation existed for the charge brought against their Majesty's 62nd Regiment: "Both the Governor-General and Sir Hugh Gough frequently visit the hospital, which was formed in the 62nd Barracks, the tents pitched for that purpose in the fort being quite inadequate, in addition to the proper building always used; they send mince-pies, with other dainties, and have a word for each sick man; to one who was writing home, Sir Hugh Gough said, 'Tell your friends that I say the 62nd fought as bravely as any regiment in the service ever did.' He also inquired when they would be ready for him to decorate them, and how many would be fit at the end of a month to quit the hospital."

Activity in the Navy.—A letter from Portsmouth, dated March 11, says "The zeal, ability, and great exertions of Capt. Collier, C.B., and the officers, seamen, and marines, of her Majesty's ship Rodney, have been most conspicuous this week, they having, in the short space of three days, completely refitted the Bellerophon, 76, for sea, and taken her to Spithead. At Spithead, the same demonstration was shown by the Caryatid, Retribution, Cyclops, Scourge, Snake, and Scout; and the Commander-in-Chief, being there on official duty, took the opportunity of going on board the Bellerophon, to compliment Captain Collier and his crew for their able exertions, and the perfect and seaman-like manner in which the ship had been brought forward. Prince Albert embarked from Osborne House in the Fairy steam yacht, and proceeded to Spithead to see the Bellerophon. The rapidity with which the Bellerophon was prepared for sea did not pass unnoticed by his Royal Highness, who expressed, in terms of strong admiration, the great pleasure he felt in witnessing the completion of such an unexampled feat. Another ship of the line, either the Powerful or the Vengeance, is to be equipped at Portsmouth by the officers and seamen of the St. Vincent."

ACCIDENT ON THE LYONS AND ST. ETIENNE RAILWAY.

FRIGHTFUL ACCIDENT ON THE LYONS AND ST. ETIENNE RAILWAY.

The Paris papers copy from the Courrier de Lyon, the particulars of a frightful accident on the Lyons and St. Etienne Railway. That paper, of Monday week, says—"Yesterday afternoon, while our population covered the quays on the Rhône, enjoying one of the finest days of the season, a sad rumour spread, and soon acquired the consistency of truth. A catastrophe which, in its results, almost reminds us of that of the Versailles Rail road, had just taken place on that of St. Etienne and Lyons. On arriving at the spot, at eight o'clock, we found the road, to an extent of 100 metres, encumbered with wagons, tenders, and locomotives, lying upon each other. The waggons were broken, and most of them in a terrible position, as to the rails, and supporting each other in this position, the result of the shock that had occurred. The passengers had already been taken out, some dead or wounded, the others merely bruised. The sight that presented itself was horrible, and it is difficult for persons who did not witness it to form a correct idea of it. The following is the information that we have received as to the way in which the accident happened. At Vernaison the locomotive of the train which left St. Etienne at noon, got out of order, and would no longer act. Two dispatches were then sent off, one for Lyons, the other for Givors, for assistance, and another locomotive. The locomotive from Givors arrived first, and was placed at the head of the train, which immediately resumed its course. When the train had arrived in the plain of Ivours, a short distance from the tunnel of Pierre-Bénite, the drivers of the locomotive saw another towards them, at full speed, the locomotive which had been sent off from Lyons. It appears that at this moment they either lost their senses, or the distance which separated the two engines was not sufficient for them to be able to prevent a collision. They turned the locomotive off the rails, and escaped with wounds more or less severe; one of them is said to have had a leg broken. A second afterwards a dreadful noise was heard, which it is more easy to conceive than to express. At eleven at night the bodies of the dead, which had been placed in the house of one of the keepers of the road, were removed, and put into a waggon to be sent to Lyons. As to the wounded, they were sent to different houses where the first assistance that they required could be given to them. It is thought that many of them will not recover. The Directors of the Railroad state the number of killed to be eight, and the wounded fourteen, besides several cases of slight contusion."

The Courrier de Lyon of the subsequent day says—"The account that we gave yesterday was nearly correct. The number of the dead is now 12 or 13, including the wounded who have died since the accident. Yesterday we only mentioned the persons who had been seriously wounded. Independently of those who remained on the spot, and who were about 12 in number, there were a great number more or less bruised who were able to regain their homes. We may, therefore, estimate the total number of the wounded at 40. It is fortunate that fire was not added to the other horrors, which in this case might have been the production of the explosion of the locomotive, which, in contact with the carriages, with about 500 passengers, and the number of diligences, had overturned and rolled over each other, and which would have become the prey of the flames, was six. The train having at its head a locomotive which acted badly, and at the rear a locomotive hurried from another train, and being an hour and a half behind time was proceeding at an increased rate of speed to regain the time that it had lost. It was at the extremity of the curve by which the tunnel of Pierre-Bénite is entered, when, at a distance of about 80 metres, the auxiliary locomotive sent from Perrache suddenly came out of the tunnel on the same line of rails. The chief driver, M. Laurent, was on the later locomotive, with other employés, hastening, of course, thinking to find the train stopping at the switch of Irigny. It was too late; the trains were too near each other for the breaks to be used with any effect. The stokers turned the cocks, to let off the steam, and hastened to jump off right and left, to escape certain death. A terrible shock ensued. The two locomotives went against, and completely destroyed each other. The first diligence of the train was raised up, and kept in an almost vertical position, and the passengers who were in it escaped with serious contusions. The second passed over the first, and all its panels and seats were broken, so that there remained only the flooring; the third passed under the second and first, and was equally broken. The same effect was produced on the fourth. The fifth was completely destroyed, for the flooring itself was broken up. The greatest number of dead was found in this carriage. The passengers who were in the other carriages experienced a violent shock."

THE FATAL DUEL AT GOSPORT.

In our late impression last week, we gave the result of the trial of Lieutenant Pym, for aiding and abetting the wilful murder of Captain Seton, and we now supply the most important points of the evidence

The trial took place at Winchester, on Friday (last week), before Mr. Justice Erle.

Mr. Bodkin and Mr. M. Smith were counsel for the prosecution; and Mr. Cockburn, Q.C., and Mr. Serjeant Kinglake, for the defence.

The prisoner being called on to plead, pleaded Not guilty in a firm voice. He appeared to be a young man of about 22 or 23, and was of prepossessing and gentlemanly appearance.

Mr. Bodkin stated the facts of the case to the Jury, but they are, doubtless, so fresh in the remembrance of our readers, and are so well set out in the evidence, that it is useless to give a report of the learned gentleman's speech here.

The indictment charged the defendant with being present, aiding and abetting one Henry Charles Morehead Hawkey in the wilful murder of ——— Seton, by shooting at him with a pistol loaded with gunpowder and a leaden bullet, and wounding him on the right side, near the hip.

The first witness called was Mr. Hollingsworth, who said he was an hotel-keeper, and that on the 15th of May last he had a soirée at his rooms, at which Lieutenant Hawkey, Mr. Seton, Lieutenant Pym, and several ladies with them, attended. They were subscribers to the Rooms, and had been so for about two or three weeks. After the soirée, Lieutenants Hawkey and Pym went into the card-room, and witness saw no more of them from ten to twelve o'clock. Mr. Seton went out of the room soon afterwards, and, as he did so, witness heard Lieutenant Hawkey muttering something which he did not hear, and could not consequently understand.

Mr. H. Stange, one of the stewards of the ball, deposed to nothing further, except that he heard Lieutenant Hawkey say, "that Seton is a blackguard and a scoundrel." He then went away

John Lewis Towne was then called: Had heard Lieutenant Hawkey say that he would shoot Seton as he would a partridge. (Sensation.) On the same day, after this, he saw the same persons together again, meaning the 20th of May, 1845. They (Hawkey, Seton, and Pym) were together, and about four on that day they appeared to be proceeding in the same spot. Saw them again at a later hour; they then appeared to be going towards Portsmouth.

By Mr. Cockburn: Lieut. Hawkey turned half round, so that he knew him. The words used were, "I will (obliterated) Seton as I would a partridge."

Thomas Hammond Fisk, called and examined: He is a silversmith, living at Portsmouth. Between the hours of eleven and two, Mr. Hawkey called at his shop. He said, "Fisk, I want a pair of pistols. I behaved very foolish last night at the ball, and laid a wager with Mr Pym that I would shoot with him for five pounds, but I did not then recollect that my pair were not at my lodgings." These pistols were what is generally termed duelling pistols. He asked the price, and then purchased them. They were in a case about a foot long and seven inches wide. There were no bullets in them. Witness gave them to a boy to take down to Mr. Sherwood's. Mr. Hawkey asked whether I had a place to try the pistols. Witness said he had not. Witness then said, "Perhaps Mr. She wood has a pair which will answer your purpose;" and Mr. Hawkey replied, "He has none good enough."

W. Marsh: I am in the Marines, and was servant to Mr. Pym. On the 20th of May I saw my master about half-past four in the afternoon, in his room. He told me to take off my belt and go along with him. I followed him towards Point. Lieutenant Hawkey was with Mr. Pym at Point. They met at the Sally-port. We all got into a boat. I had a brown paper parcel, which Mr. Pym gave me; it was a little more than a foot long; it felt hard, as if it was wood. We crossed over to the Gosport side, and Mr. Hawkey and Mr. Pym landed on the beach. I followed about fifty yards behind them. They went through the town of Gosport by Sicke's Bay. We came to the preventive station, and to some railings. Mr. Pym then took the parcel from me, and ordered me to remain there till he wanted me. The shingle was then higher than my head, and I could not see what was going on on the rough down. In about three quarters of an hour Mr. Pym came and called to me. I went, and followed him to where there was a gentleman lying on the ground, and two others standing up. The gentleman on the ground appeared to be bleeding. I did not know that gentleman. One of the other gentlemen I had never seen before. He ordered me to go for a surgeon. The other gentleman's back was towards me, and therefore I can't tell who that gentleman was. Mr. Pym said nothing to me. I went off in haste for a surgeon. I found Mr. Jenkins, and then returned to the spot, but the gentlemen were not there, and I have never seen my master since. On the next day, in consequence of orders given me, I crossed over to the Fountain Inn. I asked for a parcel that two gentlemen had left. I received a similar parcel to the one I had carried the day before. I took that parcel and left it on a table in Mr. Hawkey's room.

George Daniels stated that on the evening of the 23d of May, he heard, while walking on Brown Down, the report of a pistol, and about two minutes after he heard another report. Witness would swear that Marsh, the servant to Mr. Pym, was the same person who came up to him, when he inquired for a surgeon. Witness could not say that the prisoner at the bar was there on that occasion. He did not remember having seen him at the "scene of action." About two minutes after the servant spoke to witness he saw two gentlemen going down the green lane towards Portsmouth.

Mr. William Ellis, master of the Victoria and Albert yacht, residing at Hope Cottage, Stoke-road: Was not very well acquainted with Mr. Hawkey, but particularly so with Mr. Pym. Mr. Pym, upon the morning of the 20th of May last, said, "A most unfortunate affair has happened, and Mr. Seton is wounded." Mr. Hawkey did not say anything about the affair in Mr. Pym's presence. Witness did not recollect having said before the Coroner, that Mr. Pym said anything about being "friends." Mr. Pym was very intimate with me and my family. I was kind to him; but he deserves all the kindness I have ever shown to him.

Colonel Jones, of the Royal Marines, stationed at Portsmouth, deposed that Mr. Pym was, on the morning of the 21st May last, reported absent without leave. The gallant Colonel gave the prisoner a good general character. He (the gallant Colonel) did not remember having heard any observations pass, with reference to any females, between the prisoner and any one else.

Mrs. Stanmore, wife of a lodging-house-keeper, King's-road, Portsmouth: Remembered the prisoner, who then lodged with her, returning from a duel on the morning of the 20th of May last. He was then dressed in plain clothes. Mrs. Hawkey lived in her lodgings about a week. The evening above-named Mrs. Hawkey was sent for out, and Mr. Pym went with her. She did not return until the next day. On the 19th of May, Mr. Hawkey gave witness some direction, to take care that Mr. Seton and Mrs Hawkey were not left alone. Mr. Hawkey did not assign any reason, but said that he had told Mr. Seton of it, and he had heard from Mrs. Hawkey that Mr. Seton had hurt her feelings, and alarmed her. He therefore said Mrs. Hawkey had given orders that Mr. Seton should be denied to her. The prisoner at the bar witness knew. He was always treated as a brother. Mr. Seton came often, but witness only saw him once, although she was informed that that gentleman had come several times. He generally came about eleven or twelve, when Lieutenant Hawkey was away at drill.

Surgical evidence was then called as to the nature of the wounds and the cause of death.

Mr. Cockburn cross-examined some of the surgeons, with a view to show that there had been improper treatment of the deceased.

It was then contended at some length by Mr. Cockburn, that it was the opinion that the wound, although of a serious character, was not the cause of death, but that dissolution arose from the inflammation arising from the operation.

His Lordship was of the contrary opinion. Ultimately, the learned Judge conferred with his brother Rolfe, who was sitting in the Nisi Prius Court. When he returned, he said his opinion remained unchanged.

The last of the surgeons examined was

Robert Liston, Esq.: He is a surgeon, practising in London. On the evening of the 30th he went to Portsmouth, and attended upon Mr. Seton. It was evident that Mr Seton was suffering from the effect of a gunshot wound. From the effusion of blood, it was clear that one of the large vessels was injured. This gentleman gave a most elaborate statement of the nature and effect of the wound, and the formation of aneurism, with the progress of disease in the body of the wounded man. Violent bleeding, or hæmorrhage, was the result, and death must have been the consequence, for, in the position in which Mr. Seton was, the loss of the smallest quantity of blood was attended with danger.

By the Court: In my judgment there was no other remedy so applicable to the circumstances in which Mr. Seton was placed as the operation which was performed. It was the only plan which could be resorted to under the circumstances.

Mr. G. Sampson, surgeon, of London: He entirely concurred in the performance of the operation as performed in his presence by Mr. Liston. It was most cleverly done.

Mr. John Potter, demonstrator of anatomy at the University College of London, corroborated the previous medical testimony.

Mr. Cockburn then took exception to the wording of the indictment, contending that the cause of death was not clearly specified in that document, and, in proof of the soundness of his objection, the learned gentleman quoted several cases where the objection was held by the highest authorities.

The argument between the learned Counsel and the Judge was then continued at some length; but, eventually, the objection was overruled by his Lordship, and the trial was permitted to proceed.

Before, however, going further into the evidence, it was ordered, at the instance of the learned Judge, that the trial should proceed at six o'clock.

Some other evidence was gone into at that hour, and the Judge having charged the Jury, they returned a verdict of "Not Guilty."

This verdict was received in a most crowded Court with a burst of applause, which was with difficulty repressed; and Mr. Pym left the Court, surrounded with his friends.

We have engraved the Court House at Winchester, during the Trial; and we are indebted to the courtesy of the High Sheriff of Hants, in affording facilities to our Artist to make the requisite sketch of the impressive scene.

MR. HENRY, THE NEWLY APPOINTED MAGISTRATE AT BOW-STREET.

MR. HENRY.

Mr. Henry is the magistrate appointed to the Bow-street Police-office, vice Mr Twyford, resigned; there is a history attached to the incident which is worth noting, as it is a proof of the salutary power of the press when legitimately exercised. On the 30th and 31st of Feb., two cases were reported among the police proceedings of Bow-street in the Times, in each of which Mr. Twyford appears to disadvantage.

Both these cases were made the subject of discussion in the papers, particularly in a letter from a Correspondent of the Times, signed "Forro."

It appears that the expression of public opinion on these cases caused Sir J. Graham to require a copy of the clerk's minutes of the examination of the two men to be sent to the Home Office; but it was found that scarcely half-a-dozen words of the case had been entered, though the proceedings occupied more than half-an-hour. Sir J. Graham then instructed Mr. Hall to ascertain from the Times reporter if the report of the case was correct; the fidelity of it being proved, Mr. Twyford's resignation was offered and accepted, the explanation, we presume, not being satisfactory. On this event the Times remarks in its leader of Thursday:—

"Such an act forms an honourable exception to that official prudery or pride which disdains to be advised or informed by the organs of public opinion. Publicity is a necessary condition to the maintenance of justice. The representatives of the press are the representatives of the people, and discharge the function of listening myriads. Their pressure, and the sight of their pens, every stroke of which in twenty-four hours will be communicated to the most distant provinces of the island, constitute a security such as no care in the selection of magistrates, no oaths, no laws, no possible system of superintendence and control, could ever supply. The organs of this publicity must also, in the nature of things, be the voice of the people. We do not, and could not, present merely a lifeless, heartless record of events. We must speak as well as hear. If it is necessary to use our information, it is not less so to profit by our suggestions."

The New Orleans Tropic, of December 26, in two advertisements, makes the following cool announcements:—"C. M. Rutherford has removed from Moreau-street to Esplanade-street, where he will keep and be constantly receiving valuable slaves throughout the season, and will sell, at the lowest market rates for cash, or good city acceptance." "Just arrived, and for sale, at Moreau-street, third municipality, 60 young and likely negroes, consisting of house servants, field hands, and mechanics. The subscriber will be receiving new lots regularly from Virginia during the season."

THE FLEET PRISON.

A Prison is a house of care,
A place where none can thrive,
A touchstone true to try a friend,
A grave for one alive;
Sometimes a place of right,
Sometimes a place of wrong,
Sometimes a place of rogues and thieves
And honest men among

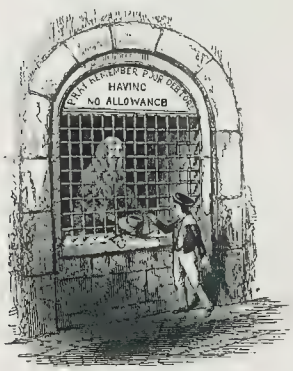
At length, the Prison of "The Fleet" has been abolished, and removed, after an existence of nearly eight centuries, as a place of security or confinement, and the terror of evil-doers of almost every grade. The disappearance of such a pile—certainly, one of the most ancient foundations in the metropolis—is too interesting an event to pass without graphic chronicle; and, although the building itself was little more than sixty years old, the locus in quo is storied with associations of a very attractive character: as its cells and dungeons have been peopled by political and religious martyrs, and men of more pliant consciences, whom the law stigmatizes as debtors. With whichever appropriation we regard the Fleet Prison, its removal must be a matter of congratulation to every observer of the signs of the times, who may trace in it the reformed spirit of our jurisprudence, criminal and civil.

The "Prison called the Fleet" was indisputably named from the creek or stream upon the eastern bank of which it was erected. This was once a busy river covered with ships and small craft; now it is a dark, hidden, and polluted stream.

By various records, the Prison was formerly held in conjunction with the manor of Leveland, in Kent, and with "the King's houses at Westminster;" the whole being part of the ancient possessions of the See of Canterbury, traceable in a grant from Archbishop Lanfranc, soon after the accession of William the Conqueror. The Wardenship or Serjeancy of the Prison was anciently held by several eminent personages, who also had custody of the King's palace at Westminster. It was "a place," in the worst sense of the phrase; for, so long ago as 1586, the persons to whom the Warden had underlet it were guilty of cruelty and extortion: crimes, however, quite characteristic of the Court of Star Chamber, of which the Fleet was at this time, the prison. Up to this period, its history is little better than a sealed book; the burning of the Prison by the followers of Wat Tyler seeming to have been the only very noticeable event during the above interval.

THE RACKET-GROUND, FLEET-PRISON.

In the reigns of Edward VI. and Mary, the Fleet was tenanted by several victims of religious bigotry. One of the most venerated of British martyrs, Bishop Hooper, was twice committed to the Fleet, which he only quitted (in 1555) for the stake and the fire, in the chief town of his diocese, Gloucester: his captivity was truly wretched; he slept upon "a little pad of straw, with a rotten covering:" his "chamber was vile and stinking."



EXTERIOR OF "THE GRATE."

The Fees belonging to the Warden of the Fleet and his Officers, in the reign of Elizabeth, were very heavy. Thus, an Archbishop, Duke, or Duchess, had to pay for his commitment-fee, and the first week's "dyett," £21 10s; a Lord, spiritual or temporal, £10 5s. 10d.; a Knight, £5; an Esquire, £3 6s. 8d; and even "a poor man in the Wards, that hath a yeart at the barr, to pay for his fire, having no dyett, 7s. 4d." The Warden's charge for lawful licence to a prisoner "to go abroad" was 20d. per diem.

From the reign of Elizabeth to the sixteenth year of King Charles I. (1641), the Star Chamber Court was in full activity; and several Bishops and other persons of distinction were imprisoned in the Fleet for their religious opinions. Thither, too, were consigned the political victims of the Star Chamber; two of the most interesting cases of this period being those of Prynne and Lilburne. Prynne was taken out of the Prison, and, after suffering pillory, branding, mutilation of nose, and loss of ears, was remanded to the Fleet. Lilburne—"Freeborn John"—and his printer, were committed to the Fleet for libel and sedition; and the former was "smartly" whipped at the cart's tail, from the Prison to the pillory placed between Westminster Hall and the Star Chamber, and he was subsequently "doubly ironed" in the Prison wards.

Another tenant of the Fleet, at this period, was James Howel, the author of the "Familiar Letters," several of which are dated from the Prison. From a Letter "To the Earl of B., from the Fleet," Nov. 20, 1643, we gather that Howel was arrested "one morning we times," by five men armed with "sword-, pistols, and bils," and some days after, committed to the Fleet; "and," he says, "as far as I see, I must lie at dead anchor in this Fleet a long time, unlesse some gentle gale blow thence to make me launch out." Then we find him consoling himself with the reflection that the English "people" are in effect but prisoners, as all other Islanders are. There are other letters, by Howel, dated from the Fleet in 1645—6—and 7.

The Prison was burnt on Sept. 4, 1666, during the Great Fire, when the prisoners were removed to Caroon or Caron House, in South Lambeth, until the Fleet was rebuilt on the original site.

After the abolition of the Star Chamber in 1641, the Fleet became a Prison for Debtors only, and for contempt of the Court of Chancery, Common Pleas, and Exchequer. It appears that the Prison had been used for the confinement of debtors from the 13th century, at least, a petition from John Frauncey, a debtor in the Fleet, A.D. 1290, being still preserved.

When the Star Chamber was abolished, the Warden's power of exacting enormous fees by putting in irons, does not appear to have ceased also; but the Wardens continued to exercise their tyranny, "not only in extorting exorbitant fees, but in oppressing prisoners for debt, by loading them with irons, worse than if the Star Chamber was still existing." In 1696, the cruelties and extortions of the Wardens were made public; but it was not until 1727 that the enormity of the system of mismanagement came fully before the public; and indescribable was the excitement and horror it caused. A Parliamentary Committee was then appointed, and the results of their labours was the committal of Bambridge and Huggins (Wardens) and some of their servants to Newgate; they were tried for different murders, yet all escaped by a verdict of Not Guilty! Hogarth has, however, made them immortal in their infamy, in his picture of Bambridge under examination, whilst a prisoner is explaining how he has been tortured. Twenty years after, it is said, Bambridge cut his throat.

In consequence of the above proceedings, the Court of Common Pleas, January 17, 1729, established a new list of fees to be taken, &c.; and modified the rules and orders for the government of the Fleet. The rents, perquisites, and profits of the office at the above period, were £4,532 18s. 8d. per annum.

Mr. James Gambier succeeded Mr. Bambridge in the Wardenship, who was succeeded by John Garth, Esq., and to him John Eyles, Esq.; and, in 1758, his son succeeded him in the office, which he held for 64 years. He was succeeded, in 1821, by his deputy, Mr. N. Nixon, who died in 1822. The next appointed was Mr. W. R. H. Brown, he being the last of the Wardens of the Prison.

In "the Riots" of 1780, the Fleet was destroyed by fire, and the prisoners liberated by the mob; consequently, great part of the papers and prison records were lost, though there remain scattered books and documents of several centuries back. Mr. Eyles, then warden, was directed by the Lord Mayor not to make any resistance to the mob, which, as an eye-witness has informed the writer, might have been easily dispersed by a few soldiers. The prison was, accordingly, burnt. (From "A Brief Account of the Ancient Prison called 'the Fleet,'" published in 1843.) We may add that the mob were polite enough to send notice to the prisoners of the period of their coming, and, on being informed it would be inconvenient on account of the lateness of the hour, to postpone their visit to the following day.

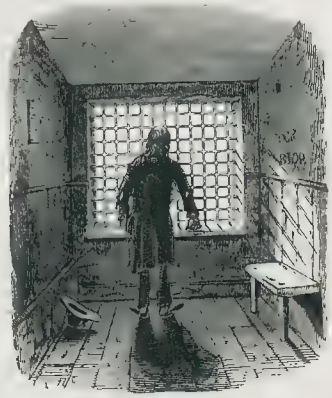
Immediately after "the Riots," the Prison was rebuilt: it consisted chiefly of one long brick pile, parallel with Farringdon-street, and standing in an irregularly shaped area, so as to leave open spaces before and behind, connected by passages round each other. This pile was called the Master's Side. The front in Farringdon-street had little that was noticeable, if we except the arched opening into a room technically called "the grate," from its crossed iron bars. Above was inscribed, "Pray remember the poor prisoners, having no allowance;" a small box was placed at the window-sill, to receive the charity of passengers in the street, while a prisoner within shouted in supplicant tone the above prayer. This was, unquestionably, a relic of the ancient prison, corresponding with the "begging at the grate" referred to in some of our old comedies. Sometimes, however, the sharing of the public charity was called "having a part at the box," as may be seen by reference to the account of the Warden's Fees in Elizabeth's reign.

The entrance to the Prison was by a heavy, stone-framed doorway, bearing on its jambs the figure 9; so that a sort of fictitious address to the inmates of the Prison was "No. 9, Fleet Market," and subsequently, "Farringdon Street."

The interior arrangements were very simple:—On each of five stories, a long passage extended from one extremity to the other with almost countless doors opening into single rooms. These passages, or galleries, were ill-lighted; and what with their dank and dirty appearance, and the turmoil of prisoners and visitors passing to and from the rooms, the ceaseless banging of doors, echoing through the vaulted roofs, they had a most extraordinary effect upon the nerves of the sensitive visitor, and made him shudder at man's self-imposed suffering. The rooms presented the usually wretched aspect of a Debtors' prison luxury, in the dirty-white squalor of the walls, perchance scrawled with the obscurings of a low mind, or vulgarity ill at ease. Perchance, too, the light streamed through murky and begrimed glass upon a bed of "London white," which the occupant, in the heyday of his dissipation, would have scarcely deemed fit for a pauper. In short, the tattered curtain, the rickety or broken furniture, and the "G. R." upon the jambs of the grate, denoted "all manner of unrest," however those initials, under ordinary circumstances, impart the idea of security, and Royal possession.

The inmates and stragglers in this home of care, presented almost as various aspects as those of a Spanish crowd. Here might be seen the turbaned debtor, bearpaged in the dirty relics of his flaunting finery; the ci-devant man of property creeping about in rage, and craving to do the offices of the menial; and the woful wife ministering to cheat sorrow of a smile, yet heart-sick and sore. Ever and anon, doors opened, and then came forth the revel shout and the jolly laugh the indiscriminate welcome, which would have the whole world for they, whom curiosity tempted to stroll one table, and then keep it in a roar. hither, did not soon forget the rabble rout, and their nestling-places—

Whence even now the tumult of loud mirth
Was rife and perfect in the listening ear.



INTERIOR OF "THE GRATE."

Alack! what "strange bedfellows" did Debt a phase of misery—make man acquainted with in the Fleet.

If a prisoner did not wish to go to the Common Side, (a building apart, and to the right of the Master's Side, where he was put, with several other prisoners, into a common room, divided within only cabin-fashion, for which he paid nothing), he had the choice of going down into "Bartholomew Fair," the lowest and sunken story, where he paid 1s. 3d. for the undisturbed use of a room; or up to some of the better apartments, where he paid the same rent, but was subject to chummage, i.e., a fellow-prisoner put into his room, or "chummed upon him," but who might be got rid of by a payment of 4s. 6d. per week, or more, according to the fulness of the Prison. The latter prisoner would then provide himself with a common lodging, by letting which prisoners in the Fleet are known to have accumulated hundreds of pounds in the course of a few years.

Out of doors, there was the same indication of recreant waste as in the interior, though with a stronger shade of vagabondism, and ruffian recklessness. Here might best be seen the characters—"characters" of the place, in which every prison is sure to abound. Smokers and other idlers loitered about the steps leading to the racket-ground, where alone many a wight who had lamentably failed in handying the ball of life. Beneath a shed was played skittles—its noiseless, wooden, rumble echoing through the place. Here you might hear the roar of the great Babel without; and from some point, see one or two of its churches appring above the chevaux-de-frise of the prison walls. What a painful train of reflection was called up by the busy hum of the town in contrast with the stagnant life within these brick walls! Then, as if to keep up the mockery, they verged upon the yard of the Belle Sauvage Inn, a place associated with all sorts of locomotion.

Happily, this pest of a Prison—the Fleet (devoted, we suppose, for sake of contrast, to Chancery prisoners), has been razed to the ground. By Act of Parliament, 1842, the Prison was abolished, and its few inmates were drafted to the Queen's Prison. The Fleet has since been sold to the Corporation of the City of London, who are understood to have made a good bargain with the Government, though they "haggled" in the purchase. The materials of the pile have been sold by auction; and, in a few days, not one brick or stone will be left standing upon another. The place has been speculatively appropriated for a Railway terminus—an occupancy of a very adverse character to that in the last seven centuries.

We should not omit to mention the Liberty of the Rules and the Day-Rules of the Fleet. These indulgences may be traced to the time of Richard II., and their antiquity is not surprising when we find them to be matters of profit and extortion by the Wardens. However, they were confirmed by a Rule of Court, during the reign of King James I. The extent of the Rules was enlarged in Easter Term, 1814, "by rule of the Court of Common Pleas, which extension included the neighbouring parish churches, St. Bride's, and St. Martin's Ludgate, and the adjacent streets of New Bridge-street, Blackfriars, to the Thames, Dorset-street and Salisbury-square, and part of Fleet-street, Ludgate-hill and street, to the entrance of St. Paul's Churchyard, the Old Bailey, and the various lanes, courts, &c., in the vicinity of the above. The extreme circumference of the Liberty of the Rules, as thus extended, might be estimated at about a mile and a half; and though not so large as the rules of the Queen's Bench Prison, persons detained therein had the advantage of access to the taverns within the boundaries, which was prohibited in the Queen's Bench. Those requiring the rules, it may be inferred, were obliged to provide sureties for their forthcoming, and duly keeping within the boundaries, and to pay a per centage on the amount of debt. For which they were retained; which also satisfied them to the Liberty of the Day-rules, which enabled them during term, or the sitting of the Courts at Westminster, to go abroad during the day, to transact or arrange their affairs, &c. The Fleet and the Queen's Bench were the only prisons in the kingdom to which these peculiar privileges had for centuries been attached."—(Brief Account, already quoted.)

The reader has doubtless heard of "Fleet Marriages," i. e., clandestine marriages, performed in this Prison, previously to the year 1754; and which, though not considered strictly legal and regular, were tacitly recognised as being valid and unfeasible. The date of the earliest Fleet Register, now preserved in the Bishop of London's registry, is 1674. Many of the early Fleet Weddings were really performed in the chapel of the Prison; though, as the practice extended, many of "the Fleet parsons" and tavern-keepers in the neighbourhood fitted up a room in their respective lodgings or houses, as a chapel; and most of the taverns near the Fleet kept their own registers. In 1702, the Bishop of London interfered to prevent this scandalous practice, but with little effect; and it was not until the Act of Parliament came into operation, March 25, 1754, that the custom was put an end to; on the day previously, (March 24) in one register-book alone, were recorded 217 marriages, which were the last of the Fleet Weddings. In 1821, a collection of these register-books, weighing more than a ton (recording marriages performed in the Fleet between 1685 and 1754), was purchased by Government, and deposited in the Registry Office of the Bishop of London. Many celebrated names figure in these Registers; and, although they are not now, as formerly, received in evidence on trials, they are not altogether useless as matters of record, &c. Indeed, the history of these Marriages, their Parsons and Registers, has formed the subject of a very interesting octavo volume, by Mr. J. Burn.

We have mentioned Horace Walpole's Letters written "From the Fleet," precisely a century ago; in our time, they have had a parallel in the little periodical issued therefrom by an Anti-Poor-law agitator, and entitled "The Fleet Papers."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 14, 1846.

THE trial of Lieutenant Pym for his participation in the duel at Gosport, in which Mr. Seton was shot, has furnished another proof that, except in some extraordinary cases of this kind, juries will not convict, though the evidence is as clear as human testimony can be; they will not regard the slaying of one man by another in these barbarous conflicts as murder or assassination, though the "malice prepense" is undoubted on both sides. Many considerations influence their judgment; and, in the present case, it is impossible to deny that there were painful and peculiar circumstances which tended to enlist public sympathy on the side of the survivor. The law, in fact, is a dead letter, as far as the punishment for murder committed in a duel is concerned. It is a statute always evaded, whenever its penalty is incurred. There is an evil in this beyond that arising from the escape of parties, morally and legally guilty, from all punishment; it is an instance in which the severity of a law defeats itself. We believe the feeling of society is gradually growing more and more unfavourable to duelling, but we do not anticipate a very speedy extinction of the practice.

We are convinced the best thing that could be done to hasten that desirable result would be to alter the law on the subject, and make the penalty less than the extreme one attached to the crime of murder. Juries are disinclined to return verdicts when they affect the life of a prisoner, except in the clearest and most atrocious cases; they will not always return such verdicts even then, as many cases might be cited to prove. If the punishment were made transportation or imprisonment for the principals, and imprisonment for the seconds, there would be less reluctance to recognise their guilt, while the certainty of punishment would perhaps weigh for something in the minds of all parties before consummating that outrage on all human and divine laws which blood shed in a duel undoubtedly involves.

We fear the Bill introduced by Sir James Graham, to "amend" the Building Act of last year, will but slightly improve it. The measure is too bad to admit of mending—it is one mass of intricate, vexatious, and absurd provisions, beneficial to no one, and mischievous to all who are, by the veriest trifle, brought within their meshes. Its proper title ought to be a "Bill to facilitate the meddling and extortion of Surveyors," for they are the only parties who profit by it. It ought to be forthwith repealed or suspended, till the House of Commons has tried its hand on another Bill, and endeavoured for once to produce a measure whose provisions can be reconciled with common sense, and its clauses with the English grammar. When it was passing, its mischievous operation was distinctly foretold; but it was forced through the House, and, unfortunately, became a law. Its operation has, however, been even worse than was anticipated; on all sides are heard complaints from those who have become its victims. It has established an inquisition into out-houses and tool-sheds, is a perfect Coercion Bill applied to chimney-pots; and a pure despotism in the matter of fowl-houses and pigsties. Armed with this Bill, the surveyor can do things that, if merely attempted by open force, would create a rebellion. The act itself defies all understanding, yet the slightest kind of building, alteration, or addition to a house or premises, if not framed with all the prescribed forms, is destroyed, a fee extorted, and then the work is at liberty to proceed. If a chimney smokes, or a drain stops, the surveyor must have his notice, and a fee, before the annoyance can be abated, and a sharp look out is kept for such cases; a hundred of bricks, or a hod of mortar, are hunted out with all the avidity of a Russian police agent put on the tract of a Polish patriot; in short, it is a disgraceful and vexatious piece of machinery, with no commensurate benefit to the community, and encouraging "sharp practice" among those who were intended to be public servants not public nuisances. To respectable architects and builders, it has proved a fruitful source of inconvenience; but it has been far more vexatious to the proprietors of houses already built, as not the most trifling alteration can be made but the surveyor is authorised to interfere, with espionage legalised, and extortion permitted by "Act of Parliament." We are sorry that Lord Lincoln had so much to do with a measure that is no credit to anybody. No bad is it that even Sir James Graham, whose failures in constructing Acts of Parliament have been more frequent than any other Minister, has been obliged to disown it.

THE debates of the week have been varied and interesting: it is a relief to find that there is something else in the world to discuss besides Corn. The political section of the world have, for the last few weeks, been wholly immersed in averages and acres, bushels, quarters, prices, speculation as to where Corn can come from, and where it cannot; with fears, on the part of some, that the people will eat—not "strange flesh," but strange grain, if it is let in—Indian Corn, for instance; while others are for admitting it for that very reason. This was the great point in the debate on Monday evening, when the Government Corn Bill was read a first time the second reading to be taken on Monday next. The opposition to the measure grows weaker and weaker, no effectual stand having been made by the Protectionists on any one point: the positions at first taken in their amendments, have been abandoned without a struggle. It is rumoured that the great coup of the Premier's opponents is reserved for the discussion of the Sugar Duties, on which they anticipate the Liberals may vote with them, and thus place the Government in a minority.

On Tuesday, Mr Duncombe's motion for an address to the Crown, praying for the release of Frost and his companions, produced an interesting discussion, in which Mr. Macaulay spoke for the first time this session. His speech was a powerful "postscript" to his letter on the subject. With a good case, Mr. Duncombe rarely fails to produce a result—either by compelling the Government to do or say something on a question, or to make an impression on public opinion. But in this instance his case weighed him down: he could make nothing of it. The distinction between "political offences" and bloodshed and pillage is too clear to be for a moment confounded in a community where the utmost freedom of discussion and political action is secured to every one by the laws. He was in happy than usual, too, in his allusions: all the facts of the Canada rebellion were against him; and though those who were engaged in the landing of Prince Louis Napoleon at Boulogne have been liberated, the Prince himself, their leader, is still imprisoned.

The fact of Frost being a man of property and education proves that the law is impartial, and the technical error in the time of delivering the copy of the indictment, so much relied on, was one made at their own request and for their advantage, as they had the documents some days before they were entitled to them; it was not an error that made against their case, but the reverse. We cannot see any one ground for sympathy with these men, who, having led thousands of men into crime and violence, had not even the redeeming quality of courage, but skulked from the danger they themselves created. It was a great defect in the case that Mr. Duncombe himself could not defend the act they committed; it surrendered the whole question at the outset.

POSTSCRIPT.

TWO MORE MURDERS IN IRELAND.

Accounts have been received of no less than two murders and several violent outrages from the county of Tipperary. This terrible state of things has not been occasioned by distress, or by the relationship between landlord and tenant. One of them is thus described by the Tipperary Vindicator:—"We regret to have to record the barbarous murder of an industrious man named James Keane, who resided at Gurtavalla, within a few miles of Nenagh. It appears that on the night of the 5th inst., as the unfortunate man was proceeding in the direction of his home, he was met on the road, at Tullahedy, by three infuriated demons, who, with savage vengeance, rushed on their victim, felled him to the ground, and inflicted a fatal wound on the left side of his head. The heartless miscreants then decamped, leaving him almost lifeless on the road-side. The unfortunate man endeavoured to make the best of his way home, where he languished under the most excruciating pains from the affect of the wound until Sunday, the 8th instant, when death put an end to his torture. No cause has been assigned for the perpetration of this horrible deed. An inquest was held on Sunday, on view of the body, when a verdict of 'Wilful murder' was returned against some person or persons unknown."—The Nenagh Guardian says—"Deceased held 24 acres of land, under Mr. Tuthill, and has left a wife and six children, the eldest of whom is only 12 years old. A man named William Fogarty, whom deceased named as one of the party who attacked him, has been taken into custody."

On Sunday night last a party of men, consisting of six, one armed with a pistol, entered the house of a man named Mears, of Gurtavalla, within half a mile of Cloghjordan. They first knocked Mears down with a stone, inflicting a deadly wound; they then, with savage ferocity, struck him on the head until his brains were dashed out. The yard was full of turf mould, and, from the appearance of the body, it is supposed they trampled on him. A finger and thumb on his right hand were also broken; there was a large bruise on the back of his head—one on the crown, where the brains protruded, four on his face, and his forehead presented a shocking appearance. Two sons and two daughters were in the house at the time. The fiends fled (one was committed between the hours of seven and eight o'clock, and within a few yards of another house; but, though the shrieks of the inmates were heard, no one came to their assistance.

Mears's family consisted of his wife, a son (a boy of them a grown man, the other a boy), and two daughters, who were in the kitchen the time the party were beating the father. The son attempted to get to the father's assistance, but was held by the mother.

Mears was father to the man who killed Kennedy on last Patrick's Day, on his return from the fair of Borrisokane

Seven men have been arrested for this murder.

STAFFORD ELECTION. The nomination for the borough of Stafford took place on Thursday, Mr. Fawkes proposing Mr. Sheppard, R.N., who had just vacated his seat in consequence of being appointed a Lord of the Treasury, Mr. C. Wright seconded the nomination. Mr. Hughes proposed Dr. Sleigh, of Brit House, Birmingham, who starts on the Anti-Corn-law interest; Mr. Griffin seconded the nomination of Dr. Sleigh. Mr. Sidney (the brother of the Sheriff of the City of London) then nominated Mr. E. Watkin, a manufacturer of Manchester, and connected with the Anti-Corn-law League. Mr. Watkin and Mr. Hooper. The candidates having addressed the electors, the Mayor then took the show of hands. For Captain Carnegie about one hundred hands were held up. For Dr. Sleigh a much greater number were exhibited than for the gallant Captain. But the great majority of the meeting complied with the call in favour of Mr. Watkin, amid enthusiastic cheering and clapping of hands. The Mayor declared the show of hands to be in favour of Mr. Watkin. A poll was then demanded for Captain Carnegie by Mr. Wright, and for Dr. Sleigh by himself. The state of the poll at eleven o'clock yesterday was:

Carnegie	..	..	..	450
Sleigh	..	..	..	12

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS

THE POLISH INSURRECTION.

The following is the latest intelligence which has reached town with reference to the insurrection of the Poles. The scene, it will be perceived, is the German journals:

VIENNA, March 6. (From the Austrian Observer.) Captain Dewald, who had just arrived from Lemberg, at three in the afternoon, with despatches from his Imperial Highness the Archduke Ferdinand, Governor-General of Galicia, reached Podgorze on Tuesday, the 3d, at four o'clock in the afternoon; he there learned that Cracow was occupied by the Imperial troops. He, therefore, immediately went to that city over the bridge, which had been restored, and was occupied by infantry. He found the entrance occupied by the Imperial troops, which also had possession of the principal squares; and he found a Russian battalion and a detachment of Cossacks which had passed the neighbouring frontier.

"Some detachments of insurgents, which left the city before the entrance of the Imperial troops, had retired into the western part of the territory of the republic.

"Perfect tranquillity prevailed in the city.

"On the evening of the entrance of the Imperial troops, the following proclamation of a Provisional Committee of Public Safety was addressed to the inhabitants of Cracow:—

"'For the satisfaction of the inhabitants, notice is hereby given, that, in order to learn the will of the three protecting Powers respecting the city of Cracow, and [illegible] and the severely-afflicted city to their clemency and attention, the Deputies [illegible] Commissioners, empowered by their Sovereigns, have been sent to-day to the Commander of the corps on the frontiers of Cracow.

"'Calling on all peaceable citizens to expect with confidence the result of the above news, the undersigned Committee of Safety declares—

"'1st. That no one under any pretext whatever shall discharge fire-arms in the streets, on pain of being called to account.

"'2nd. That no one shall venture to carry arms, except the citizens appointed as a guard of safety.

"'3rd. That all arms and military effects belonging to the service guard be deposited at the chief guard house, or at the police-office.

"'(Signed) SOH. WODZIKI, LEO BOCHENSEK,
PETER NOSKOWSKI, CINTON HELZEL,
JOH KARMINSKI.

"'Cracow, March 3, 1846. HILARIUM MENZISZOWSKI, Secretary.'

"The afternoon, at three o'clock, the Imperial Aulic Council of War received the following despatch from Major-General Collin:—

"'Cracow, 3rd March.

"'With part of my troops, the Imperial Russian troops, I have just occupied, without resistance, the City of Cracow, which had been evacuated by the insurgents. I shall have the honour of sending the particulars of this affair to-morrow. COLLIN, Major-General.'"

THE UNITED STATES.—The Rochester has arrived at Liverpool with the New York papers to the 21st ult., being five days later than those last received. The news in this is of a more observing character than that contained in the papers by the previous arrival, at least the inference to be drawn from it is of a pacific tendency. The papers acquaint us with the feelings of the American nation on the great measure of Free-Trade, proposed by Sir Robert Peel, full details of which were taken out by the Cambria. All the papers hail it as the greatest blessing, and more especially as sending to force on a peaceful settlement of the Oregon question. War seems to be counted as a thing not to be dreamed of, and Mr. President Polk and his cabinet are regularly lauded overboard in the joyous outburst of feeling consequent on such an early prospect of commercial union between the two countries. The Cambria's news reached New York on the morning of the 19th, and was printed by the evening of that day. From the tenor of the private advices it would seem as though the New Yorkers looked on Mr. Polk and his war talk as mere secondary considerations, and as if they were determined to leave the settlement of those minor differences into their own hands. Everything was lost sight of in Sir Robert Peel's Free-Trade measure. The adjourned debate in the Senate had been resumed on the 16th ult., in accordance with a resolution; and during the interval between that date and the despatch of our latest accounts from Washington, the House had been addressed by Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Colquit, Mr. Dix, Mr. Benton, and Mr. Dickenson. There was nothing very remarkable in their speeches. The proceedings of the House of Representatives are totally uninteresting. The coast had been visited by terrific storms of wind and snow. The New York papers teem with accounts of the disasters received by the shipping. The following were the exchanges. Discounts were effected at 6 to 7 per cent. Exchanges were inactive. The quotations are—London, 108 to 108¼; Paris, 5 28⅞ to 5 2½.

RE-ELECTION OF MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE FOR BRIDPORT.—The election for Bridport took place on Saturday. At the close of the poll, the numbers were—For Mr. B. Cochrane, 240; for Mr. Bemiller, 231; majority for Mr. Cochrane, one! A petition against the return of Mr. Cochrane by the Protectionists is talked of.

TOWN AND GOWN RIOTS AT CAMBRIDGE.—On Saturday evening last a serious disturbance occurred between a number of undergraduates of the University and an array of townspeople, at Cambridge. It originated from riots committed at Tom Thumb's exhibition, and commenced with a collision in the Rose Crescent, and the fight, which was of a very fierce character, continued for about an hour in various parts of the town, until the undergraduates took refuge in their respective colleges. Out of these outrages several charges arose on Monday at the Lent assizes at Cambridge, before Mr. Henry Bompas, and Mr. Hyde Walker Pemberton, undergraduates of Jesus College, were found guilty of assault and battery on Mr. Hall, and a bill has also been ignored by the Vice-Chancellor and Heads of Colleges, for the purpose of settling a number of undergraduates who had been concerned in the disturbances, by strictly preventing their attending to the peace, and all expense of fines and costs of prosecutions and bonds. Such is a statement of the Cambridge Advertiser; but private letters from Cambridge throw the blame upon the townsmen, police, and special constables. Perhaps the truth, as usual, "lies between," that is to say, there are faults on both sides. The last accounts state that the feud was not ended.

MURDER AT NEWARK-UPON-TRENT. The inhabitants of Newark were in a state of high excitement during last week, in consequence of a murder committed by two young men. The body of a young female was found on Wednesday morning (last week) in the canal adjoining the river Trent, in the basin close to the lock-gates, with a shawl tied round her head and neck, in such a manner as to leave no opinion that there had been some very foul play. The same evening an inquiry was instituted before the Coroner, Mr. Barnsley, which continued by adjournment on Thursday and Friday in the afternoon, when a verdict was unanimously returned of "Wilful Murder" against William Horner and William Rossiby, who were immediately committed under the Coroner's warrant to the gaol of Nottingham to take their trial at the assizes for the offence.

POLICE.

A FATHER CHARGED WITH ATTEMPTING TO MURDER HIS SON.—AT WORSHIP-STREET, on Monday, Mr. John Rofe, a coal-merchant's clerk, residing at No. 41, [illegible], was charged with wounding his son, a youth 15 years of age, with intent to murder him.—Mr. Rofe, an intelligent lad, whose hand and throat were bound up, stood that he resided with his father, and a younger child, at the above address. On the night of Friday (last week) he retired to rest with [illegible] in a back room on the second floor, and, between five and six on the following morning, was awoke by the presence of an arm [illegible] of a sharp instrument drawn across his throat. [illegible] observing the prisoner bending over him, with a razor in his hand, [illegible] his father, what are you doing? Do you intend to kill me?" and, at the same [illegible] the blade of the weapon, he forced it down-ward, [illegible] ding which he received a severe laceration in the lower [illegible] of his thumb. The prisoner dropped the razor upon the bed, and exclaiming "Oh, God! what have I been about?" requested to examine his throat, and, on seeing that [illegible] leading, burst into tears, and, kissing him and his brother, hurried out of the room. On meeting him at breakfast, the prisoner [illegible] the almost horror at the act he had attempted to commit, and dressed the wounds in the throat and hand of the witness, neither of which were certainly of a dangerous description. In answer to questions from the magistrate, the witness stated [illegible] father had been labouring for a considerable time past, under extreme mental disquietude, in consequence of pecuniary embarrassment and his inability to procure employment. The prisoner, who appeared in a state of [illegible], was then asked by the magistrate if he wished to make any observation; and he answered in a voice almost inaudible, that his mind [illegible] so for a long time filled with such horrible ideas, that he was unconscious of what he did. Mr. Broughton said it was certainly a most melancholy case, although he entertained no doubt that the prisoner was labouring under a species of monomania, amounting to partial insanity. It was his duty to commit him for trial for the attempted murder of his family. The unfortunate gentleman, however, contrived to elude the vigilance of the turnkeys; and, on Monday morning, committed suicide by hanging himself with a handkerchief to his door. Mr. Broughton immediately communicated the distressing intelligence to a brother of the deceased, who had arrived from [illegible] afterwards expressed his intention to take the [illegible] ham children, the youngest of whom is eleven years of age, under his protection.

ROBBERY OF LORD BURGHLEY, AT SOUTHGATE FOR Police-office, on Wednesday, [illegible] a young man of respectable appearance, was charged on suspicion with [illegible] the rooms of Lord Burghley, at St. John's College, Cambridge, and stealing six sets of diamond shirt studs, several diamond and opal rings, and other extensive articles of jewellery.—Mr. Broughton presided on the bench, and [illegible] to make known his situation to his friends at Cambridge, with a view that some of them might be present at the next examination; and that, above all, he would give notice to the tradesmen of whom he said he had purchased the two pins to be present, to [illegible] him from so serious an accusation. The prisoner was remanded till next Monday.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

THE MURDER OF A POLICEMAN AT DEPTFORD.—James Hastie, the unfortunate policeman who was so cruelly mutilated by a gang of ruffians near the Dock-yard, Deptford, on Friday night or Saturday morning, died at half-past four on Sunday afternoon, in Guy's Hospital, from injuries of the brain. The prisoners charged with the murder are in Horsemonger-lane Gaol. Their names are [illegible] O'Keefe, Driscoll, and M'Carthy. An inquest was held on the body at the Hospital, on Monday. After Lee (a policeman) had given evidence, Mr. Cottingham, one of the [illegible] streets at the Southwark police court, stated that he went on Wednesday (last week) to see the dec-eased at the hospital. The prisoners were all brought there for the purpose of recognition by deceased. In the presence of the prisoners the deceased was asked whether he knew any of them. They were brought to the bed-foot, and he pointed at and named them singly as the men who had assailed him. The inquiry was adjourned till Monday next.

ACCIDENT TO THE MARQUIS OF WATERFORD.—We regret to [illegible] that the Marquis of Waterford met with a serious accident on Thursday (last week) at Heaton, Sir W. Massey Stanley's seat, in Cheshire, by a fall from his horse. The noble Marquis dislocated his shoulder in the fall, but medical aid having been promptly obtained, [illegible] and the Marquis is going on favourably.

SUICIDE AT ISLINGTON.—Mr. Lamb, an [illegible] observer in Islington, who went down to Brighton from London on Saturday week, and took lodgings in the King's-road, committed suicide on Monday morning. He rose about six o'clock, part dressed himself, and then went to bed, and died in an apoplectic fit. He left no family, and was [illegible] by his brother with Mr. Wilson, a companion, went to [illegible] lying dead, partly dressed. Mr. Joseph, the surgeon, had opened the body, and, from its appearances, said that death was the result of apoplexy. An inquest to that effect was returned.

EXTENSIVE FIRE IN THE EDGEWARE-ROAD.—On Wednesday night, shortly after the closing, a fire occurred in the house belonging to Mr. Smith, linendraper, No. 100, Edgeware-road. About ten minutes after the shop had been closed, and whilst the inmates were at supper, an alarm was raised that the shop was on fire; and the men being very ignitable, the flames soon extended to the back premises, and the result was, that nearly the whole of its contents were destroyed. The building belongs to Mr. B. B. Cabbell, and is in the occupation of Mr. [illegible] Westminster Fire Office. The adjoining houses on either side are damaged by the water, and the contents by removal.

THE NEW MANSIONS AT ALBERT-GATE.—Sir Roger Palmer and George Hudson, Esq., M.P., have purchased the two splendid mansions on either side of Albert-gate, Hyde-park.

THE WELLS IN TRAFALGAR-SQUARE.—By means of the new pump an additional supply of 8,000 gallons of water per minute is obtained, notwithstanding which the water has not sunk in the wells to a depth of more than eleven feet. Next week the [illegible] are to be laid down for the supply of water to Buckingham and St. James's Palaces, and a contract has been made for watering the whole of the roads of St. Martin's-street.

ARCHÆOLOGICAL INSTITUTE OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.—The monthly meeting of the Archæological Institute was held yesterday week, at 26, Bedford-square, the Marquis of Northampton, President, in the chair. Upwards of seventy members of the Institute were present. Among the presents announced was a work from John Buckler, Esq., F.S.A., a collection of engravings from his drawings of cathedral and other churches; also several etchings by himself. The discovery of a Roman Pavement in the castle at Lincoln was announced by Mr. Wilson. The large portion of the Roman pavement found in the Roman Villa at Wheatley, Oxfordshire, were exhibited by Mr. Parker, some perfect specimens of Roman pottery, from Colchester, by Mr. Gould. The Marquis of Northampton exhibited several very beautiful specimens of Greek art. A specimen of glass, of the same manufacture as the Portland Vase, ornamented in gold, with figures, relieved on a blue ground, and formed like a cameo, forming one of the most perfect specimens of Egyptian glass mosaic, of Roman times; and a fragment from a Greek mottle vase. Mr. Deering, of Redcliffe, exhibited a most remarkable Bronze Torques, found in Lancashire. Mr. Birch stated that the ornament on this curious specimen of British art was probably imitated from those strings of glass beads which the Celtic races were known to have worn; and which Strutt mentions among the articles of import to Britain in the time of Augustus. Mr. Lee, of Lewisham, exhibited a drawing of the fragment of a Monumental Effigy of a Knight, recently found while digging the ground of St. Mary Overy Priory. His most interesting specimen of the monumental sculpture of the 13th century, closely resembling that of Sir Robert de Ros, in the Temple Church. The mail had evidently been gilt; the surcoat, belt, and remainder of the dress, all painted. From the armorial bearings it was conjectured by Mr. Planché that the effigy represented one of the great family of De Braose. The Rev. H. S. Anders, by permission of the Churchwardens of St. Martin's-in-the-fields, exhibited two Paintings of the early Venetian school, containing in compartments scenes in the martyrdom, and curious as specimens of costume and design of the beginning of the 16th century. Mr. Anders stated that the paintings had been given to the vestry-room of St. Martin's Church about 180 years ago. Mr. Farrer was of opinion that they were from the original works, and possibly, by Clansens, specimens of whose works are preserved at Bruges. A most interesting assemblage of objects of the Renaissance period of art were laid before the meeting, among which may be mentioned three superb Ornamental effigies of the time of Charles I., found in the precincts of the Abbey Church, at Reading, by Mr. Ellis.

ACCIDENT AT LIVERPOOL.—Messrs. Chubb and Co. have just [illegible] largs lock, upon a new improved principle, for the above Stocks. The case is of cast-iron, [illegible] with iron, of Norman design, to correspond with the [illegible] of the building.

PANCAKES BY POST.—On Shrove Tuesday, a tradesman of Monmouth sent pancakes of six pancakes to some nephews and nieces through the Post-office.

THE WEATHER.—During the week there have been some [illegible] very unusual at this time of year. On Monday last the fog was so dense in the metropolis that lights were required [illegible]. It was very dark on the Western road, but a correspondent states that he came from Bexley in the morning, and that there was no trace of fog. On Wednesday and Thursday there was a good deal of fog during the day. The fog was noticed in the country. The Manchester papers allude to it.

THE HORRORS OF WAR!

On hearing the Tower guns fired at night in London, to celebrate the late Slaughters in India, and on reading the Speeches on the subject, by Members of both Houses of Parliament, on the 5th of March, 1846.

Hark! 'tis the booming cannon's roar,
Breaking the tranquil calm of Night!
While armed hosts their squadrons pour,
To mingle in the gory fight.

Hear with delight the victim's groan,
And Carnage, Blood, and Death approve?

The Widow's shriek—the Orphan's tear,
Will these delight th' angelic throng!
And will they cease their harps to hear
Such sounds, as sweeter than their song?

O! for a trumpet's stirring blast,
To wake the world from its false dream
Of "glory,"—and to bid it cast
Its idols in Oblivion's stream!

Yes, we implore Thee, Prince of Peace!
Hasten thy kingdom!—bid it come!
Let War, with all its horrors, cease,
And Man enjoy his peaceful home.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

MR. BAUMGARTNER was re-elected Dean of Faculty, and A. Allison, Esq., Lord Rector of the College of Aberdeen, on Monday.

The Normandy papers mention a serious fire, which had reduced to ashes, on Tuesday night (last week), the village of Sainte-Honorine Duby, about three leagues from Caen. Notwithstanding the prompt assistance of the fire-brigade from Caen, sixty houses became the prey of the devouring element; seven houses alone remained. The fire is said to have broke out at a baker's.

An extraordinary Supplement to the Athlone Gazette, brought by the French steamer to Marseilles, states a report that Sir Harry Smith, advancing towards Ledsahah, was surprised by a body of 10,000 Sikhs; that the Sepoys under his command being seized with a panic fled. The British troops, composed of two regiments, the 31st and 53rd only, demanded to be led on to the attack, but, seeing the inferiority of their numbers, Sir Harry Smith thought fit to retire. This entirely refers to the action of the 21st of Jan., alluded to by the Bombay Times, but we know not what credit is due to the report, as the Times kept the press open until the latest moment on the day of the sailing of the steamer for Suez, and expressly states that no details were known of the action.

The Cork Examiner says:—"We are in receipt of letters from Rome to the 19th ult. His Holiness was threatened with another attack of polypus, which could only be mitigated, it was feared, by a severe and dangerous operation."

Private letters from Germany, mention the marriage of the Duke de Bordeaux with a daughter of the King of Saxony's brother, as a [illegible] concluded.

Letters from Berlin announce the demise, in that city, of the Spanish agent, M. Giles, who was charged with a mission from His Government to obtain the recognition of Queen Isabel a from the Prussian Government, which it is asserted was favourably entertained by the King of Prussia. His Prussian Majesty recently conferred on the deceased the order of the Red Eagle.

A Warsaw journal states that the Emperor Nicholas, during his stay in that capital, distributed to the superiors of the Sisters of Charity, at Pultusk, Lublin, and other cities, gold crosses with chains of the same metal, and to Teckla Zukowska, superior of the convent of St. Casimir, a gold cross set with diamonds.

This English brewery of Messrs. Seaver and Co., of St. Mary-le-Bone, [illegible] destroyed by fire on the night of the 1st inst. The loss is estimated at [illegible] francs, but the property was insured.

From Jassy, of February 22, states that a plot has been discovered there against the Hospodar. Several sons of Boyards, some Greek [illegible] and sailors, about eighty or a hundred in all, residing at that place, [illegible] were implicated. The affair, however, is considered but of slight importance.

Another African expedition has left Liverpool under the charge of G. W. Daniell, Esq., a [illegible] who lived on the west coast, and in the interior of that continent, for [illegible] years. The chief object is to explore further the Rivers of Mr. M'Gregor Laird. Mr. Daniell is known to the medical public as the author of some papers on the sanitary topography of the west coast of Africa.

In an extraordinary Consistory, to be convoked on or about the 18th inst. at Rome, the Pope will communicate to the Cardinals, the state of the negotiations pending between him and the Cabinet of St. Petersburgh. A nomination of Bishops, among others some Spanish Bishops, will take place at Vienna. It has been received from different legations that soldiers belonging to the Swiss regiments are missing, and no traces of them discovered. No doubt they have been made assassinated. At Perusa five gendarmes have been assassinated whilst on duty, and the authorities have not been able to discover the murderers.

M. P. A. Laloy, former member of the Convention, died at Chaumont on the 4th inst., in the 96th year of his age. M. Laloy voted the death of Louis XVI. He subsequently formed part of the Councils of Five Hundred and of the Ancients, and having greatly contributed to the success of the Revolution of St. Cloud, he was named by Napoleon member of the Tribunate, and afterwards attached to the Board of Prizes, when office he retained until the first restoration.

The Frankfort Post Gazette of the 7th inst., states that the Emperor of Russia reviewed the troops of the garrison of St. Petersburgh on the 23rd ult. His Majesty proposed shortly to visit Moscow.

The Journal des Débats publishes a letter from St. Petersburgh of the 22nd ult., which states that the Emperor had commanded that all foreign Jews, even those of Poland, who are at present in Russia, should quit the Russian territory within three months, should they even be established and have landed property in the country. In future no foreign Israelite is to be permitted to reside in Russia without a special permission from the Government.

We hear from Italy that a tumult took place at Placenza on the 25th Feb., owing to the raised price of corn, and that the populace went to such excesses, that the Austrian troops found themselves as the necessity of using their arms. Four persons are said to have been killed, and twelve or fifteen wounded.

A Nantes journal states that a vessel has arrived there from Gambia, with accounts confirming the report of the English settlers having taken possession of a large portion of the French factories there, and that they had hoisted there, declaring that they did not recognise the rights of France to the territory. The captain of the French brig of war has sent to his Government an account of what has occurred, in order that the dispute may be settled by the French and English Cabinets.

The Bavarian Chamber of Deputies, at its sitting on the 4th instant, passed, with a large majority, the bill for forming, at the expense of the state, a railroad from Bamberg to the frontier of the kingdom, by Wurzburgh and Aschaffenburg.

The Grand Council of the Canton of the Grisons has just granted permission for a railway to run through their territory. It is to join part of an immense line, intended to join the Mediterranean, by Genoa, with the Lake of Constance. The Austrian Government and the Grand Councils of Tessino and St Gall had previously given it our consent.

The Central Section of the Second Chamber of the States-General of the Netherlands received on the 6th inst. the report on the proposed increase of customs duties on the imports from Belgium, in conformity with the decree of January 9th. The majority of the members declared themselves in favour of the principles of Free-Trade, and against all measures of reprisals; considering that a prudent policy was always the best exemple, except when called to the field of producing the desired effect, after trial. Nevertheless, forty-one members, under the circumstances in which the country found itself with regard to Belgium, voted for the adoption of the law, wishing by doing so to convince the Government in endeavouring to prevail upon her soon to remove the obstacles it had thrown in the way of the commerce of the Netherlands.

The Marquis de Preigne, on Monday, laid on the table of the Chamber of Deputies a proposition relative to the postage and stamps on journals. It declares that the present duties shall be abolished, and that hereafter all the only journals [illegible] be four cents. for any sheet not exceeding 30 square decimetres, five cents. for sheets not exceeding 85 square decimetres, and six cents. for those exceeding that size. All journals bearing a stamp in conformity with these provisions shall, if placed in the post-office on the day of their publication, be delivered free of postage; but, if put in after the day of publication, they shall pay five cents each.

Biscuits of maize or Indian corn, have been manufactured at Bristol, and they are described as very agreeable and nutritious.

We learn from St. Petersburgh, notwithstanding recent assurances from high quarters that nothing would be done with the Russian tariff, for this season, at least, that it is more than probable that, in the course of a short time, an abandonment of considerable reductions in the duties of the [illegible] and on many imports, will be made. These reductions, we are assured, believe [illegible] chief [illegible] schools.

THE THEATRES.

ADELPHI.

"The Cabin Boy," prod ced here on Monday, is a translation of "Le Mousse," a drama by M. Emile Souvestre, played at the Variétés, and written for M. Bouffé, who enacts the principal character. It is by no means a good piece of its class: the incidents are somewhat hackneyed, and the action can be too easily anticipated.

Mademoiselle Jenny Laroche (Miss Woolgar) has, on the death of her father, come into possession of his Guadaloupe plantations; but something being amiss in the proof of her birth, Monsieur Vincent (Mr. O. Smith), a rich planter, who admires her very much, determines to get hold of the estates, and thus place her, in some degree, in his power. She is, however, betrothed to Monsieur Henri (Mr. Read), a lieutenant in the French navy. The proofs of her birth are on the other side of the bay, and a storm is rising. Julien (Madame Celeste), "The [illegible]," volunteers to put off after them; and the first act concludes with his [illegible] in a boat, across the angry waters. This was very effectively managed, and would have appeared to even greater advantage had the drop fallen before the boat went through the loose canvass at the back of the scene. In the second act, Jenny returns; and from them, through Jenny's birth is proved. Monsieur Vincent learns that her mother was a slave, and, by the island law, she is one also. Hereupon she is put up to auction, and of course purchased by the rich planter. Julien's agony at having been the innocent cause of this wretched position of affairs is intense; when, fortunately, Largarette (Mr. Paul Bedford), a pilot, recognises Vincent, and denounces him as a pirate. Subsequently, Jenny is released from all her troubles, and gives her hand to Henri.

Everybody played well—very well; but, unfortunately, the characters were [illegible] somely worked into the construction of the piece, and, consequently, many things appeared to be done without a motive. Madame Celeste's acting was, as usual, clever and marked; and Miss Woolgar played a part entirely out of her line very gracefully. Mr. O. Smith was quite at home in his rôle: we knew he would not be somebody very bad from the commencement. Mr. Paul Bedford was encored in an effective song; and we must not omit to praise Mr. [illegible] for his quaint impersonation of Coquin Ballender, a curiosity dealer, [illegible] constantly pulled nose and heels into the piece, for the sake of a comic [illegible] Mr. Paul Bedford announced the piece for repetition every evening, after Madame Celeste and Miss Woolgar had been called before the curtain. We are bound to add that the applause was general.

At the French Plays, St. JAMES'S Theatre, Madame Doche and M. Felix are at present in the ascendant. Two dramas have been performed with effect, Ode, Vingt Ans après, and Les Premières du Diable," underlined a year or two ago, by an mistake not, at the Haymarket, and subsequently performed at the Surrey; and the other, "Satan," as the original of Mr. Sedley's Adelphi piece, "The Mysterious Stranger." Both pieces have been well attended, in spite of opposing theatrical attractions.

The comedy underlined at the HAYMARKET is by Mr. Sullivan, a gentleman who wrote a play, called "The King's Friend," which we noticed when brought out at Sadler's Wells.

We are sorry to announce the continued indisposition of Mrs. Keeley. She was attacked with spasms last Sunday—the results of her former illness—and was for a time under the greatest anxiety. Her medical performances at the theatre were changed in consequence. "The Enchanted Roses" takes its last flight this evening, having run between sixty and seventy nights. General Tom Thumb's rehearsals, for his new début, have been most satisfactory.

The GOTHICK FANCY BALL came off at the Hanover-Square Rooms, on the 5th, and was numerously and most respectably attended. The arrangements were on the same scale as on former occasions, and the supper, wines, and general refreshments were excellent. The only cause for complaint was the dull selection of dances. There were twenty-six sets in the programme, and only two Polkas: whilst not one intermediate Spanish Dance was to be told to be refugee for destitute waltzers—and similar perpetrations, usurped the place of others. A repetition of some quadrilles, called "Mrs. Caudle," caused a little dissension. Mr. Adams's band was spirited as ever. Every visitor was obliged to appear in costume, and some of the dresses were exceedingly elegant and effective, admirably made up from Delaporte's choicest patterns.

HER MAJESTY'S

When we last week, endeavoured to convey to our readers our impressions of what we had seen and heard at the opening of this great Establishment, our minds were still confused by the variety and novelty of the objects of which we had been the witnesses. A second hearing of the new opera did not occur, therefore, its due place. We shall now endeavour to make up for our deficiencies in this respect. "Nino" is a work which demands our closest attention. The fame it has obtained abroad, the high position which it assumes by its libretto, the method of treatment of the subject, and its novelty of construction—demand for it careful and careful criticism. We must, therefore, that a short analysis of the whole work cannot fail to be acceptable to our readers.

To commence, therefore, with the opening scene. This displays great variety. The splendid chorus, "Gli arredi festivi," sung by all the voices, and then taken up by the female voices, is finely contrasted with that of the virgins, "Ora pro Nume." The latter is a very graceful strain, beginning pianissimo, and, at last, swelling into a glorious burst of harmony, the harp accompaniments being introduced with much artistic skill. It winds up with a grand crescendo. "Deh! Pempi," sung by the celebrated Grisi, and the [illegible] which we noticed on a former occasion, made a very great effect. Signor Botelli, as Orotrope, then has a grand scene. "Sperate, o figli," and a charming melody, "Di Babilonia," which is a flowing strain, and is given by the tenor [illegible] at the words "Chi sat esonera sempre [illegible] nel ciel per"), with much spirit. The allegro, "Come notte," afterwards taken up by the chorus, is highly effective. The charming [illegible] by Grisi, "Il mio sposo," is the next worthy of notice. Towards the conclusion there is an exquisite progression of harmony, and a high note (G) admirably sustained by the treble voices, which gave us a most [illegible] specimen of the never-to-be-forgotten "Norma" of former. The chorus, "Lo Vedesti," is a first-rate composition, and clearly demonstrates Verdi to be a scientific musician, and one able contrapuntist; there is a splendid crescendo movement, leading to the [illegible] which is very effective. The recitative, "Freman L'insani" then follows. Though full of sweet and original melody, and highly dramatic, this scenario is perhaps not worked out according to the best models.

The finale to the first part, in which the principal singers are accompanied by the chorus, is on the whole good, the andante particularly so. The stretta is not in any way remarkable.

In the second scene of the second part, Mdlle. Sanchioli produced a great effect by the forcible manner in which she gives the words "Tutti i popoli vedranno," finishing with a succession of trills, admirably executed.

The next piece which calls forth our admiration is the chorus "Il maledetto non ha fratelli;" here the grandeur of style, and decisive character of the rhythm, is worthy of particular notice. In scene the 8th the most remarkable [illegible] is a canone for five voices, "Sappressan gl'istanti," worked out in a very elaborate manner.

The second part ends with a splendid display of acting on the part of Formasari: he [illegible] expresses in this grand scene, and especially the words, "O mia figlia, e un pur anco non sencrri al dolo. fianco?" The whole of the music of this scene is most scientifically adapted to the poetry, and is admirably rendered by Formasari.

We now come to the morceau of the whole opera—the most effective and touching as regards dramatic effect, and one of the most admirable with respect to musical composition. We allude to the duet between Formasari and Castellan, beginning with the recitative, "Donna chi sei." After the recitative, the first part of the duet, beginning with the words "Oh di qual cota aggravasi," is sung by Formasari, in a [illegible] manner, and the principal [illegible] of imprecation and despair must, the heart; the music is plaintive in the extreme, and the intense pathos with which Formasari renders it, is beyond all praise. Suddenly [illegible] and a most [illegible] voice, as admirably assisted by the cornet, announces the end of the first part of the duett. This always produces a powerful effect on the feelings, and is invariably encored. Then, after another stirring recitative, follows the "Largo," a charming melody, full of tenderness. Nino is imploring for his daughter's life; he descends to the most humble supplications. This is sung by Formasari with true sad deep feeling. Assyria is still the same—haughty and relentless. At length, in his agony, Formasari gives a burst of vocalism as truly electrical in effect. One of the most remarkable merits of this morceau, and one which forms a peculiar feature of this opera, is the manner in which individuality of character is preserved by the music itself. Verdi has not merely by his concerted pieces given the same motif to the different actors. All the shades of distinction are hereby kept up, and dramatic illusion sustained, but it requires facility of [illegible] and power of combination on the part of the composer to produce this effect.

Next in order is the chorus, "Va Pensiero." The unison of voices in this me[illegible] is [illegible] simplicity of character is highly appropriate to the situation. [illegible] method often adopted by Verdi, and, in situations like these, is very impressive. Modulations of tone, touching as they are, perhaps always unconsciously produce on the ear, the effect of preparation, arrangement. Here the strain is poured forth by the chorus as though it were a spontaneous expression of feeling; and its effect is demonstrated by the applause which always follows this morceau, which, on Tuesday night, was encored. The prophecy of Orotrope which follows is not so remarkable. We must not, however, omit to remark the striking effect produced by the employment of the brass instruments. In the [illegible] scene the "Largo Da Guida" is given with expressive taste and feeling by Formasari. This is, indeed, a sweet melody, and we should accord to it unqualified praise did it not remind us of a well-known Italian air introduced in [illegible] pieces; however, the melody is charming, and the manner in which it is sung so artistic, that we are sure it will be very popular. In the [illegible] in G minor that precedes the finale, the brass instruments—above all the [illegible]—are very effective. The prayer, "Oh, desdemon à il firmamento," in F, is as we have before said, sweetly sung by Signora Corbari, whose voice empatizes is here heard to great advantage, particularly at the words, "Fuggea l'ora e vola e cala."

The finale of the opera is very musical. Verdi has understood the necessity of ending with an effect. The voices, unaccompanied by instruments, sing a simple and majestic prayer, which leaves a powerful impression on the mind.

SCENE FROM THE NEW OPERA OF "NINO," AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

A second and third hearing of Mdlle. Sanchioli have fully confirmed our first impressions. The music of the first act of this opera, the situation, and even the costume, are decidedly disadvantageous to the prima donna's voice and style. But, in the second act, her talent displays itself in a remarkable manner. In her aria, the fearlessness with which she gives forth her notes, the complete absence of effort, and the perfect execution of whatever passage she undertakes, are worthy of great praise. In her fioriture she takes, as yet, no new or original flights, and confines herself perhaps too much in this respect to what her predecessors have done before her; but whatever she attempts is well done, whilst her natural energy and impetuosity gives character and force to her style. The effect of her voice in the duet with Fornasari, is, as we have before remarked, very fine, and, in fact, the opera, with the exception perhaps of the first act, seems to have been written expressly for this artist, so well suited is it to her style and voice.

In giving to so important an event, in an artistic point of view, as the production of a new opera of this stamp, the predominance which it claims, we have this week left ourselves no space for criticism of the ballet. We hope, however, to make up for all omissions in this respect next week.

LOSS OF THE "GREAT LIVERPOOL" STEAMER.

In part of our impression last week, we gave an account of the loss of the Great Liverpool steamer, near Cape Finisterre, on the 24th ult. The boats were instantly got out; and though there were 145 persons on board, all were passed to the shore, despite of the heavy swell and the surf, with the exception of one female passenger, a child seven years of age, and a native servant, who were drowned in the confusion attending the swamping of one of the boats in the surf.

The following particulars are from a letter written by Mr. M'Leod, the commander of the vessel:—

"At four o'clock on the morning of the 24th inst. (Feb.), while steering NNE., with a strong wind from the SSW., and a heavy sea running, and about seven to ten miles from Cape Finisterre, the weather thick, dark, and hazy, the ship going about ten knots an hour, we struck upon a shoal or rock, and made so much water in the engine-room that she soon became unmanageable from the fires being put out, and consequently drifting towards the land, and grounded in a small sandy shoal called Guros, about 1½ league to southward of Corcubion, where she lay with her head to the southward, broadside on the beach, at the distance of about 300 yards, on which a heavy surf was breaking. The boats were all got ready to land the passengers and crew, and the larboard life-boat was sent with a party of seamen and a line to haul a rope on shore, which they with difficulty reached in safety, and we soon after got a hawser on shore, and the end of it made fast and hove taut from the ship. Mr. Hamilton, chief officer, was sent in the launch with a party of passengers and crew, amongst whom were several ladies and children; all were safely landed, except Mrs. Archer, a child belonging to Mrs. Morris, about seven years old, and a native female Indian servant, who were lost in the surf on the beach by the swamping of the launch, though every exertion was made, both by shore, on the beach, and in the launch to save them. After this the launch, which was with great difficulty hauled alongside by us on board and baled out, made several successful trips, and all on board were safely landed by eleven A.M., going myself in the last trip, having previously ascertained that every person was out of the ship; the sea at that period was breaking heavily over her, and she was fast breaking up on the starboard side, amidships."

On the 27th the ship went entirely to pieces. A great portion of the mails, luggage, and cargo, was lost; and the Spaniards along shore behaved ill, plundering all they could lay hands on.

The following is an authentic list of passengers from the Great Liverpool, brought by the Peninsular steamer Pasha, viz.: Messrs. Storm, M'Dugall, Grase, Lushington, Frimsey, Mackenzie, Campbell, Gibson, Sinclair, Trewe, and Fitzpatrick; Mr. and Mrs. Dicey, Mrs. Row, Mr. and Mrs. Turton, Mrs. Good, Mr. and Mrs. Morris and two children, the Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Parbling and child, Sir J. Ballingham, Doctors Duncan, Borrowson, and Winton. The list also adds the names of Mr. J. Quadu, Mr. J. B. Doth, C. E. Ennes, A. Blak, and Adamson, and Miss King, per Pasha.

We are authorised to state that the Great Liverpool steamer was insured to the extent of £30,000.

Among the few articles saved, was a small box of valuable presents to her Majesty; it was in charge of one of the passengers.

All parties concerned speak in the highest terms of the exertions and gallantries of Captain M'Leod.

CURIOSITY.

(From a recent Painting by M. Vidal.)

Betsy! art thou Eve's true daughter?
Betsy! hast a peering eye?
Wouldst thou read as clear as water
All the hoarded terms that lie
Within that letter's fragile folds—
Spell every word that letter holds,
And know when thy young master,
Harry,
Or Lady Jane intends to marry?

What! not yet in the secret, Betsy!
That's very puzzling—very! Let's see—
The letter's not from Lady Jane.
No, no! you need not peep again.
A lady's hand—The envelope
Perfumed The seal expresses "Hope."
The waiter waits—no longer tarry—
Go! give the letter to Lord Harry.

Another peep! Well, well, I never!
Betsy, a certain man could sever
Most trenchantly his marriage ties,
Because his spouses would have eyes.
There was a beard and chamber blue,
You know the rest. If I were you,
Upon my life, I'd always try
To have fierce Blue Beard in my eye.

Betsy! St. Martin's—night Le Grand—
Might give thee a strong reprimand;
For people say that there Sir ——
(We never like to mention names)
Punish'd the men who oped the letters
Or of their worsers or their betters.
You ope no letters, Betsy; but Strive hard to read them while they're shut;
And letters, when they're treated thus,
Will soon become diaphanous.

How long shall this most paltry vice
Be link'd with woman's honour'd name?
Shall Curiosity entice
The Fair to libel their own fame
For ever? No! The female mind
Looks down upon the "petitesse."
Woman's pure spirit was design'd
To trust, to comfort, and to bless.

CURIOSITY.—FROM A PAINTING BY M. VIDAL.

M. PHILLIPE DUPIN.

M. Phillipe Dupin, recently deceased, the most eminent of the French lawyers and advocates of the present day, was one of three brothers, all remarkable for their talents, in two of whom it exhibited itself in a peculiar aptitude for the study and practice of the law. André Maria, the elder brother, is the author of several works on jurisprudence and the civil and Roman law, and also holds a high place at the French bar. Phillipe resembled him in his powers to an extent almost extraordinary for its identity. Under the Government of the Restoration, they were both members of the Opposition party; Phillipe had scarcely been inscribed on the list of advocates when he undertook, on the 24th of February, 1820, the defence of the Constitutionnel, then subjected to a prosecution. In this defence he distinguished himself by the bold and cutting sarcasm he poured upon the Jesuits; his defence of the Figaro, in similar circumstances, is equally celebrated. After the revolution of July, he was one of those who endeavoured to reconcile the theories of political liberty with the monarchy that rose on the conflict of the Barricades: he thus hovered between the Government and the Opposition, without belonging entirely to either. For example, when he conducted the case of the widow of Chevalier Desgranier against the Civil List, he separated the King from the suit, and personally absolved him, putting him out of court after crowning him with a wreath of the flowers of his eloquence—much as Plato dismisses poets from his republic. Again, in the great case of the property of the Prince de Condé, he shielded the son of Louis Philippe from those political attacks of which French courts of law are frequently made the arena. This case placed him at the head of his profession; it was most ably conducted. He was remarkable for a peculiar readiness and elasticity of mind, which never left him at a loss, and a clear and quick perception of all the merits of a case. He was eminent both in the criminal and civil law. It would be impossible to trace his career, which was active and successful, both in his own profession and the more uncertain field of politics. His name must be familiar to all acquainted with the history of France during the last twenty years. The funeral of this distinguished man took place on the 5th instant.

M. PHILLIPE DUPIN.

The Oregon Territory and Mr. John Quincy Adams.—During the late debate in the House of Representatives, at Washington, when the resolution to give the twelve months' notice was agreed to, Mr. John Quincy Adams made a remarkable speech in support of the claim of the United States to the Oregon territory. Mr. Adams adopted a very novel mode of enforcing his argument. He requested the Clerk of the House to read from his desk the 26th, 27th, and 28th verses of the 1st chapter of Genesis:—"26. And God said, let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowls of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. 27. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him: male and female created he them. 28. And God blessed them: and God said unto them, Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowls of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth." And then Mr. Adams went on to say, "That, in my judgment, is the foundation of our title to Oregon, and of all the title we have to any of the territory we possess. It is the foundation of the title by which you, Sir, (addressing the Speaker), occupy that chair, and by which we are now called on to occupy Oregon, and cannot do it without the termination of the convention in which we have agreed that we will not occupy it." Mr. Adams proceeded to enforce his views by referring to history, and his speech altogether created an immense sensation.

Foreign Railways.—The works on the great southern line from Vienna to Trieste are carried on with activity, and the section from Marburg to Cilli will be opened on the 19th of April.——The works on the railway from Prague to the frontier of Saxony make fair progress. It is expected that this line will be opened in 1848. ——The Weimar Government, with a view to expedite the construction of the Thuringen line, without embarrassing the shareholders, has resolved to advance immediately the total amount of the shares taken by the State. To this end, a loan of 440,000 dollars is being negotiated. —A convention has been entered into between the Governments of Electoral Hesse and Hanover, for the connection, at the frontier of the Hanoverian line, from the North Sea to Hanover, by two branches, with the lines of the Rhine and Weser, at Karlshafen, and with the continuation of the North Frederick William's line, from Cassel to Munden, at the latter town.

M. GABRIEL JULIEN OUVRARD,

We present our readers with a portrait (from a Daguerréotype, by Beard), of the celebrated French financier, M. Gabriel Julien Ouvrard, who is at present on a visit to our metropolis; and whose name has been associated with the most gigantic financial operations, and the principal political events, of the last half century. Our limits do not admit of our more than briefly adverting to a very few of the numberless interesting incidents which have marked the chequered career of one who has been most appropriately designated the "Napoleon of Finance;" for, if we consider the vastness and novelty of his plans, the extraordinary quickness of his perception, the fecundity of his resources, his masterly combinations, and the vigour and perseverance with which he worked out the brilliant but eminently practical conceptions of his genius, it must be admitted that no happier epithet could have been found.

It were vain here to attempt the bare enumeration of one tithe of Ouvrard's claims to universal celebrity. Suffice it then, to say that he has figured prominently in the great events of the French Republic—the Consulate*—the Empire—the Restoration†—and the Revolution of 1830‡; that, after having witnessed the horrors of the Reign of Terror, and aided in the downfal of Robespierre, he became the Banker of the Republic, with power to issue a paper currency of his own, admissible as a legal tender in payment of the taxes of the State—the associate of Barras, Cambacérès, and Talleyrand a worshipper at the feet of "Notre Dame de Bon Secours"—the votary of "Notre Dame des Victoires"—the creditor of Bernadotte—the confidential agent of Charles IV. of Spain the honoured guest of Pozzo di Borgo, Metternich, and Louis XVIII.—the intimate friend of Châteaubriand the Commissary-General of Napoleon at the Passage of the St. Bernard, the Camp of Boulogne, and on the decisive field of Waterloo—and the host of Wellington at Paris!

By a special contract with Charles IV. of Spain, M. Ouvrard became the partner of his Majesty in the exclusive commerce of the Spanish possessions in the New World during the war with Great Britain. It was in reference to this contract, and while crumpling the document in his hand, that Napoleon observed to M. Ouvrard, in presence of the Council of Ministers, "You have lowered Royalty to the level of Commerce." Whereupon M. Ouvrard, to the surprise of all present, replied, in a firm but respectful tone, "Sire, Commerce is the life-blood of States; Sovereigns cannot do without Commerce, but it can very well do without Sovereigns."

We must refer such of our readers as may feel curious to know more of the subject of this sketch to M. Ouvrard's Memoires, in three volumes, published in 1826; or to the French work, entitled "Biographie des Contemporains"

Although M. Ouvrard has nearly attained the advanced age of 76, and has survived nearly all his illustrious contemporaries, he is still blessed with the enjoyment of perfect health, and exhibits no symptom of mental or bodily infirmity.

What a striking evidence have we here of the moderation with which he used—without abusing—the bounties of Providence and luxuries of affluence; of the philosophical equanimity of his mind, and of the iron frame in which it has been cast.

By his elegance of manner, dignified serenity of countenance, and that gracefulness peculiar to advanced years which lends to age an ineffable charm, M. Ouvrard forcibly recalls to our mind that race of Grands Seigneurs which is fast hastening to extinction.

Naturally indulgent, kind-hearted, condescending, and, like all thorough men of the world, inclined to treat with lenity the inexperience and errors of his fellows, and especially of his juniors, his society is peculiarly attractive to youth. In him the vicissitudes and turmoil of three-score years of active life have neither withered the vernal freshness of his mind, nor impaired the powers of a wonderfully retentive memory. His conversation, totally devoid of affectation, but replete with information, is as lively as it is instructive. In listening to him, one does not know whether most to admire the depth and correctness of his views, founded on a vast experience of men and things, or the amiable and endearing qualities—the sparkling wit which, from time to time, reveal themselves.

The Theophrastus of France has drawn his portrait to the life in the following passage:—"Un vieillard qui a beaucoup d'esprit, qui a vécu à la cour, et qui a un grand sens et une mémoire fidèle, est un trésor inestimable: il est plein de faits et de maximes; l'on y trouve l'histoire du siècle, revêtue de circonstances très curieuses, et qui ne se lisent nulle part; l'on y apprend des règles pour la conduite et pour les mœurs, qui sont toujours sûres, parce qu'elles sont fondées sur l'expérience." ‡ Les Caractères de La Bruyère, Chap. XI

Since his arrival in London, M. Ouvrard has, we understand, partaken of the hospitality of the Duke of Wellington, the French Ambassador, Lord Ashburton, Lord Lonsdale, and other personages of distinction.

OUR MAGAZINE COLUMN FOR MARCH.

HOME AND FOREIGN MARKETS FOR MANUFACTURES.

That the home market is more to the manufacturer than all the foreign markets into which he makes his way, we quite believe; but the error [illegible] that the only buyer in this market is the agriculturist. Consider [illegible] the manufacturer produces. He gives us cotton-[illegible] our shirting and our sheeting, for the gowns of our wives and dau[illegible] gives us broad cloths and narrow, and woollen fabrics of many sorts for our coats, trousers, waistcoats, blankets, and such like; he supplies us with stockings, shoes, hats, cravats. Every article that is used in the furnishing of our hou[illegible] our window-curtains, carpets, chair-covers, are the produ[illegible] loom. Now, who are they that consume these different articles chiefly? [illegible] the country gentleman, with his rental of five thousand a-year, expend half [illegible] much upon the clothing of his own person as a spruce clerk in the Admiralty, or a shopman in Howell and James's? And when you look to the farmer, what is his every-day costume? A shooting-jacket, which lasts him, on an average, five years—a pair of cord-and-leg breeches leather gaiters and shoe-laces to work his way through which will take him three years at the least. It is only on market-days and Sunday that he arrays himself in his green coat and yellows; and these are carefully pulled off and folded and laid away again as soon as the occasion ceases. Nor is the case different if we compare the style of dress that prevails among the operatives, and that which suits the tastes and purses of the agricultural labourers. We venture to say, that more money is spent upon wearing apparel in any one thriving street in Manchester, than in half the purely agricultural villages of Lancashire put together. And as to the sums expended in furniture, compare the parlours and bed-rooms of our shop-keepers and dealers with those of the tenant-farmers in any county of England, and you will find that it is the former class which goes most frequently, and to the largest amount, into the market by far. We repeat, that though the home market is unquestionably more to the manufacturer than all the foreign markets into which he now makes his way, it is a fallacy to contend that, therefore, the agriculturist must be his best customer. The fact is, that each particular manufacturer, with his operatives, and the tradesmen who purchase his goods, and the shopboys who sell them, is the best customer to another manufacturer, who fabricates goods of a different description; and that merchants, lawyers, medical men, clerks—the vast number of persons, in short, who have no connexion with the soil whatever—do more, or at least, as much, for the whole of the manufacturing classes, as all the landlords, tenants, and peasants in the kingdom. Fraser's Magazine.

THE SHANNON

The spacious Shannon spreading like a sea.—Faerie Queene, Canto XI

Yes! "spreading like a sea." So spake Edmund Spenser. We love the mightiest of British rivers for his sake. Who, indeed, that has wandered among its beautiful and winding lakes, its purple mountains, its banks and slopes of richest green, its numerous and storied isles, that has mused on its magnificent rapids, that has rambled among its ivy-mantled ruins, its dismantled castles, its wild dells and glens, its rocky headlands and promontories, but must feel delight at that "other brother" of Milton and Shakspeare thus, in one line, stamping with immortality our glorious tributary to the Atlantic. We love the Shannon for dear Una's sake, that child of light whom we remember that the poet has placed her fabled residence overhanging the most magnificent and beautiful pieces of scenery among its upper lakes! Distinction most, indeed, for its poetic grandeur, and lovely interweaving with a crowd of gentle and hallowed associations of the Faërie Queen, that "divinest allegory," that we should not willingly exchange our river of "quiet depths and deep monuments" for any the most crowded stream in the three kingdoms. The sweetest lessons of Christianity abound with beautiful emblems and lessons. We know of none more elevating or exquisite than the story of the gentle Una. Key:—

[illegible] mizens, seasons, times,
Let all remind the soul of heaven;
Our sleek sevenfold seals then all

We believe then, divine Wordsworth; and, while we can associate, though ever so remotely, the names of Spenser and Una with our choicest of rivers, and ponder on the sublime mystery of the "Red Cross Knight," we envy not the noisy polemics of the world, their highest achievements.—Dublin University Magazine.

MR DISRAELI, M.P.

Will Mr D[illegible]sraeli be a man of strong personal feelings, who is determined to have Sir Robert Peel's pound of flesh at any cost? Still his is a clever, plausible, subtle, and brilliant mind; his hand has been dealing many a shrewd one, and in the end, every man's hand will be against him; he is a genuine Arab, lithe and supple, rather than strong or weighty; whom nobody can overtake, and who, beaten often, harasses for ever and then returns to the charge with fresh vigour; he finesses like a Red Indian, and, like him too, is implacable in his resentments; he has great conceptions, but they are devious; he is dark as jet, but jet is not more brilliant. He will make a speech one day as his lives, and may even evade oblivion for twenty or thirty years after he has been gathered to the Patriarchs. Now is he a Young England man? We can only say that, whatever may be the faults of Mr. Disraeli, and whatever the prejudice felt by Young England for some of its other champions, there is not a man living who has done more for them or their principles than Mr. Disraeli. His beautiful and brilliant books, full of true wit, and not devoid of true statesmanship, have diffused a love of that party and elevated their position; while his able suggestions, and the very denominations which he has had the ingenuity to invent and affix, have given to his friends a local habitation and a name among the national parties of the land.—Dolman's Magazine.

PROSPECTS OF AUSTRALIA.

Australia will yet be a powerful and independent country; the future mistress—the Island, or the mother of England, in the East, from whose shores will spring up here a new empire, which will change the commerce of the world, and force it into new channels. Australia produces wool, and New Zealand flax; and, as coal is found in great abundance in the whole of the Australian Continent, there will soon be manufacturers for converting the grand staples of the two colonies into woollen cloths and coarse linens. The advantages Australia possesses as the seat of manufactures are many. Notwithstanding the high wages paid now, from the cheapness of provision, the price of labour must fall. In the year 1842, the average price of beef in the Australian cities ranged from 2½d. to 4d. a pound; mutton, 3d. to 5d.; flour, 1l. per hundredweight. Allow an enormous advance towards shearing time, which, however, is followed by a great decline after the fleece is taken off); the price of flour has ranged from 14s. to 24s. per 196 lbs. Australia, being in almost close proximity to Berlin, Russia, Germany, to the Spice Islands, where a great demand exists for linens, and a more moderate demand for woollens, the Australian manufacturer, having neither freight to nor from England, nor any charge whatever on his wool, in a very few years, silence all competition. Nothing, perhaps, could be a better delineation of the peculiar characteristics of the countries of England and India, and their several inhabitants, than the plain fact that raw produce is transported from India to England, and re-imported in a manufactured state; and what an extraordinary advantage will the Australian man-facturer have, if only for situation! but all the necessaries of life must be cheap. Australia, with a population of 150,000 souls, will send out labour, if capitalists once emigrate. There is now a great population in the colonies known collectively as Australia, and it will increase twice as fast as in England, as the precocious habits of the people in their moral and physical powers, and, from this cause, marry at a very early age, and seldom die before forty. Whether they will be long or short livers, cannot, at the present moment, be clearly ascertained; but, if a guess might be hazarded, from forty-five to fifty would be the extent of the lifetime of an Australian. Old men of seventy or eighty will, perhaps, scarcely ever be seen. Death at the age of puberty is a rare occurrence; children are inspected to the utmost, and rarely often fall victims to dysentery; Australians never. It is not, either, possible to hazard an opinion as to the mental capacities of the Anglo-Australians. Whether they will be degenerate, in the usual acceptation of that term, or the reverse, is uncertain. This, however, is positive that, even now, there are men of no mean abilities in the professions who are sons of Australia. Sidmouth's Colonial Magazine.

ANGLING IN THE THAMES

Howel, in describing the attractions of the city, says: "When the elder was tired of the bowl, he had no more to do but step down to the riverside at the Temple," and have an afternoon of such recreation as now alone can be found some little distance from London. "Go to the river," he continues, "what a pleasure is to go down in the summer time, in boat or barge, or [illegible] upon the Thames." In the recollections too of the "committee of [illegible]men," recorded in Stowe's interesting work on London, may be found most severe and constant against cole-pyes, and angle-rods with more than two hooks; and there is a provision that fishermen were not to come nearer London than the Old Swan on the north bank of the river, and St. Mary Overies on the south. An especial enactment protects the salmon in their spawning time, and, during the time of flood, whereby both salmons and other kinds of fish may be prevented swimming upwards." Alas for the cockneys! that king of good fish, the salmon, like them in the departure, being no longer able to live in the troubled mire of that river, described by Drayton as "coloured for "ships and swans—Queen Thames"—Sporting Review.

THE PAINTER'S MODEL.

Nearly in the centre of the wide room, wondrously irradiated by the golden light that flooded in through its single high-placed window, wondrously contrasted with the dead white casts of many a group of ancient sculpture that lifted themselves on either side, stood a living, breathing, and, as such young goddesses must have been, if ever young goddesses were, a very beautiful woman. Her bosom, an uplifted antique ewer in one hand, and in the other a broad and shallow goblet, seemed on the point of pouring out to a grey-haired man, who sat with rapt countenance looking up to her, the drink of the immortals. Had the stranger been a Greek of the olden time, he would have believed that he saw Hebe, seen down with the copy of some youthful one of the gods; but being a Venetian of the eighteenth century, he knew that he saw before him nothing more than a young girl serving as a model to a painter. But how beautiful was that young girl! How faultless the outline of that classical head, of that low, antique brow, that sculpture, profile, that undulating and symmetrical form, so perfect, so harmonious, so flowing, from the small and rounded neck down to the finely moulded ancle, and the firm, elastic foot, which her scanty flowing drapery, looped up to the knee, suffered to appear! Motionless as a marble she stood; but this immobility was the only attribute of the statue she possessed; the warm blood coursed beneath that pure, transparent skin; the dark eye of Italy flashed beneath that chiselled brow; deep breathing came and went softly between those half-opened lips. You were not reminded of the statue of Hebe, but of the living goddess of youth herself.—Dublin University Magazine.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

GENERAL SIR EVAN LLOYD, K.C.H.

This gallant officer, whose death takes still another name from the roll of our military commanders, entered the army in 1780, as Cornet of the 17th Dragoons; and, after passing through the intermediate grades, attained the rank of General in 1841. He had previously, in 1838, been nominated to the Colonelcy of the 7th Dragoon Guards.

Sir Evan was the eldest son of the late Evan Lloyd, Esq., of Cefn dyrrys, and inherited, at his father's decease, that beautiful estate on the Wye, which he subsequently sold to his uncle, David Thomas, Esq., and which is now known as Welfield House. The family whence he sprang was a branch of the House of Lloyd, of Aberaneli, in Brecon, and derived from Thomas Lloyd ap Meredith, a descendant of the Fourth Royal Tribe of Wales, who, becoming a zealous partisan of Henry VII., was appointed, after the Battle of Bosworth, Lieutenant of the county of Brecon.

At the time of his death which occurred last week at Fernley Hall, his seat near Ludlow, Sir Evan Lloyd was in his 86th year. He married twice; his first wife was Maria, daughter of Benjamin Barton, Esq., of Barton Hall, and relict of Michael Cox, Esq., of Castletown, but by her he had no issue: and his second (whom he married in 1814) Alicia, Dowager Lady Trimlestown, daughter of Lieutenant-General Eustace. By her he has left one son, Evan Herbert, and two daughters, Alicia Mary, wife of William Oakeley, Esq., of Oakeley, in Shropshire, and Louisa Anne, wife of Sir Willoughby Wolstan Dixie, Bart.

THE HON. COL. FULKE GREVILLE HOWARD.

The Hon. Col. Howard, of Castle Rising, in Norfolk, who died recently, was second son of Clotworthy Upton, first Lord Templetown, by Elizabeth his wife, daughter of Shuckburgh Boughton, [illegible] of Poston Court, Herefordshire.

The surname of Howard he assumed on his marriage, in 1807, with Mary, only daughter and heiress of Richard Howard, Esq., of Castle Rising, which lady became, eventually, representative and inheritrix of the extensive estates of her great grandfather, Henry, Earl of Suffolk and Berkshire. Colonel Howard was born 3rd April, 1773. He has left no child. The branch of the illustrious house of Howard, from which the Castle Rising family came, derived from Lord Thomas Howard, a distinguished naval officer of the reign of Elizabeth, who was only son of Thomas, fourth Duke of Norfolk, by Margaret, his second wife, only daughter and heiress of Thomas, Lord Audley, of Walden, K.G.

GOSSIP OF THE WEEK.

We propose this week to pursue our continuation of the history of John Bull and his brother Jonathan. We must give a little further insight into Jonathan's character and doings, which will be found to throw much light on his present attitude towards his big brother John.

How Jonathan behaved himself on the family estates over the water, and what he came to by dear eye

You will very likely be curious to know how it was that Jonathan who came of the same blood as John, had ended the same milk, gone to the same school, and, for a long time, robbed the same orchards, had become, nevertheless, such a different sort of gentleman. It would take up too much time here to tell the whole story of Jonathan's doings, since he first established himself on the Overseas Bull Estates. We need only say that, after a great many disputes, which lasted for several years, during which all sorts of threatening letters passed between the brothers, and their tenants came to loggerheads more than once or twice either, a sort of compromise had been patched up, by which John, for the sake of a quiet life, gave up to Jonathan more than one half of the overseas property, telling him to manage it in his own way, and be hanged to him.

John had been rather hard upon the lad, it can't be denied. He had strong notions of the prerogatives of an elder brother; and, now and then, forgot that Jonathan was no longer the little dirty-faced boy, who was paddling about in pinafores he had outgrown and outlived to tailed coats. Accordingly, when he visited his foreign estates, he would carry things with a high hand; and made no bones of ordering Jonathan's people, about, as if they were his own footmen—swearing and shaking his stick at Jonathan if he dared say many words about it. Jonathan, who was a lad of spirit, kicked at this; and the end of it all was, that, after the disturbances we have hinted at, John was not sorry to wash his hands of great parts of the property, which cost him more in law expenses, and watchers, and bailiffs, and gentry of that kind, than the rental of it was worth.

Jonathan managed his part of the estate in what John called a low-lifed levelling way. No tight-handed stewards for Jonathan. The first thing he did when John and he fairly split, was to kick John's deputy off the estate, and to stick up staring placards, with "Liberty and Equality" in big letters, all over many parts of Jonathan, who was a lad of spirit, kicked at this; and the end of it all was, that, after the disturbances we have hinted at, John was not sorry to wash his hands of great parts of the property, which cost him more in law expenses, and watchers, and bailiffs, and gentry of that kind, than the rental of it was worth.

Jonathan managed his part of the estate in what John called a low-lifed levelling way. No tight-handed stewards for Jonathan. The first thing he did when John and he fairly split, was to kick John's deputy off the estate, and to stick up staring placards, with "Liberty and Equality" in big letters, all over many parts of Jonathan, who called the tenants together, and says to them, "My lads, I'm for every man being his own master: still, we must have a sort of book-keeper and bailiff for the estate, or I shan't know how I stand at all. So, if you'll look about you, and decently follow among you to do the book work, say for four years, you can get rid of him at the end of the time, and then choose another; and so, in the end, you may each be master in his turn. At the same time, the fellow you choose must not be giving himself any airs, or dressing himself up in fine clothes, and sticking all manner of letters to his name on his cards, like John's feather-headed puppies of stewards. No. He shall still be plain Tom, and Dick, and Harry, with him and his fellow servants. D'ye hear, lads? "Liberty and Equality" for ever. "Huzza!" And you may believe the tenants shouted loud enough. Now Jonathan, besides the tenants who came over from John's home esta e and their families, had a number of black fellows on the estate, whom John had bought and paid for, and settled there as slaves to do the work, for food, clothing, and houses rent-free. These poor fellows, when they heard Jonathan's fine phrases about "liberty and equality," immediately began thirsting after their freedom, and hugging and kissing the white tenants. "Hollos!" says Jonathan, "what's this, you black rascals? I'll teach you to be putting yourselves on a level with your betters, you flat-nosed, woolly-headed, cucumber-skinned beasts of burden, you!" and with that he dashed amongst the poor fellows, who stopped short in their kissing and hugging, and lays about him with the heavy-thonged whip he held in his hand, calling on all the tenants to follow his example, till the poor devils danced and howled again. So that was the first sample Jonathan gave of his notions of "liberty and equality." And, by-and-by, though, if you travelled all Jonathan's estate over, you would hardly get a civil answer to a civil question, so afraid were the tenants of not being as easy as they were free), you would see one of the fellows sticking over his door, The Hon. Eli Sludge, Grocer; another, Colonel Fish, Dealer in Marine Stores; a third, Judge Turbot,—Shoes and Boots Neatly Repaired. In fact, there was hardly one of Jonathan's tenants but got a handle to his name of one kind or another, and was wounded offended if you didn't take hold of it when you addressed him.

Jonathan, though keen-eyed enough in most matters, didn't see the absurdity of all this. He would walk about, squirting his tobacco-juice all over the floor (for he had taken to chewing and drinking spirits in a style that almost broke John's heart), and looking round in a conceited way, "Ah!" he would cry, "we're all equals. I guess there are not like the tenants of that concerned noodle, John, with their titles and their liveries!" And all this while it was a major who sold him his pigtail over the counter, and a black with a gold band round his hat, who mixed his "gin sling" for him every morning.

However, Jonathan, without this "liberty and equality" until the tenants began to think that Jack must be as good as his master. When called upon for rent, they would tell Jonathan to his face "They'd see him darned before they'd pay him a penny;" and once or twice they resisted the sheriff's officers, when Jonathan tried to take the law of them. This was their notion of "liberty and equality." And a honester fellow than the rest ventured to hint that if all men were free and equal, the blacks weren't quite fairly treated, they would burn Jonathan's house about his ears, and stone him and his family off the estate. With all this rocketty work, no wonder that Jonathan began to find himself out at elbows. He wasn't liked in the neighbourhood, and couldn't get credit for a pound of tobacco, or a hogshead of gin, or a coat, if he went on his knees for it. So as tobacco, gin, and coats were things he had no notion of doing without, and as he couldn't get a rap of rent out of the tenants, he takes at last to borrowing money, on his own acceptances. For this he had to pay a tremendous discount; but when his friends pointed out that he never would find it answer to give back 80 per cent in the way of interest for every £100 he raised on these bills, Jonathan would wink and clap his finger to his nose, and would give some sly answer such as—"Guess I know my own business best:" or, "teach your grandmother to suck eggs," or some low phrase of the kind, of which he had a great profusion always ready And sure enough Jonathan knew what he was about better than his friends imagined. He paid the interest the first year all square and regular, and after that all who had money to lend, were knocking at his hall door all day long, begging him to give them his acceptance on the same terms. In this way he raised all the money he wanted, and never knows he had of it. I can assure you.——"

How he paid his debts remains to be seen.

MUSIC.

CONCERT OF ANCIENT MUSIC.

This national institution, which was established in 1[illegible] by the Earl of Sandwich, has done much in the conservation of works of art in this country. But for this Society the traditional mode of executing Handel's sublime compositions would not have been handed down, and some of the finest and most solid productions of the classical masters have been rescued from oblivion by the taste and judgment of the Royal and Noble Directors composing the Council of management. Their names for this season are the King of Hanover, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Wellington, the Earl of Cawdor, and the Earl of Westmoreland, now our Ambassador at Berlin. To the last mentioned nobleman the Society is deeply indebted; through his introduction Sir H. R. Bishop has been placed in the position of Conductor for the series. Lord Westmoreland's character would be irreparable, if fortunately we had not the advantage of having a Royal Prince in the direction, whose tact and cunning have been exhibited in a remarkable degree since his accession. Prince Albert, himself a musical composer whose productions possessed distinction would be [illegible] to have the glory of, and his Royal Highness is also a practical musician.

For the interests of art, nothing can be more fortunate than the enthusiasm felt by our most gracious Queen and her illustrious Consort for the science of "sweet sounds." Her Majesty has a keen relish for the Italian school; Prince Albert's bias is for the classical models of his native country, but his Royal Highness is no bigot. Hence it is that the programmes of the performances at the Palace Concerts will be found to contain such intellectual and agreeable variety; and hence it is that the "Prince's Night," as the Ancients—that is, when his Royal Highness is Director—has acquired such fame. Prince Albert, indeed, has infused a new life into the Management, and his brother Directors have been warmed into active exertion by such an example.

The opening scheme, under the direction of the accomplished Earl of Cawdor, at the Hanover-square Rooms, on Wednesday night, contained seven novelties [illegible] twenty pieces. The room was very well attended. We noted the presence [illegible] Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Gloucester, and the Duke of Cambridge, the Duchess of Buccleuch, the Duke of Wellington, the Earl of Cawdor, the Earl and Countess of Rosebery, and the Ladies Primrose, the Earl of Devon, Lord Emlyn and the Ladies Emlyn, the Bishop of London, the Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. G. E. Anson, Miss Burdett Coutts, Sir John and Lady Campbell, Sir W. Curtis, &c.

Although the main principle of the institution is the conservation of ancient music, works of living composers, that have been written twenty years, are admitted in the programmes. Thus, Mr. Horsley's beautiful glee to Ben Jonson's words "See the chariot at hand," was in the last part, while the lovely "Smile now again," by H. Lawes, of Salisbury, bearing the date of 1620, was also performed in the past and the present being judiciously contrasted. Lawes's glee was done for the first time at these concerts; the other novelties were Hasse's "To Delia," a tenor air, "High adieu," well sung by Allen, out of the opera of "Cato in Utica," composed by J. C. Bach, in the eleventh year of J. Sebastian Bach; the Abbé Vogler's Graduale, "De profundis;" F. Blanche's Scena from "Ines de Castro," splendidly sung by Madame Caradori Allan; Stoffani's duet, "Manganassi Cavallo," executed by Miss Dolby and F. Lablache in charming style; and Mornington's air "sospira pena," allotted to Madame Caradori and Miss Dolby. There were a so gleanings from Gluck's "Orfeo," admirably interpreted by Mr. Allen, Miss Dolby, and Signor Arthur; Mozart's "Requiem;" Handel's "Messiah," Graun's Mass in E flat, Clari, Righarli, Sacchini, &c. Martin's well-known overture to "Henri Quatre," omitting the concluding rondo, was executed by the band; and Cramer's delightful movement on the "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart, the elegant melody "La contrasta Gabriella," was taken too slow. Vogler's "Graduale" was incomprehensible; it was confused and monotonous. The "Te Deum" is a fine work; the understrument accompaniment is well worked out; the choral effects from "Orfeo" created the greatest sensation of the selection. In descriptive writing Gluck is without a rival. What a treat it would be, if a spirited manager could be found to revive some of his dramatic works.

The principal vocalists were Madame Caradori Allan, Miss Dolby, Mrs. Sunderland; Signor F. Lablache, Mr. Allen, Mr. Machin, and Mr. Hawkins. Mrs. Sunderland made a [illegible] début at these concerts. She has a soprano of great compass and beautiful quality, but is deficient in refinement and sensibility. She has acquired provincial habits which a few lessons from a good master would soon subdue. Sir H. R. Bishop was the conductor, and Mr. Lucas the pyramid, the ridiculous title of "Leader" has been very properly abolished, and Mr. T. Cooke is designated the "first violin," and Mr Blagrove being the soloist.

The new organ has taken place in the orchestra centre. The choral singers are now placed at the back; the principal vocalists sitting in the front, with the Conductor, behind whom are the leading basses at the band. The organist now faces the Conductor. This arrangement has been accomplished solely through the nomination of Costa as the Philharmonic Conductor. It was a revolution long required; but we propose to enter upon this important question of the Ancient Concerts in another article. We congratulate, however, the Directors of the Ancient Concerts on their liberal spirit in adopting Costa's views, as, without their sanction, the Hanover-square orchestra could not have been brought into its present state of efficiency. The band, generally, for the chorus singers, being placed in the rear of the instrumentalists, no longer shock the ears by their inordinate shouting.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

This noble institution commences another campaign on Monday next. This day (Saturday), is the first rehearsal, and on Thursday was given what is called the "Trial of new compositions." Having been included in the invitations sent by the directors to the leading professors and amateurs, we are enabled to supply a report of one of the most interesting musical reunions it was ever our good fortune to attend. Such an animated scene has been rarely witnessed in any country. Scarcely a musical celebrity, native or foreign, now in the capital, was absent, beginning with the heads of the profession, such as Sir H. R. Bishop, Sir George Smart, Thomas Cramer, the veteran Horsley, Mr. C. Ayrton, Mr. Novello, Mr. Sale, Mr. Benedict, Mr. Wallace, Mr. Sterndale Bennett, Mr. Goss, Mr. Turle, Mr. Macfarren, &c.

The orchestra had a splendid appearance. It was filled with the leading instrumentalists of the day, flanked by a great body of chorus singers. The trial was for Beethoven's "Mass Solemnis" No. 2, in D, Op. 123, performed for the first time in this country in the entire shape in which it left the hands of the Choral Harmonists, a body of City amateurs, they introduced a greater portion of this grand work in England in 1843. The Mass has undergone, in England, much the same kind of judgment that the Ninth Symphony had at first, and as the No. 9 Choral Symphony did, until the mists of prejudice were dispelled by its effective interpretation. Like the posthumous Quartetts of the immortal composer, the Mass has been called "incomprehensible and discordant;" and this impression was only removed by the reports published of its performance at the Bonn Festival, in August last. We had the honour to contribute our humble aid in that discussion, and our notices of the performance excepting very duly recorded in the columns of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

The thanks of every amateur ought to be awarded to the present Philharmonic Directors for their spirit in including this "Mass" in their programme, and also to Mr. Costa for the wonderful skill he has displayed in conducting it. Our readers are of course aware, for many reasons, of the nomination of this eminent musician to the post of Conductor for the entire series of Philharmonic Concerts as from Thursday, therefore, that he first presented himself in that capacity, and we scarcely dare trust ourselves in the description of his reception by the band and chorus.

We have been witness to many exhibitions of enthusiasm in various parts of the world, but for spontaneous feeling and lengthened applause, Costa's entrance into the orchestra is without a parallel. The instrumentalists and singers rose en masse, and cheered for several minutes, renewing the signs of approbation in every possible form. Costa's popularity amongst our musicians was always regarded as great, but no one could have entertained a notion that it was so universal, and so deeply rooted. This homage to genius reflects the highest credit on our artists; it is honourable to them that they cherish no mirthful jealousies, and that they are absorbed in the love of art. Costa was quite overcome by this demonstration of respect, and it was some time before he could command himself to commence the rehearsal. The mass was then gone through, the principal vocalists being Miss Sabilla Novello, the Misses Williams, Miss Steele, Mr. Lockey, Signor R. Costa (brother of the Conductor), Senor F. Lablache, and Mr. A. Novello. Except in the "[illegible]" [illegible] parts were doubled in the quartetts. Blagrove played the violin solo in the "Benedictus." This is not, of course, the time to speak of the execution, as it was executed at sight; but, in justice to our native artists, vocal and instrumental, we must state that its assembled powers failed in any part of the work, could have done so well at a first trial. As for the work itself, it is sublime; the more we hear it, the more are we profoundly convinced of the genius of the "Monarch of Modern Musicians." The rehearsal lasted about two hours and a quarter, although the difficulties of the Mass are tremendous. Here, again, we do not express the opinion, given on all sides, that no other Conductor in the world could have accomplished such a feat. He was again loudly cheered at the close of his labours. We remarked that there was a great difference in the placing of the performers from the previous evening (the Ancient Concert). All the basses, except the leading violoncello (Lindley) and double bass (Howell), were placed behind the first and second violins, and the Conductor faced his troops, instead of fronting the audience. The result was, that the subject came out magnificently from the arranged instruments.

THE BEETHOVEN QUARTETT SOCIETY.

The second season of this admirable society commenced on Monday night, in Harley-street. The programme consisted of No. 1, Op. 18, in F major; No. 9, Op. 59, in C major; and No. 16, Op. 127, in E flat major. Nos. 1 and 16 were played by Sivori (first violin), Sainton (second violin), Hill (tenor), and Rousselot (violoncello). In No. 9 Sainton had the first violin, and Sivori played the second. The enthusiasm created by the fine playing of these artists was unprecedented. It was admitted on all hands that never before had such perfection in quartett playing been attained. Amongst the professors in the room we noticed Sir G Smart, Mr. Cusins, Mr. Nicks, Mr. Moscheles, Mr. Lindley, Mr. Wallace, Mr. Macfarren, Mr. Ella (Director of the Musical Union), Mrs. Anderson, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Guynemer, Mr. C. Salaman, Mr. T. Cooke, Mr. Jules Gilmus, Mr. Kuhlau, M. Bagres, M. Goffin, &c.

Amongst the Amateurs were the Earl of Falmouth, the noble President of the Society, Sir W. Curtis, the Treasurer; Sir W. Newton, Sir G. Wilson, Mr. Henry Robertson, Mr. Absaror (the founder of the Society), Messrs. Appleby, Bonassi, Klingemann, and Street. Members of the Council; Mr. Henry Salous, Mr. Chorley, Mr. Oxenford, Mr. Beale, Mr. Grunelsen, &c.

Messrs. Cocks and Co. have published an interesting account of this valuable Society, accompanied by the two programmes of last season, with notes, musical and personal, by Mr. Hill, the secretary. We cannot too highly recommend all admirers of chamber music to purchase this little work. It is the preparation of a complete edition of Beethoven's Quartetts, edited by M. Rousselot, the eminent composer and violoncello player.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.

Mr. Beuler, the comic singer, gave his Annual Concert on Monday night at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, which was well attended. He gave some of his singular ditties with great effect.

On Tuesday evening, Mr. Sporle had his Annual Concert at Crosby Hall, and was well supported by his friends. He was assisted by Wilde, Nelson; G. Cooke, oboe; F. Chatterton, harp; and Sedgewick, concertina; and, as vocalists, the Misses Cubitt, Buckles, Mrs. A. Newton, Mr. Ransford, Mr. Edney, Mr. Crouch, Mr. F. Smith, Mr. Nicholson, and Mr. J. Percy. Miss Julia Warman made her first appearances as a pianiste, and was well received. The concert gave great satisfaction

On the same night, in the Throne Room, Mr. Roe, the lecturer on music, and Mr. Hatton, the composer and vocalist, gave a new entertainment, entitled "Songs, with Notes, Poetical and Musical." Mr. Hatton displayed his powers as a pianist, and sang some of "Chappell's popular songs;" the said Chappell being, it is asserted, no less a personage than Mr. Hatton himself. This is a good joke as regards the critics, but is scarcely polite as regards the public, who may be disposed to mistrust such programmes.

Miss Mounsey's Sixth Sacred Concert closed a series that has been remarkably well selected, and which has received due patronage at Crosby Hall.

The annual concerts, which, a while ago, at the time of Billington and Bartleman, are about to be revived by Miss Birch, Miss Hawes, Mr Hobbs, and Mr. Phillips.

Madame Albertazzi has returned to town after a brilliant career in Germany. Parish Alvars and Mr. Reeves, two harp players of note, as also M. Godefroid, are in London for the season.

The "Crusaders" fills Drury Lane Theatre every night. The "Crown Diamonds" for Anna Thillon, will be the first novelty after the run of Benedict's opera.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

The great musical event in Paris, is the announcement that M. Duponchel is in the field against M. Louis Pallet, for that the "Académie Royale" which the lease of the latter expires in 1848. Marelli, the manager of the Milan Scala, has been formally dismissed.

The DISTIN FAMILY have been performing with great success before the King of Hanover.

JENNY LIND is so popular throughout Germany, that her portrait is painted on cigar-cases, snuff-boxes, &c.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"P. M. W."—Every player has his good and bad days. Occasions when he is more or less disposed to exert himself, and inequalities such as you allude to, are not uncommon, therefore, among the best players. In the note appended to the fine collection of games played between MacDonnell and La Bourdonnais in "The Chess-Player's Chronicle," we have many remarkable evidences of this. There is an instance, we remember, in their second match, where the Editor shows that, palpably that MacDonnell had five or six obvious opportunities of winning a game off hand, yet overlooked them all, and finally lost it

"F. J."—The problem shall be examined. Your solution of No. 108 is incorrect.

"J. H. P."—The King can never be taken. Red must replace his Bishop, which White will take, and then win the game in a few moves.

""—Thanks for the correction.

"Q. D. J."—As we before remarked, your solution of No. 108 is wrong. You appear to have forgotten that Black may play his K B P two squares. The attempt to solve No. 111, with such you have favoured us, is also a failure.

"B. M. P."—There is no question at all, but that it is perfectly optional for a player to let a Pawn past, or take it in transit, provided he has other moves. The point as regards whether, having no other move on the board but to take a Pawn while passing, he is not compelled to do that, even to his own prejudice.

"J. A. B."—It is of little moment whether you solve Problems from the diagram or on the board, the latter case, you should not move the pieces.

"Spectator."—It would save us trouble, and our Correspondents from disappointment, if they would write more legibly. We have three or four letters this week, to which we can pay no reply, as it is impossible to decipher the signatures.

"Omega." Study the Elementary Lessons and Problems for Young Players, in the "Chess Player's Chronicle."

"E. P."—A private communication was forwarded ten days back.

"H." Liverpool.—The solution of Lolli's Problem shall be given next week, if you have transcribed the position of the pieces correctly.

"Castell" must have the goodness to apply to the Publisher, on the subject of his postscript.

"G. H." –"W. F."—"S."—"M."—There is no error whatever in Mr. Bolton's Problem No 111. It is one of the finest positions ever published. Play read and apply the observations we last week addressed to "Juvenis," "Tom O'Shanter," and other Correspondents.

"God-Papa." Paris.—We will look attentively at your variations.

"We beg to acknowledge, with thanks, the receipt of several admirable Problems by M. Klang, and our old contributor, Mr. Mc. G——; together with many beautiful specimens of Chess Play on the Continent.

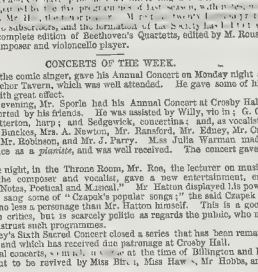
Solutions by "A Lady," Weston; "H. P.," "T. L.," "An Amateur," "J. G.," "H. A. D.," "B. B.," "J. A. B." "R. O. D. Y." and "R. C. M." Needeman, are correct. Those by "Brighton," "A Young Player," and "A. Z.," Bungay, are all wrong.

PROBLEM NO. 112.

This clever position is by M. J. BRODE, of Altona.

White plays first and mates his opponent in five moves.

BLACK.



WHITE.

PROBLEM, No. 111.—At the request of many subscribers, we shall withhold the Solution of Mr. Bolton's beautiful position until the next number.

ERRATUM.—At the termination of Game the Eighth in our last number, instead of "Black mates in three moves," read "White mates in three moves."

And Black resigns.

* This is an effective and well-played move: it forces White to exchange pieces, and enables his opponent to develop his game, by throwing forward the K B P two squares.

† Had White attempted to drive the K Kt from the vicinity of his King, by moving K R P, his adversary, instead of retreating, might have played Q Kt to R 2nd.

‡ Black would have played it, in now taking the Q R P.

§ Taking would have played to his own prejudice, as the reader will perceive.

‖ Had White attempted to drive the Bishop with Kt to Q B 4th, Black might have played B to Kt 6th, with a fine game.

¶ The object in advancing this Pawn was not simply to gain the Q R P; but, after taking the K P, would command the White Queen's file, and thus prevent the Bishop at Q B 5th. Subsequent reflection, however, convinced him that, upon his taking the K's Pawn, White might safely retake with the Queen, and he, therefore, abandoned his original design, and played as in the text, to gain the Q R Pawn.

 If he had played Q R P one, Black might have moved Q P one with great advantage.

†† He would have gained nothing, we believe, by attacking the Rook, because, in that case, Black might have played K R to Q sq first, and upon the Kt being removed, have taken the K Kt's Pawn with his Bishop.

‡‡ A very extraordinary move. §§ Threatening Mate. ‖‖ Well played.

¶¶ It was suggested afterwards by Black, that his opponent would have done better to leave this Pawn, and play on his own Q R's P. We have not space for the many remarkable variations which were shown to result from this mode of play, but we shall look to see them elaborately analysed in the "Chess Player's Chronicle" next month.

	And then Black mates in two moves.

* This variation of the "Giuoco Piano" is little known. It is briefly touched on in M. Heydebrant's "Handbuch des Schachspiels," but the first player there moves his Q to K R 5th, whereupon Black replies with Q B to K B 4th, and the Black a decided advantage in the game. On the 12th move, however, the Q Kt to Q 2nd, Horwitz played this opening, we were of opinion that his move of Q to K B 3rd was decidedly preferable to Q to K R 4th, but the counter move hit upon by his antagonist is a very pretty one, and gains the game for him. That the opening in any case is disadvantageous to the first player.

† From this point we look upon the game as virtually lost for White.

‡ Probably his last move. Had he played Q Kt P two, Black might have taken it with his Kt, and upon the B P retaking, have moved K B to Q 6th, winning the exchange.

§ An error, perhaps, as he had on the board. By playing K's R to Q's sq, he would evidently have lost a piece.

‖ Well conceived. Tempting Black to open the discovered check, which would lose him the exchange."

¶ Interposing the Kt and then pushing the K B's P on the Rook afterwards would have been unwise, on account of B to Q's 3d, (ch) &c.

 Threatening, if White took the Q's P, to win a piece.

†† He might also have played K Kt's P one (ch), and after the exchange of Pawns, when the King was driven to his B's 6th, have taken K B's P with the Kt. The move in the text, however, appears as effectual as any

‡‡ If B to K's 6th, Black rejoinded with Kt to Q's 2d, &c.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—Since Monday the arrivals of English wheat have been on the increase, and of fair average quality. To-day the show of samples was tolerably extensive. The parcels of white commanded a steady inquiry, at very full prices. In other kinds exceedingly little was doing at late rates. Foreign wheat—free as well as in bond—met a slow sale, without any alteration in the currency. Good malting barley was in fair request, and made the same terms, but grinding and distilling sorts were very dull in sale. The demand for malt was inactive, yet superfine qualities were quite as dear. The middling sorts hung on hand. The oat trade was steady, at full currencies, but beans, peas, and flour were very dull.

ARRIVALS: English: wheat, 7779, barley, 4393; oats, 5045. Irish: wheat, ——; barley, ——; oats, ——. Foreign: wheat, 3,286; barley, 120; oats, 3150. Flour, 4660 sacks; malt, 7890 quarters.

English. Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 49s to 50s; ditto, white, 50s to 52s; Norfolk and Suffolk, ditto, 51s to 52s; ditto, white, 56s to 62s; rye, 34s to 38s; grinding barley, 22s to 23s; distilling, 25s to 28s, malting ditto, 30s to 32s. Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 54s to 56s; brownditto, 52s to 54s. Peas, grey and white, 34s to 36s; maple, 36s to 38s; boilers, 38s to 40s. Yorkshire and Lincolnshire beans, 34s to 36s; ditto tick, 32s to 34s; Harrow and Pigeon, 36s to 38s; ditto, 34s to 36s; Suffolk, 32s to 34s; ditto, 30s to 32s; grey peas, 32s to 34s; maple, 34s to 36s; white, 36s to 40s; boilers, 41s to 43s, per quarter. Town-made flour, 50s to 52s; Essex and Suffolk, 48s to 49s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire, 46s to 48s, per sack. Free wheat, 44s to 48s; barley, 21s to 23s; oats, 20s to 22s; beans, 30s to 32s; ditto, 28s to 29s; peas, 28s to 30s; rye, 32s to 34s; flour, 40s to 42s; ditto, 38s to 40s; Indian corn, 30s to 32s, per quarter.

The Seed Market.—Linseed cakes very dull, and somewhat lower. In all other articles, little or nothing is doing.

LINSEED, English, sowing, 54s to 60s; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 47s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 44s to 45s; Liverpool, 50s to 52s per quarter. Linseed cakes, £5 5s to £5 10s per ton. Rapeseed, 234 to 236, per last of 10 quarters. Linseed stock, January 31st, 210 to 211 last; ditto, foreign 49 to to £5 6s per 1200; Rapeseed cakes, £5 12s to £6 0s per ton. Canary, 50s to 54s per quarter. Hempseed, 35s to 38s per quarter. Coriander, 22s to 25s; Turnip, 60s to 62s; cakes, £9 to £9 5s. Foreign, rud, 40s to 42s; cakes, 50s; white, 60s to 62s; cakes £8 per ton.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread, in the metropolis, are from 9d to 9½d; of household ditto, 7d to 8½d per 8lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 54s 10d; barley, 29s 3d; oats, 21s 10d; rye, 33s 6d; beans, 34s 1d; peas, 33s 6d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 18s 3d; barley, 8s; oats, 6s; rye, 9s 6d; beans, 7s 6d; peas, 7s 6d.

Sugar. Most kinds of sugar have been in steady, though not to any active request, at full rates of currency. Refined goods are somewhat better.

Coffee. Coy on is in very moderate offer, and very full prices are paid. Privately, low, good ordinary, has been at 47s, at 1 good to fine ordinary, 48s to 49s per cwt. In other kinds of coffee, only moderately little business is done.

Rice and Grain. Measure has [illegible] 18s, shove, do. £1 8s to £2 0s; cut [illegible] £1 12s to £1 15s; wheat steady.

Hops. Only a limited business is done on the spot, at 42s 6d to 47s 6d for good first sort, and 45s for prime. For forward delivery, a few sales have been concluded at 44s 6d to 45s. Town tallow steady, at 43s net cash.

Provisions. Since our last, the arrivals of Irish butter have been on a very moderate scale. Selected parcels are in fair request, at full prices; but other kinds are dull, at 8s 6d to 4s per cwt. Choice bacon, dull, 56s to 60s; ditto, 52s to 56s; middling and inferior 46s to 48s; Waterford and Limerick, 52s to 56s per cwt. Hams, [illegible] 60s to 64s; ditto, [illegible] 56s to 60s; [illegible] 52s to 56s per cwt.

Irish butter has had some [illegible] to-day, at full prices. Choice, 90s; Limerick, 86s to 88s; Waterford, 84s to 86s; Cork, 82s to 84s; mild ditto, 78s to 80s; fine, 76s to 78s; middling, 72s to 74s; inferior, 68s to 70s per cwt.

Foreign butter is in good request, at full prices. Choice Friesland, 82s to 84s; Limerick ordinary, 66s to 68s; and Belfast, 64s to 66s per cwt.

Bacon is in fair demand, at full prices. [illegible] 56s to 58s; middling, 52s to 54s; ditto, 48s to 50s per cwt.

Carcase Beef, Friday.—Middle's West Hartley, 4s 6d; Carr's Hartley, 4s 8d; Chester Main, 4s; New Tanfield, 4s 6d, Hilton, 4s 8d; Hetton, 4s 8d, Lumley, 4s 8d; and Stewart's, 4s per ton.

Meat (Friday).—The market has been in a very inactive state since our last report, and prices, if we except the sale of the finest parcels, are still extremely nominal. The supply of beasts has somewhat increased, but sheep's position, 4s 6s to 4s 8s. Veals, at best, 4s 4d to 4s 6d; Mid Kent ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 6d; East Kent ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; Mid Kent hogs, 4s 10d to 5s 0d; Isle of Kent ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 6d per cwt.

Smithfield, Friday.—The supply of beasts on offer here to-day being on the previous, and the attendance of dealers small, the beef trade was in a very sluggish state, and Monday's quotations were with difficulty obtainable. From the limited way presented 40, and from Norfolk 200 beasts. The shorthorns of sheep were not large, yet the sale for them was heavy, and the late advance in the currencies was barely maintained. In calves a steady business was doing, at a further improvement in prices of quite 2d per 8lb, the primest qualities producing 5s. The pork trade was firm, at previous figures. Milch cows very dull, at from £16 to £18 each.

Per 8lb, to sink the offals.—Coarse and inferior beasts, 3s 10d to 3s 2d; second quality ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 8d; prime large oxen, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; prime Scots, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; coarse and inferior sheep, 4s 0d to 4s 6d; second quality ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 10d; prime coarse-woolled ditto, 5s 0d to 5s 2d; prime South Down ditto, 5s 0d to 5s 2d; large coarse calves, 4s 0d to 4s 6d; prime small ditto, 4s 8d to 5s 0d; large hogs, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; neat small porkers, 4s 4d to 4s 8d; lambs, 6s 0d to 7s 0d.

Suckling calves, 18s to 36s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 20s each. Beasts, 638; sheep, 4,290; calves, 129; sheep and lambs, 1960; calves, 181; pigs, 220.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—We had a slow trade this morning, yet prices were supported.

Per 8lb by the carcase. Inferior beef, 3s 0d to 3s 8d; middling ditto, 3s 10d to 3s 6d; prime large ditto, 3s 8d to 3s 4d; prime small ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; large pork, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; inferior mutton, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; mid-ling ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 4d; prime ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 8d; veal, 4s 10d to 5s 10d; small pork, 4s 6d to 5s 3d

ROBT. HERBERT

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The English Market opened heavily on Monday, but has since improved. Strengthened by the daily purchases of the Government broker, on behalf of the Sinking Fund, the Consols left off on Saturday at [illegible] for money, and [illegible] for the account. Prices experienced a further rise on Monday, and left off on Wednesday, 96 for Money, was the closing price, although bargains were afterwards made at a reduction of nearly ¼ per cent. The rise has been since, however, tolerably well supported; and Consols closed at 96¼ ⅞ for Money, and 96 for Account. Exchequer Bills have been, and continue flat, indicating a Money pressure: the closing quotation is 24 to 27. Bank Stock is very firm. The position of the Bank during the late pressure for money, with its power of discounting without opposition, being, comparatively, the only source which had capital to advance, affords a measure of an increased dividend. Indeed closes at 205½ to 207½ for a New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents, 97⅛; and India Stock, 260 to 262. The Money Market continues tight, but demands lessen, from the decrease of trade in all its branches, and Importers, exports, and manufactures, are all suspended until the tedious delay offered to the Tariff question ceases, by a decision favourable to the resumption of activity and enterprise in all branches of commerce.

The principal circumstances of any interest during the past week have been in connection with Spanish and Mexican Stock. The offer of the Spanish Government to capitalise the eleven coupons (ten of which are over due), at the varying rate of 5d to 6d, about the market price of the bonds, is a proposal about as honest as "American repudiation." By ceasing to pay any dividends since 1840, the price of the stock is reduced to about 28 in the Spanish market, and from 23 to 26 here, and this act, so disgraceful in a nation as is followed by one as disgraceful, viz., the offer to capitalise at the reduced rate their own want of faith has been the means of producing. But why are the Committee of Spanish Bondholders here as silent? The new Government of Isturiz promises fairly, having already recognized all engagements of the former Government. Hopes are therefore entertained that when tranquility is resumed, regular payments will be made regularly. It is proof of the Stock has fluctuated during the week between 31 and 31¼ to ⅜ as which it closes. Spanish Five per Cents. have ranged between 25¾ and 26⅝, at which price they close. The Three per Cents have been done, and are about 20¾. Portuguese is 56; Chilina, 99; Grenada, 21¾; Venezuela, 43¾; Dutch, 99; Four per Cent. Certificates, 99¾.

Shares continue heavy, although prices have not materially receded. Railways are improved, a large sale made recently having been well taken up by the market. Croydons have not made any decided advance upon the result of the meeting. The dividend is increased to 10s. per share. The market closed inactively, preparations being made for the half monthly account. The closing prices [illegible] Birmingham and Gloucester, New (issued at 7½ dis), 3¼; Boston, Stamford, and Birmingham, 2 dis.; Bristol and Exeter, 83; Ditto, New, 10; Caledonian, 11¾; Ditto, Half Shares, 2⅛; Cambridge and Oxford, ⅛; Chester and Holyhead, 19½; Direct Manchester (Hastrick's), 3⅜; Direct Northern, 2; Dublin, Belfast, and Ordenlan, 1⅛; Eastern Counties, 2⅛; Ditto, New, 6 pm.; Ditto, Perpet., 9 per Cent, ⅞ pm.; Ditto, Ditto, ⅝ pm.; Ditto, York Extension, 1⅛; Edinburgh and Glasgow 4 Shares, 14¼; Essex and Suffolk, ⅛; Goole, Don., and Snaith, &c., ¼ pm.; Grand Union (Nottingham and Lynn), ⅛; Great Eastern and Western, ⅛; Great Southern and Western, (Ireland) — Do., Extension 17; Great North of England, New, —; Great Western, 147; Ditto, Half Shares, —; Ditto, Quarter Shares, —; Hull Ditto, 7; Hull and Selby, —; Ditto, Half Shares, —; Ipswich, Norwich and Yarmouth, —; Irish North Midland, —; Lancaster and Carlisle, —; Ditto New, 9⅛; Leicester and Bedford, ⅜ dis.; Leicester, Tamworth, &c., 1 dis.; Liverpool and Bolton Direct, 2½; Liverpool, Manchester, and Newcastle Junction, 3; London and Birmingham, 220; Ditto Thirds, 50½; Ditto Quarters, 26½; London and Blackwall, 8⅛; Ditto New, 4; London and Brighton, 62½; Ditto ditto, Fifths, —; London and Croydon, 21½; Ditto, Guaranteed five per Cents, 99; London, Hounslow, and Western, 1½; London and South Western, 76; London and York, 3½; London, Warwick, and Kidderminster, 1½; Lynn and Ely, 9; Manchester and Leeds, 95; Ditto, New, —; Ditto, Fifths, 12; Ditto, Extension, 3¼ pm.; Manchester and Birmingham, —; Do., Quarter Shares, 5½; Manchester and Southampton, 2½; Midland, 144; Do., New, 30½; Do., Birmingham and Derby, 119; Do., New (Do. £10), 2½; South Wales, 4; Sheffield and Manchester, 3¾ pm.; Sheffield and Rotherham, 4½; Do., New (Do. £10), 2½; Manchester and Southampton, 2½; Midland, 144; Do., New, 30½; Do., Birmingham and Derby, 119; Do., New (Do. £10), 2½; South Wales, 4; Sheffield and Manchester, 3¾ pm.; Sheffield and Rotherham, 4½; Do., New (Do. £10), 2½; Manchester and Sheffield, 1½; North British, 20¼; Do., Half Shares, 8½; Do., Carlisle Extension, 2½; Northern and Eastern, 6; North East and Darlington Junction, 2½; North Staffordshire, 3¾ pm.; Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, 13; Perth and Inverness, 1⅛; Portsmouth Direct, 3⅜; Shrewsb. and Birm. 9½; S. MAGNIFICENT SILVER PLATE.

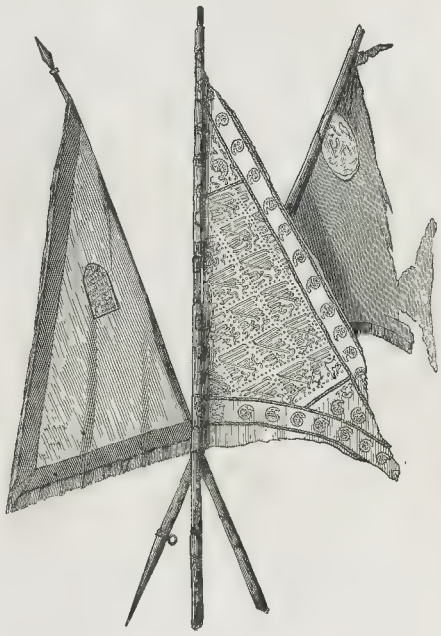
THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH WRITING "THE PENCIL LETTER" ON THE FIELD OF BLENHEIM.



FLAGS TAKEN IN THE LATE AFFGHANISTAN WAR AND JUST PLACED IN CHELSEA HOSPITAL.

THE MARLBOROUGH PLATE.

This magnificent group has lately been executed in silver, by Messrs. Garrards, of the Haymarket, for his Grace the Duke of Marlborough. The composition illustrates an incident related of the Noble Duke's illustrious ancestor, "the first Duke of Marlborough," the ablest general and most consummate statesman of his time. The hero is represented on horseback, on the battle-field of Blenheim, writing the celebrated letter in pencil to his wife, in which he related the issue of the action. He is attended by two running footmen, one of whom holds the reins of his horse, while the other displays a captured standard. This terminates the composition on one side; on the other is introduced a wounded officer reclining upon his dead horse.

In this group, the artist, Mr. Cotterill, has been especially successful in the horses, living and dead, both of which are fine specimens of equine beauty. The one on which the Duke is mounted, is of the Flemish breed, with a slight mixture of Andalusian blood: in action, it is perfect; and every articulation, tendon, nerve, and muscle is expressed with a masterly hand. The artist, too, has cleverly overcome the stiffness and formality of the costume of Queen Anne's time; and, notwithstanding its cumbrous finery, the "handsome Englishman" comes boldly out.

The composition is mounted upon a plinth of handsome design; and in its principal face are richly chased the Ducal Arms of Marlborough.

This splendid tribute of his Grace the Duke of Marlborough, has been conceived in excellent taste; and the artistes to whom its execution has been intrusted, have acquitted themselves admirably.

The group, we understand, is intended to form part of a grand centre-piece; and has just been removed to Blenheim, where it will be a superb memorial of the brilliant services which gave rise to that stately palace-pile.

TROPHIES OF THE AFFGHANISTAN WAR.

The three standards captured in Affghanistan by the 13th (Prince Albert's) Light Infantry, of which the lamented Sir Robert Sale was head Colonel, have just been conveyed from Walmer Barracks, and lodged in Chelsea Hospital, amidst the colours of all nations, some of which were taken at a comparatively early period of our history.

We have engraved these memorials of British valour. No. 1 is a Chief's Flag, taken at Jellalabad, by a sergeant of the 13th, who killed two men in the capture. He was observed by Sir Robert Sale, who, on the soldier presenting the standard, said, "My brave fellow, what can I do for you?" The man's reply was, "Sir, I have done nothing but a soldier's duty." The standards Nos. 2 and 3 were captured in the memorable fall of Ghuznee.

A correspondent of the Times speaks the feeling of a majority of the nation, in observing: "The death of the illustrious Sir Robert Sale must be considered as a national calamity. It is to be hoped that Government will sanction the propriety of a testimonial to his memory, and that, in commemoration of the services which the gallant General has rendered to his country, a monument may be erected in Westminster Abbey. His widow, Lady Sale, is descended from a very ancient family—the Wynches—all of whom have served with distinction in the East India Company's service, as civilians and military men. The late Alexander Wynch was Governor of Madras. Few out of so numerous a family now survive. Lady Sale has two brothers, one in holy orders, the other is a distinguished officer in India. Her near relations are the present Sir William Twysden, Bart., Alexander John Wynch, late of the 7th or Royal Fusiliers, and another member of the family, a minister of the Church of England."

GRAND TOURNAMENT AT NAPLES.

(From a Correspondent.)

His Majesty the King of Naples held a Grand Tournament on the 18th ult., in a large open space before the Royal Palace, at Caserta. Many thousands had collected, at an early hour, to witness the chivalrous display: nearly every visitor then in Naples was there, as well as all the Nobles and persons of rank—in fact, the ground presented a most animated and exciting appearance. The lists were formed by painted panels enclosing an oblong square, at the end of which was a pavilion, flanked on either side by platforms for the accommodation of visitors. Halfway down the lists, galleries were erected opposite each other for the judges and bands, whilst the whole was portioned out, at intervals, with the standards of contending knights.

About two o'clock, a large platform on wheels, covered with crimson cloth, and drawn by six horses, entered the lists, attended by innumerable squires, pages, &c. This car was occupied by the ladies of the Court, all gaily costumed after the mode of the period when

> Fayre Cynthea upon a stately stage
> Was set to see the fortune of that fray
> And, to be seene, as his manner was
> That could her purchase with his love's adventured gage

After passing round the lists, the car drew up before the Pavilion where the ladies dismounted and took their seats. Shortly after, twenty-four knights, all clad in rich armour, attended by their men-at-arms, squires, pages, heralds, &c., &c., entered the lists. The glittering cavalcade paraded the field and saluted the ladies and judges of the Tournament. His Majesty, attended by three other knights similarly dressed, wore steel armour, with a robe of crimson velvet emblazoned with heraldic decorations. The other twenty knights were distinguished by their mountings of yellow, purple, blue, green, and white.

His Majesty's party first threw the Gauntlet, which was immediately accepted; when the tilting commenced. The lances were made to break on the sight-less opposition; so that the Knights splintered their weapons without any effort. After various evolutions with spear and sword, the victory was declared in favour of the Crimson Knight.

A Black Knight now made his appearance, and rid up to one of the White Cavalier's standard, struck his shield. The Herald immediately proclaimed acceptance, and forth rode the contending parties. The hero of Ivanhoe displayed considerable skill and agility, and eventually received his reward—a victor's wreath.

The armour worn by the knights was nearly all from the King's armoury, some of it bearing evident signs of use—

GRAND TOURNAMENT AT CASERTA, NAPLES.

SCENE FROM THE NEW BALLET OF "CATARINA," AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Nothing could be more complete than the getting up of the knights' costumes: their appearance and bearing at once carried one back to the age of Romance and Chivalry.

The day's sports were concluded by some cleverly-performed evolutions of cavalry officers, dressed as Cossacks, Arabs, &c., which seemed to give much satisfaction to the spectators.

The knights who took part in the drilling were of the Royal Family and a few of the highest Nobles. His Majesty looked exceedingly well, and considering his corpulency, rode with amazing agility and elegance.

Another Tournament, on a grander scale, is promised, if the Russian Court should visit Naples.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

We annex one of the scenes from the new ballet—that in which Catarina, at the inn, by her graceful dancing, so fascinates the soldiers conducting her comrades, the brigands, that the battalion neglect their charge in their admiration of the syren. The main incidents of the ballet were detailed in our Journal of last week, page 162.

PRINCESS' THEATRE.

On Saturday evening Madame Vestris and Mr. Charles Mathews made their first appearance at this theatre—the lady in a new vaudeville, and the gentleman in two old but favourite interludes. The novelty was an adaptation of a French comedietta, by Messrs. Scribe and Sauvage, called "L' Image," produced about twelve months ago at the Gymnase-Dramatique, the principal characters being written for Madame Doche, and brought out at the Princess' Theatre under the title of "A Speaking Likeness." The plot is exceedingly slight—of such tenuity, indeed, that it will scarcely bear description, and requires a consummate actress to make it in any way capable of fixing the interest of an audience. A young painter who has deeply loved a lady supposed to be dead, meets with a peasant exactly resembling her, whose likeness he wishes to take. In the end, he finds that the peasant is his original love, and that he has all along been deceived and misinformed. Madame Vestris played most charmingly, and evinced rare powers of acting in her assumption of the two phases of the character. She was loudly called for at the end, and greeted with bouquets and enthusiastic cheering. We should, however, have preferred seeing her in some more important piece for her entrée. We select one of the most interesting situations in the drama.

On Monday another novelty was produced. "Mathews and Co." is a farce of a nature somewhat tangent on an Assurance Company—Mr. Mathews representing Mathews, and also Co. Mr Mathews arrives at Cuckfield, in two post-chaises, to play for a benefit, and bounds into the coffee-room, with his usual agility. Here is part of the novelty of this little drama. Everybody had seen Mr. Mathews in a farce, but no one had seen him, as his proper self, in a coffee-room. We then find that Mr. Mathews is about to marry—stop! the circumstance of Mr. Mathews playing another Mr. Mathews besides himself dreadfully confuses us. Mr. Mathews is come to act, and to marry a daughter of Mr. Gulling, who naturally mistakes one Mr. Mathews for the other; at which the other is very indignant, at being considered himself, and repudiates the calumny in a very droll manner, at which the audience laughed heartily. Mr. Gapper, the Manager (capitally played by Mr. Common), accuses Mr. Mathews of not being Mr Mathews, and not honourably sticking by his engagement to be Mathews "for one night only." But the difficulty is easily and happily ended by Mr Mathews appearing as Captain Patter, in a uniform, which strikes conviction into the hearts of Gulling and Gapper, who, of course, make every apology to Mr. Mathews for their ridiculous mistake.

It may be imagined that the plot is very simple, hanging on that slight incident, Mr. Mathews, who acted himself in several costumes with an agreeable rapidity. The piece is, we believe, an adaptation of a pleasant French absurdity, called "Ravel en Voyage," upon which the more muscular proportions of "Mathews and Co." have been hung with some tact by Mr. Mathews.

MADAME VESTRIS IN THE NEW DRAMA OF "THE SPEAKING LIKENESS," AT THE PRINCESS' THEATRE.

GERALD GAGE; OR, THE SECRET.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SUSAN HOPLEY," ETC.

CHAPTER IX.

THE VERY day that the projected dinner took place at Mr. Livingstone's, Gerald was married to Miss Graves in Paris. Never went man to the altar less willingly. He had never loved Emily so much, nor had been ever so sensible of the value of what he was resigning, and the worthlessness of what he was accepting, in exchange, as at the moment that he swore to love, honour, and cherish Rolinda Graves. He disliked her person, despised her intellect, and abhorred her character. He knew very well why she married him, so that his disgust was not even tempered by the solace of self-love; and he very honestly thought, when he handed her into the carriage, after the ceremony, that he had much better have hanged himself to a bedpost than have tied himself for ever to a woman he hated. Why did he do it, then? Because he was proud and idle, infirm of purpose, and weak in principle. He could neither endure poverty nor labour; he had involved himself in difficulties, by entering into the society of those he could not afford to live amongst; he was too proud to confess himself penniless, and too weak to disentangle himself, and kick away the trammels that compassed him about. So, he sold himself to misery, for wealth and splendour. But where were they?—nowhere but in his own imagination. But this he did not yet know; it was a truth that gradually opened upon him after his marriage. He then discovered that Mr. Graves was a man living upon expedients, like himself, only so much more fertile and practised in them than he was.

Before Mr. Graves consented to the match, he had taken care to ascertain from Mr. Pilrig that there had been no alteration in the will. As things had turned out, he regretted exceedingly the communication he had made to his uncle, which might have had consequences very adverse to his present plans; but he was relieved by Mr. Pilrig's assurance that all was safe. In reality, Mr. Pilrig knew nothing about the matter; and, having never been employed by Mr. Livingstone since, he had very considerable misgivings on the subject. But it neither suited his pride nor his interest to say so. Mr. Graves went back to Paris satisfied, and now that the marriage was accomplished, he hinted to Gerald that there could be no difficulty in extracting a little money from the fears of the indiscreet lawyer. Gerald represented how much difficulty he had had in doing so before; but Mr. Graves sat that down wholly to his want of experience in such transactions; and determined on their starting for London immediately to see what could be made of it; attributing his own want of cash to some temporary accidents. Gerald, however, soon extracted the truth from his wife, and saw that he had been duped, or had rather duped himself; but he was so thoroughly conscious of deserving it, that he hardly felt he had a right to complain; and as he had nothing to depend upon but the manœuvres and expedients of his father-in-law, he could not afford to quarrel with him.

Mr. Pilrig was annoyed at this man of large estates coming to borrow money from him. Mr. Graves pleaded temporary difficulties, and the money was lent and spent. Then came another application, and another—and refusals were met by threats. The little lawyer was at his wits' end. He was not rich, and was only now getting into a profitable line of business; whilst his purse was being drained by these exactions at one end as fast as it filled at the other. But then his professional reputation was at stake, and his fears being stronger than his understanding, he for some time weakly yielded to menaces, that, had he had more fortitude, he would have defied in the beginning. Better far is it to face the utmost evil our enemy can do us than sell ourselves to slavery by succumbing to his threats.

"I don't see, Gerald," said Mr. Graves, one day, to his son-in-law, "why you should not try what could be done with my uncle Livingstone. You say he and your father were great friends: that is a claim in itself. Then—selfish and suspicious as he is—it is not likely that he would wish the man he means to make his heir should die of starvation before he comes to the fortune. Why not make an application to him?"

"Because I am afraid of risking everything by it," answered Gerald. "You know what Pilrig told us; besides, you know he hates you, because you are his natural heir."

"Ay, that's very true; but I did not play my cards well. I did not know the man; now I do. You shall go a very different way to work. You shall write him a letter, making no allusion to the will, but describing your difficulties, and asking for the smallest assistance, to enable you to do something for yourself, on the strength of his being the only surviving friend of your father in a situation to aid you. Then, if he sees you, you must own to having been imprudent; and if he asks you about Pilrig and the will, say that you thought the man was drunk, and that you never believed a word of it. The thing is to get about him, without awakening his distrust. He is as strong in his attachments as he is virulent in his hatreds. He was in love with a girl in his youth—she died, and he never got over it; and although Nicky is the most insufferable of bores, his kindness to her has been unvarying; and, I have no doubt, she has an ample provision for her life, in case she survives him. Yes, Gerald, I think I see our way clearly through the business (Mr. Graves was very sanguine); if you play your cards well, the game's your own. Come, let us draw up the letter."

Gerald thought the plan might succeed too, and consented to make the experiment, though with much less animated hopes than Mr. Graves, who was never depressed at anything; but, having no principle and very little feeling, pushed on, boasting and lying through life, always hoping the next turn of the die would make his fortune. Gerald, on the contrary, had both principle and feeling, but they were weak and unstable, and they had succumbed in the struggle with his idleness, his selfishness, and his ill-directed pride. But, though not strong enough to govern, they were strong enough to gall him, now that he had violated their laws: and his pride helped to make him heartily ashamed and disgusted both with his conduct and his position. Added to which, there was the wife that he hated for ever at his side—and the less hateful that, since their marriage, she had grown less fond of him. He was, as we have said, hands and an anchor, and she ever-indefatigable had pushed her point to the last.

It never, he wrote the letter according to Mr. Graves's advice, and in due time there came an invitation to call at an appointed hour.

"Don't say you are married, Gerald," said Mr. Graves. "He hates me, and the effect might be very prejudicial to your interests. Sink the wife."

Gerald wished he could; and as he went along, on his way to Portland-place, he very naturally reflected upon his own folly. If this step were to be taken, why had he not taken it before he tied himself to Rolinda; whom, instead of being likely to advance his fortunes, was so far an impediment to them, that he was positively advised by her own father to conceal his connexion with her. How he cursed his madness and extravagance that had brought him into such a dilemma. In short, he felt so wretched and despairing, that he had no occasion to make up the face of a distressed man, as Mr. Graves had directed him to do, when he entered Mr. Livingstone's library: he was distressed enough in reality for all purposes.

Mr. Livingstone received him very well—indeed, kindly; first asked him much about his father, and then gradually fell to speak of his own situation. Gerald owned to great imprudence.

"It was my misfortune, Sir, not to like the Church, for which my father designed me. I ought to have overcome my objection, for it was the only hope he had of providing for me; but, trusting to get into the army or some situation more congenial to my tastes, I neglected my studies; and when my father died, I had no longer the means of remaining at College."

"And what have you been doing since?" inquired Mr. Livingstone.

"Partly living on the little money I got by the sale of my father's furniture, Sir; I had also a few College friends who invited me to their houses, and I staid hanging about upon them longer than I should, in hopes that as they were well connected, they might have done something for me."

"Bad look out," said Mr. Livingstone; "but what would you like to do now?"

"Anything," replied Gerald, "that I am fit for."

"And what are you fit for?" inquired Mr. Livingstone.

"I always wished to go into the army, Sir," answered Gerald.

"You are too old," responded Mr. Livingstone; "can you think of nothing else?"

"A situation, Sir," suggested Gerald.

"What do you say to a wife?" said Mr. Livingstone, with a sort of comic abruptness.

"A wife, Sir?" answered Gerald; "I am afraid a wife would be more likely to augment my difficulties than relieve them."

"But, what if she were an heiress?" said the old gentleman.

"Money, Sir, of course, would be very acceptable to a person in my situation," replied Gerald; "but a marriage of interest, Sir—a marriage without affection—" and, after hesitating, he stopped, from mere shame and conscious degradation.

"Oh," said Mr. Livingstone, "but why should it be a marriage without affection? Why should a woman want attractions because she is an heiress? Surely she may be as beautiful, amiable, and accomplished, as if she were the daughter of a poor curate or a half-pay officer."

Gerald blushed at the last words, for they brought Emily to his mind; but, at the same time, they suggested a ready excuse, and he hinted something about his affections being engaged.

"Oh, that alters the case, certainly," replied Mr. Livingstone; "and I am sorry to hear it, because it puts an end to my plan. The young lady I meant to propose to you is a ward of mine, and will be one of the richest heiresses in the country. She is, moreover, lovely, both in person and mind, and the man who gets her will be a very fortunate fellow, I assure you. Come, think twice before you say no. I am certain she has no attachment, and will listen to my recommendation."

"I cannot be, Sir," answered Gerald, with a sigh of deep regret.

"It is true, I may be able to procure you some sort of situation in the India House, but the candidates are numerous, and advancement slow. You will, probably, have a good deal of confinement at the desk, and small emoluments for several years; whilst the alternative is a large fortune and a lovely wife."

But Gerald was firm, of course; he muttered the words, "honour and affection, and engagement of several years," blushed and stammered, cursed his own folly and precipitance, not forgetting his wife and her parents, whom he consigned energetically to the devil; but he was fast bound—there was no getting free, kick and struggle as he would; so he was obliged to make a virtue of necessity, and take credit with Mr. Livingstone, for the most inexorable fidelity. The old gentleman shook his head, said he would see if he could do anything for him, but that he feared that he might have to wait a long while; and finally, seeing that to return at once would be a thing not to be thought of, then he would appoint him with the result of his exertions in his favour. "By-the-by," said he, as Gerald was quitting the room, "has the lady you are engaged to any name?"

"None, Sir," replied Gerald; "no whatever."

On the same afternoon, a solicitor was sent for, and directions given for the intended will, which was duly prepared and signed by the day appointed for Gerald's visit. Invitations were also sent to Mr. and Mrs. Miller and Emily, to take tea in Portland-place on that evening at eight o'clock; and the party were already assembled in the drawing-room, when Gerald knocked at the door below, and, according to Mr. Livingstone's directions, was shown into the library. Begging his company to excuse him for a short time, the old gentleman descended the stairs in better spirits, and a more agreeable frame of mind than he could remember to have found himself in for the last thirty years. The whole thing had turned up so neatly; he had had an opportunity of testing the disinterestedness of his intended heir, in a manner so entirely satisfactory; the young people pleased him, and he had found an occasion of emphatically rewarding constancy and affection—sentiments with which, from his own early disappointment, he had an exceeding sympathy; but of whose frequent existence he was extremely sceptical. He chuckled with pleasure as he entered the room.

"Well, young man," said he, "I hope you have thought better of this business; for, to say the truth, I fear it will be impossible to meet with a situation that you will not have very objectionable."

"Of what business, Sir?" asked Gerald.

"Of my proposal. The young lady is at this moment in the house, and has expressed her willingness to accept you, for it appears you are not wholly unknown to her. Indeed, I have reason to believe that she really has entertained a preference for you for some time."

Here the images of the various young beauties he had danced and flirted with at Madame de Violane's recurred to the mind of the mortified Gerald, and he wondered which of them it might be.

"Her present fortune will be two hundred, thousand pounds; hereafter, something much more considerable."

Gerald's head seemed in a whirl; the past, the present, the future, darted through his mind with the rapidity of an electrical shock—what he was, what he might have been; his madness—his stupidity—his "dead luck." His throat was parched, and his tongue clave to the roof of his mouth; so that when Mr. Livingstone pressed him for an answer, he could only gasp out, "It cannot—cannot be."

"Well," said Mr. Livingstone, "I shall only make one more effort to shake your determination, and that is, the sight of the lady herself;" and, before the unfortunate victim could expostulate, the old gentleman had left the room

Gerald felt disposed to rush out of the house; but the dread of offending Mr. Livingstone, and so losing what appeared his only chance of escape from utter destitution, prevented him. So, he sat, with his eyes fixed vacantly upon the door, till it opened, and Mr. Livingstone, pushing in Emily, cried, "There, look at her; and if you don't like her, why I must try and get you fifty pounds a year at the India House, to keep you from starving."

The door was shut, the old man gone, and the young people in each other's arms in a second. Emily forgot the neglect—Gerald forgot the wife: young loves, past scenes, were alone remembered. Emily was all happiness. Gerald was in a delirium; it was too much for his brain; he pressed her convulsively to his heart, and covered her face with kisses. Emily felt how he loved, and thought how he must have suffered; and she tried to calm him, and lead him into conversation, but in vain.

Some time—they knew not how long—had passed in these wild transports, when the door again opened, and Mr. Livingstone entered, with parchments and papers in his hand. "Come!" said he, "you have years of love and love-making before you—this evening must be mine. It's long since I have made anybody happy, and now that I hope I have done it completely, you must come up stairs to the drawing-room, and let me enjoy the sight of my work. First, however, before we go, I will put this deed in your hand, Gerald—it is your wife's marriage-settlement of two hundred thousand pounds; I have chosen to vest the property in her, rather than in you, for various reasons. One is, that I know her better, and am attached to her; another, that I am aware, from your own confessions, that she is better fitted to take care of it. But a good husband need very seldom complain of this sort of arrangement; few women are so ungenerous as to make him feel my difference; and I am sure Emily Dering will not be one of them!"

Emily turned a sweet smile of assurance on Gerald, but his lips were compressed, and his features ghastly.

"Come," continued Mr. Livingstone, "they are waiting tea for us; let us go up stairs;" and he gave Emily his arm. "Remember, Gerald," said he, tapping the young man on the back; "remember, when I die, she will be my heir."

Silently and mechanically, Gerald followed to the drawing-room, shook hands with Mr. and Mrs. Miller, took his seat, and went through the dumb show of the tea-table. Everybody was struck with his countenance and strange demeanour, except Nicky, who never observed anything. Mr. Livingstone thought that this sudden heap of joy had crushed him for the moment. "He will be all right to-morrow," whispered he to Mr. Miller; but the lawyer's sagacity, and Emily's affection, were not so easily satisfied. The former was completely puzzled—he began to doubt his attachment to Emily; but she, strong in her conviction, from what had passed below, was sure that, whatever it might be, it was not that that was affecting him so strangely; and, true woman-like, she felt that any other woe must be light and remediable. So she tried to cheer him; smiled on him, gave him sweet loving looks, and when they took their leave, and he handed her into Mr. Miller's carriage, she pressed his hand tenderly, and bade him "see her to-morrow."

Gerald went home, knocked at his father-in-law's door, and, on being admitted, asked for a night candlestick, and ascended to his room; locked himself in, loaded his pistols, put one in his mouth, and blew out his brains. The report brought up the family, but, when the door was broken open, he was dead.

His wife died a few months afterwards, in bringing a child into the world, for which Emily amply provided; and when some years had elapsed, and her grief and regret had subsided, she married Charles Miller.

THE END.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Blow winds and crack your cheeks: rage, blow!
You cataracts and hurricanoes spout
Till you have drench'd our steeples, drown'd the cocks.—SHAKSPEARE

It is, perhaps, hardly legitimate to class steeple-chasing among our National Sports. It must, however, be permitted to associate with them on the ground of its popularity as a rural pastime, however temporary the taste and unsporting the practice. Indeed, there are strong indications that the flood of its favour is passed, and that the tide of ebb is running so strongly as to threaten to "drench our steeples and drown the cocks"—those neck-or-nothing cavaliers, not one of whom would have hesitated to have shot Cardinal Bo at the very head they ridden with him in the Immortality stakes

This passage of horsemanship may be divided into two classes—the professional and the amateur. Its professors are said to be the keenest practitioners in the Olympic course, in issues of volte prorsum (no go)—prorumvare (giving the office) supercilium (nothing it safe)—and such like points of their craft: the amateurs are, for the most part, "all honourable men," who seek the bubble reputation here, by diving into a murmuring stream, with the thermometer at zero—there, by impaling themselves on the cleanest of frize of a twenty feet "bull finch." Whatever may be urged against the occupation of both, in the matter of chivalry, the latter certainly have the call, and, consequently, should have precedence as the dramatis personæ in a description of these spectacle. One of these amateur performances was enacted on Wednesday last—the action and catastrophe of which furnish the materials for these presents.

In that Temple of the metropolitan hunting districts—the Vale of Aylesbury—the Barons Rothschild, who gather their wealth "wherever winds blow or waters roll," cultivate their woodcraft. There, at a village called Mentmore as pleasure seat of the first of the barons at the spera—they have their hunting-lodge, with its et cetera of cottages for the servants, stables, kennels, and so forth. There, moreover, on the day aforesaid, a steeple-chase was performed, chiefly by gentlemen who are in the habit of hunting the hart with the Baron's hounds. The line chosen was put to the purpose—the start was taking place hard by a steeple on a hill some three miles and a half from the finish, which was not far from the steeple of Mentmore—over open country.

It lay through a series of fine roomy fields with Wing Park for their centre and over some eight-and-twenty hedges and ditches, and three brooks rather "rampers." For the first nine miles started; the lead being taken, and maintained till within a distance of the winning post, by a youth of fifteen—a singularly elegant horseman—the son of Mr. Joseph Anderson, of Piccadilly. Whether he threw his horse into more fine action, and over-marked his horse in trying to catch it, or was beaten on the merits of his country, when with victory almost in his grasp, he was vanquished by a gallant knight, who entered the lists with more odds against him than any of his antagonists

Elated by his good fortune, he vaulted from the back of his steed, before returning to scale; whereupon objection was taken, and debate followed. Three of the nine only were entered, these never returned at all, having broken his leg at a leap, and being subsequently put out of misery, and so finished. The minor stake, for which six went, and four only ran; the which quartett being at the same time engaged into the same ditch; and finally, the winner going in with none of the others in sight. Such are the day's sport—in keeping with the working of the system, which rarely, if ever, fails to produce destruction among the horses and disputes among their owners—

Behold the steeple-chase fiat
With death, or miss prize at his end

It will be seen that this contains but little favour in our eyes—will it not be said with reason, seeing we hold it both cruel and unworsemanlike. Its advocates deny that it involves more than a hunter should be capable of performing, viz.—doing four miles over a fair hunting country. But is a steeple-chase done at a fair hunting pace with hunting appliances and means to boot? The fences may be such as a horse could take without over effort, with time. If steeple-chasing must go on, let them, at least, have reference to the pressing necessity of the performer—a mis sport "it is the pace that kills."

TATTERSALLS.

MONDAY.—Nothing was said or done to affect the positions of the leading favourites for the Chester Cup or Derby; but it will be seen that, for the first of these events, Clumsy, Hope, and Miss Burns figure rather conspicuously; each was in force, but the principal out by was on the horse. Brocasso was once more in the ascendant for the Derby; and a "cool hundred" was laid out on Humdrum, who was also backed at 3 to 4 (in hundreds) agst Malcolm. Sting was not mentioned.

THURSDAY.—Several horses were backed for the Chester Cup, without any material effect on the prices. Clumsy, Miss Burns, Hope, The Magnet, and Bully Purvis, of the many quoted, were most enquired after, but, with the exception of Clumsy, who fluctuated between 20 and 25 to 1, the odds returned "ruled" the market. There was nothing new in the Derby betting. Latest prices:—

THE POLISH INSURRECTION.

POLISH VOLUNTEER.—(FROM A PAINTING IN THE POSSESSION OF THE LITERARY ASSOCIATION OF THE FRIENDS OF POLAND.)

"And Freedom shriek'd when Kosciusko fell."—CAMPBELL.

Eternal Pow'r! whose Word Divine,
Hath said "that where thy Spirit dwells
There also Freedom builds her shrine!"
And there the human bosom swells
With thoughts above the sordid earth,
With aspirations raised to THEE,
Till rapt with love of deathless worth,
Man becomes what he ought to be.
Wilt THOU at last dash down the chain
Close riveted to Poland's neck?
Wilt Thou at last destroy the reign
Of ruthless tyranny, and check
The Calmac vulture's shriek for blood,
The blood of beauty and the brave,
Who for the Christian cause oft stood,
Or, falling, found a glorious grave?
'Twere blasphemy to doubt Thou art
Where Freedom fires the human heart!

Who thunders at Vienna's gate?
Why skulks the Hun behind his walls?
Why not come forth and brave her fate
Which never valiant heart appals?
The Austrian cowers before the Turk—
The Cross before the Crescent flies;
The scimitar hews out its work,
Amidst a Nation's agonies!
On!—on!—the thundering Spahis come,
Like wolf-packs o'er the snow-clad plain;
And Europe shudders at her doom,
And quail the crests of France and Spain.
Where are the Champions of the Cross?—
Have they forgotten Ascalon?
Why rush not to retrieve the loss,
And prop pale Austria's tottering Throne?
No! none come forward in that hour
Of mortal peril, save One Pow'r.
Brave Poland's spear is gleaming high—
Her pennons flout the frowning sky;
John Sobieski comes—his swords
Scatter like chaff, the Moslem hordes.
The Austrian breathes—his throne is saved—
Dictates the peace he lately craved;
O'erwhelms with thanks the Polish chief—
And now—oh, gratitude! oh, grief!—
The Hun would trample on the land
Which saved him from the Paynim brand!

What boots it to recall the day
When Vistula recoil'd with shame—
When Poland's crown became the prey
Of Royal robbers, and the name
Highest upon Fame's blazon placed,
The name of Poland was erased
From the broad map of Europe? Strife,
Foul civil Discord gave the blow—
That demon, with all evils rife,
Laid Kosciusko's country low!
But still she rose again. Her soul
Contemn'd the despot's foul control.
The humblest peasant of her soil,
Though worn down by ungrateful toil,
Felt that his spirit was unbroke,
And sigh'd to rend the tyrant's yoke.
And the day came at last. Uprose
Polonia in her glorious might,
Scattering before her freedom's foes,
As day dispels the clouds of night.
The heart of Europe leap'd with joy
When rush'd forth hoary eld and boy;
E'en woman grasp'd the pike and sword
To save the land they all adored.
And saved it certainly had been,
But diplomates step in between
The flying Russ, victorious Pole,
Baffled the conqueror near the goal.
The tide roll'd back in vengeful flood,
And deinged the lost land in tears and blood.

Again, again, the nation rallies!
Forth from the mountains, plains, and vallies,
From crowded town and lonely shore,
The hamlet, and the forest hoar,
Comes thundering the battle-cry
Of men resolven "to do or die."
Unequal conflict! Yet the race
Not always to the swift is given;
The mighty may not always place
His heel upon the weak. Kind Heaven!
Who sees fair woman scourged to death
By Calmuc knout! who sees the brave
And noble Pole heave his last breath,
Chained, tortured, in Siberian cave,
Raise up a David, to strike down
The Geryon of Royalty:
Despots who desecrate a crown,
Which they (forsooth!) receive from thee!
Let not a noble land become
Th' Aceldama of modern times;
Let Europe's voice no more be dumb,
Nor silence sanction blackest crimes!
Troops had extinguished Poland's just desire—
"Th' extinguishers themselves" are now on fire.

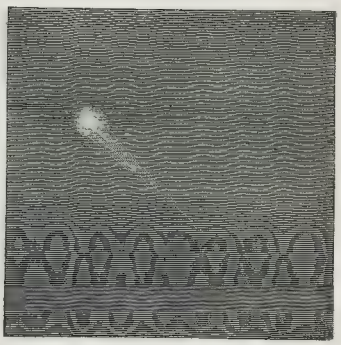
POLISH INSURGENTS.

COMET DISCOVERED AT SHREWSBURY.

Mr. H. Blunt has communicated to the Shrewsbury Chronicle of Friday the 6th inst., the details of a Comet that seems, as far as his experience extends, to have escaped the attention of astronomers.



COMET SEEN AT SHREWSBURY.

It appears that on Wednesday the 25th ult., the attention of the writer was drawn to the unusual brightness of the Zodiacal light, and turning a small telescope to that part of the sky, Mr. Blunt observed a nebulous spot, which he never remembered having seen before. He was too ill to pay much attention to it, but the faint hope that it might prove a Comet, induced Mr. Blunt to mark down its place, with reference to the neighbouring stars. Next morning, Mr. Blunt ascertained that a friend had also observed what appeared to be a nebulous star in the same quarter of the sky; but, being at the time intently occupied in examining the extraordinary comet of Biela, which lies to the left of it, this observer passed over it without further notice.

On the following evening, the sky being perfectly clear, the glasses of both observers were turned to the same quarter of the heavens. The nebulous spot was soon found; and, on comparing its position with the diagram made on the previous evening, it had evidently changed its place. A powerful instrument was turned upon it, and every doubt removed. It appears to be one of the finest telescopic comets that have been seen for some years—much brighter than the double comet of Biela, with a tail almost three quarters of a degree in length, turned from the sun. It was subsequently observed on the evenings of Saturday and Monday, and its motion and direction determined.

There are now no fewer than four Comets visible in the Heavens, a circumstance, surely, that ought not to pass unrecorded.

Our Illustration shows a Telescopic View of the Comet as it appeared on Thursday evening, Feb. 26th, through a 9 feet Newtonian Reflector, with a magnifying power of 100.

Its position was, on March 4th, in a line drawn through the stars α and β Arietis, continued through η Arietis, to a point as far from the latter star as β was distant on the other side. Therefore, its Right Ascension was about 1h, and its North Polar distance was about 83°.

On the 24th of last January, Father De Vico discovered, at Rome, a new comet in Eridanus; and, on the 20th of February, he discovered another new comet, being the fourth which has been detected by him: the position of the latter, on the 20th of February, at 7h. 19m. in the evening, was in Right Ascension 0h. 35m. 56s.; and in North Polar distance it was 97° 29'. It had a slow motion in A. R. towards the W., and a rapid motion in N. P. D. towards the North Pole. It seems highly probable that this comet is identical with that seen by Mr. Blunt at Shrewsbury.

On Feb. 26 a new comet (not identical with the above) was discovered by Mr. T. Brorsen, at Kiel, and the following places of it have been observed:

Feb. 26th, at 8h. 0m. 0s P.M., its A.R. was		0h. 52m. 0s.	and its N. P. D.	75° 3′
" 26th, at 7h. 46m. 0s. P.M.	"	0h. 53m. 32s	"	73° 54′
March 1st, at 8h. 6m 0s. P.M.	"	0h. 53m 35s.	"	72° 54′
" 2nd, at 7h. 30m. 0s. P.M.	"	0h. 53m. 26s.	"	69° 2′
" 4th, at 8h. 8m. 0s. P.M.	"	0h. 52m. 42s.	"	66° 8′

So that, at the present time, there are visible the following comets:—The Double Comet of Biela, De Vico's third and fourth Comets, and Brorsen's Comet—certainly a remarkable circumstance.

THE HOUSE OF CZARTORYSKI.

The intelligence from Poland is brief and uncertain in its purport, and may be interpreted according to the hopes or fears of the reader; one section may suppose the movement has but begun, the other that it has ended—at least for the present. But while the result is wavering in that balance, from which, according to the event, it will come forth as a revolution accomplished or a rebellion suppressed, it may not be uninteresting to throw a glance upon that portion of its history immediately preceding the present age and century, and the part the House of Czartoryski, which is still regarded as the head of the Polish nation, has played in it.

The Princes of this line were in the last century the advocates of reforms and changes, which they proposed because they perceived the defects and abuses of the system that prevailed; and like all reformers who have by birth belonged to the predominating class, they were accused of being traitors to their "order," and have been subjected to much misrepresentation. In a wealthy, commercial, and constitutional country like England, when the Aristocracy deserts such men, they find support from the middle classes; but Poland had not then, has not now, any such mass of property and intelligence for a statesman to fall back upon; the Aristocracy were all in all, the bulk of the people nothing. So the Czartoryskis failed, and Poland fell; but the lesson of the past may perhaps prove instructive to the future.

This princely family is a branch of the Grand Ducal House of Lithuania, which gave to Poland the dynasty of the Jagellons. In the sixteenth century, under Sigismund Augustus, the Czartoryskis bore a large part in the final union of Lithuania and Poland. From that period, their influence, wealth, and power increased; and, in the middle of the last century, they were strong enough to undertake the task of suppressing that anarchy, which not even Sobieski or Casimer had succeeded in reducing. But it was too late: for sixty years the germ of death had lain in the heart of the nation; its political activity was that of delirium, and proved but the herald of the death that awaited its national independence.

The causes of this fall from a higher state, are tolerably evident. While powerful nations and kingdoms had risen around the Polish territory, who all, more or less, grounded their national existence upon national union—while Austria and Prussia rested their Governments in some degree on the foundation of a middle class, and Russia suddenly arose, a power rude but strong, as if hewed out of mere barbarism by the carpenter's axe of Peter the Great, while all around was moving forward, though in different directions—Poland and the Polish aristocracy lived on as they had always lived, thinking neither of national nor political union, engaged in personal feuds, Noble warring with Noble, in the fashion of the middle ages, which the rest of the world had long outgrown, claiming every licence for themselves, and keeping the bulk of the people in a state of serfdom, discussing questions, not with principles, but with sabres, and regarding all the elements of the strength of nations in the latter ages, Industry, Commerce, and Trade, with the true Seignorial contempt of Lords, both of soil and men.

And yet, with all their errors and oppressions, endowed with many qualities that cannot but excite admiration, they cannot be placed on the same level as the Nobles of Russia, whom the Czar Peter compelled to assume the outside of civilisation, without eradicating their real innate barbarity. The Tartar Chief was lacquered over with a sort of "French polish," and, with the imitative facility of his race, could without much difficulty pass for a talon rouge of the Court of the Grand Monarque. But the Polish Nobility had a native, genuine, and, in many things, estimable character; they were intelligent, educated men, with a great history and fine literature, activity of mind, gallantry,—and they carried the love of individual liberty to its highest point. Some hundred thousand spurred and belted Nobles formed the nation, while the people remained as serfs bound to the soil, without rights or privileges; but even this, though a great evil and calamity, was not the immediate or the only cause of the downfall of the nation.

Among those Seigneurs themselves there was no union, no power of acting together as a whole, on a national question. All such matters degenerated into personal disputes: the Monarchy, being elective, perpetually added to the confusion of public affairs; and, as each Noble had the right of giving what was called a liberum veto in the election of the Sovereign, one of which prevented the choice, the difficulty of establishing any firm political power may be easily conceived. It was a Government held by an Aristocracy, which never settled into the strength and consistency that has sometimes been found in an Oligarchy; it was rather an Anarchy

ST. PATRICK'S DAY.—DRAWN BY TOPHAM

There's a spell in the name,
And a mirth in the day,
Makes the March winds as welcome
As flowers in May.

Sure the month of all months
Best suits Pat, by the powers,
Is March with its blaster,
Its sunshine and showers.

For as warm as March sunshine
The warm heart of Erin,
And her passions as wild
As the March wind's carearin'.

His caubeen gay with Shamrock,
His heart with a dram,
Pat "comes in like a lion,
Goes out like a lamb."

Nor to mirth and good fellowship
Sacred alone,
There are prayers breathing lowly
Round fount and by stone—

Where tradition has hallowed
The trace of the dead,
And the hard rock is worn
With devotional tread.

These prayers to St. Patrick
Low syllabled are,
For shelter from peril
Of dear ones afar.

And now, when the terror,
Ay, near and more near,
Of fever and famine
Is lowering drear—

On this eve of St. Patrick
Bend, Erin, the knee,
That the hand of thy patron
Be stretched over thee!

And for those of thy children,
On alien earth,
Let a sober thought chasten
Their madness of mirth.

When the cup circles round,
'Mid the laugh and the song,
Let them think of poor Erin,
Her woe and her wrong.

Nor a patriot only
For this night appear;
But keep his "St. Patrick"
Each day of the year.

of Nobles, a Government of a hundred thousand Sovereigns always at variance among themselves about the choice of a head, which was decided, at last, by the influence of Foreign Powers, always, be it observed, "guaranteeing" the "independence of Poland." This exterior influence was the root of all manner of evils—

the direful spring
Of woes unnumbered.

The factions of Poland thenceforth became the tools of the surrounding Powers: it was at this juncture that the two Czartoryskis, the brothers Michael and Augustus—the first Grand Chancellor of Lithuania, the second a Russian Palatine—appeared as Political Reformers. They resolved to abolish the liberum veto—to make the Crown hereditary, and establish it in a national dynasty—to extend the Royal power, and diminish that of the Nobility—to give strength and independence to the administration of the laws—to diffuse education, and promote trade and industry among the people. Wiser ends no statesmen could attempt to attain, if they can only be accomplished by means supplied from within the nation itself. The Czartoryskis knew that from the old Aristocracy of Poland they would encounter the most determined opposition; foreign interference and foreign aid was the only alternative: Russia was a near neighbour—was ready to be a useful one; and in an evil hour, though with the best intentions, the wolf was called into the fold, and trusted with a part of the power of the shepherd. By their influence, their nephew, Stanislaus Poniatowski, a paramour of the Empress Catherine, was called to the throne: Russia supported him, thinking he would be a puppet in its hands; his uncles thought his utter incapacity might be turned to good account. The Polish Nobles rebelled against the handsome favourite of Catherine, and the Czartoryskis called in the fatal aid of a Russian army. For the first time, the Poles saw with hatred and evil forebodings their soil bristling with Russian bayonets; but the Czartoryskis were strong in their good purposes—their nephew was made King, and with his reign began those reforms which Poland received with reluctance, but whose wisdom was fully recognised twenty years later—when it was too late to profit by them.

Russia did not wish for such changes, and began to perceive that her puppet was being moved after a fashion she did not anticipate. She wished to use Poniatowski as a skeleton key, by which she might rob Poland of its independence; and the Czartoryskis attempted to turn him into a bolt that should repel foreign influence and domestic anarchy. Russia tried to excite the Polish Nobility to extreme measures against the Czartoryskis; but they were personally loved and respected, and the intrigue failed; and the Poles, taught something by experience, would, at last, have abolished the calamitous liberum veto, when Russia and Prussia joined their efforts, and the world gazed with astonishment on the consummation of that greatest of political crimes and national robberies—the first partition of Poland, in 1772.

After this, the Polish factions saw the necessity of uniting against foreign dominion; they gathered closer round the throne; the Reforms of the Czartoryskis began to count more adherents; till, at last, after a space of nineteen years, they were accomplished. On the 3rd of May, 1791, amid universal rejoicing, the new Constitution of Poland was proclaimed, grounded upon the establishment of an hereditary crown, the abolition of the veto, and the gradual emancipation of the serfs. But it was too late; Russia opposed the change; the second partition took place; war broke out, and ended, as every one knows, with the taking of Warsaw, Kosciusko, covered with wounds, falling into the hands of the Russians, with the prophetic exclamation, "Finis Poloniæ!" At this point begins the later and most gloomy chapter of Polish history, in the events of which Prince Adam Czartoryski, son of Augustus, one of the celebrated brothers, has borne a conspicuous part; but all efforts have failed; Czartoryski partakes the destiny of his people; and, stripped of the almost boundless wealth of his family by confiscation, wears the shadow of a crown as King of a Nation of Exiles!

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

The visit of Her Majesty Queen Victoria to Paris is the topic of conversation of every réunion in Paris, the contradiction and mystery which attends it having piqued the curiosity of our bon-mondo. One of Her Majesty's Ministers in London told the Comte de ——, whom I saw last night, that they had received no sort of notice on the subject; Lord Cowley, in Paris, and the Comte de Ste Aulaire, in London, the representatives of the respective Courts, deny the existence of any such intention on the part of Her Majesty for the present year. Still, in spite of this diplomatic reserve, is the Queen Victoria's visit spoken of by the highest personages in Paris, and by the courtiers and the diplomatic body as being fixed and resolved upon. To maintain this belief, they refer to the daily doings of Louis-Philippe. His Majesty's sole recreation and real delight is driving from Paris to the Palace of the Grand Trianon, which has been, for three months back, in most active preparation for the Queen.

M. Fruise, of the Boulevard Bonne Nouvelle, and two other first-rate upholsterers and all their principal workmen engaged night and day in emulation to render the Grand Trianon once more a still more fairy abode than in the days of the Grand Monarque. The King's habitual economy has totally disappeared as regards the works in hand. A friend who overheard what passed, tells me that it was but four days since that visiting a small room of this bendoir-palace, where, in silk tissue alone, 22,000 francs have been expended, he expressed great dissatisfaction at its want of magnificence; and in the adjoining room an illustrious lady having expressed astonishment at his prodigality manifested in the furniture, he observed that they were mere trifles brought from the Garde Meuble of the Crown, when, in fact, they have been made within two months, and admired whilst in the process of being manufactured by all the gobemouches in Paris.

Under the direction of the King all the choicest works of art, adapted to the locality, are being brought to Trianon; Watteaus, Grenses, Bouchers, the chefs-d'œuvre of Benvenuto Celini, the marvels of Sevres, and of the petit Dieppartyne, &c., are hourly arriving, with regular processions of covered vans. The King told one of his aides-de-camp he hoped to manage to bring her Majesty into the capital through the Barriere de l'Etoile and the Champs Elysées; there would her Majesty meet the advanced guard of an army consisting of 40,000 National Guards, and 30,000 of the garrison of Paris; there would be assembled the twelve Mayors of Paris, with the Préfet at their head, and all the great functionaries of France in Paris at the time. A fête, with an illumination of the whole Versailles Palace, within and without—a stag-hunt, by torchlight in the beautiful Forest of Fontainebleau!—such are the subjects of the King's present dreams. Will they be realised? They cause no astonishment to those who know the triple connection which Louis Philippe has established, through the House of Coburg, with the young Sovereign of England: this has been one of the greatest triumphs of his policy—not only in a personal and dynastic point of view. It has restored him to a place within the pale of the great family of European Sovereigns, who had excluded him; and it has ensured him the most efficient support in the policy of his Government, and the closest alliance.

FRANCE.

The principal domestic matters referred to in the Paris journals are the motion of M. de Remusat in the Chamber of Deputies for limiting the number of placemen in that house, and the appointment of the committee to report on the proposition of M. de St. Priest for the conversion of the Five per Cents.

In the Chamber of Deputies, a day or two ago, M. de la Rochejaquelin put some questions as to the policy that would be pursued by the French Government in regard to the Polish insurrection.—M. Guizot said that, as far as his information went, he had reason to believe that the atrocities of which the Russian and Austrian Governments were accused were without foundation. The conduct of the peasantry could be accounted for upon other grounds. Since Poland had been subjected to the dominion of the three Powers, much had been done to improve the condition of the peasantry, and the consequence was that the peasantry had not only refused to join in the insurrection, but were most active supporters of the present authorities. Their improved condition was the real secret of the conduct of the peasantry, and not the employment by the Governments of the odious means alleged. With regard to the conduct to be pursued by the French Government under the circumstances, M. Guizot stated that the policy of non-intervention had been closely adhered to in 1839, and he saw no good reason why it should be changed now. This policy imposed two duties towards the unfortunate Poles not to hold out to them any illusory or false hopes, and to render them any relief compatible with the interests of France and the law of nations. What would be the feelings of the Chamber, were it to learn that Abd-el-Kader was receiving assistance from a foreign Power? Was there any one in that assembly who would feel that the proclamation of peace were thwarted by such a proceeding? He begged the Chamber not to lose sight of those facts, and of the position in which they placed the Government. He was anxious that those who claimed and obtained the hospitality of France should find so good a rule for their conduct. France wished to be a place of refuge for misfortune, but not a resort for conspirators. (Approbation from the centres.)—M. de Mornay expressed his approbation of what had fallen from the Hon. Minister. He was happy that the French nation and the Government were unanimous in their opinion as to the attempts which had been thus brought before the Chamber. The Marquis de Castellane admitted that Prussia had endeavoured to ameliorate the condition of the peasantry, but denied that Austria had done so. The policy of Austria had always been to create a division and jealousy between the governors and the peasantry. He declared that the measures of the nobility [illegible] to the peasantry at the [illegible] were [illegible] to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] deep anxiety which pervaded the public mind in this country on the subject, fully warranted the inquiry. Although avoided in the British Parliament, that question had been discussed in Congress, and this praiseworthy abstinence appeared to have been interpreted as a proof that we were so determined on the continuance of peace as to be altogether indifferent to every preparation for war. His Lordship said that he considered it imperative that so delusive a notion should be removed, and that we should guard ourselves from the suspicion that appeared to be entertained in the United States that we were determined to maintain peace by concession incompatible with the national honour. The two countries, in spite of the pacific disposition of the British Government, were insensibly drifting towards war: the time had, therefore, arrived at which some official information ought to be communicated to the House. After paying a high compliment to the prudence and efficiency of Mr. Pakenham, his Lordship remarked that he did not question the propriety of his refusal to forward home the proposition that had been submitted to him by the American Minister; although he considered that Lord Aberdeen had acted most judiciously in desiring that the negotiations should be renewed, and that not only the question of title, but that of territorial possession, should be submitted to the arbitration of the Sovereign of any country that may be mutually agreed upon, or even of any individual competent to form a decision on the subject.

The Earl of ABERDEEN said My Lords, In the very delicate and difficult position in which I am placed, it might, perhaps, appear natural that I should have viewed with some degree of hesitation the notice which my noble friend has given yesterday. But, my Lords, however much this might, under ordinary circumstances, have been the case, I felt ready, in the case of my noble friend, that his sense of public duty, and his intimate knowledge of the great interests at stake, would prevent him from adding anything to the difficulties with which the question already surrounded; and, at the same time, that his own feeling would indispose him to make his motion the subject of any embarrassment. My expectation has been fully realized by the speech which my noble friend has made. (Hear, hear.) My Lords, I think that the desire expressed by my noble friend is quite natural and reasonable. I think, when we are receiving, from time to time, from the United States, information and documents of the highest interest and importance, affecting us in the manner in which those transactions affect us, quite natural that your Lordships and the public should desire to receive from the Government of this country authentic information as to those transactions, accompanied by such other information as it may be safe and proper to give. I, therefore, think I have no valid reason for objecting to the production of those papers for which my noble friend has moved; especially as a great portion of them must be already well known to your Lordships and the public. But I must reserve to myself the discretion of, for the present, suppressing a large portion of the correspondence which has taken place between her Majesty's Minister at the United States and myself, the production of which, at this time, would be injurious to the public interests. (Hear.) My Lords, I will say further, that I should not be disposed voluntarily to lay on the table any such information in the first place, it is quite unusual, in the midst of a negotiation of this magnitude, without any special object in view, to produce to Parliament, accounts of the particular position we may, for the time being, find ourselves in. (Hear.) It is true that the Government of the United States has acted differently, but their situation is different from ours. The executive Government of the United States has had to call on the Legislature to take a direct course on this subject. The President of the United States proposed to the American Legislature a certain measure, to which he required their assent; and, of course, he was under the necessity of furnishing them with the materials on which to form an opinion in coming to a decision on a question of such importance. But this is not the case. Her Majesty's Government have no intention of calling on Parliament at this moment for any opinion, nor do I understand that it is the intention of my noble friend, or of any other member of this House, to call on Parliament at present to pronounce an opinion. These circumstances, therefore, would have indisposed me from voluntarily laying on the table information at this moment. Another reason why I am disposed to think that we should go down with any such information to the House. I must admit that from the aspect of the negotiation, as reported in the papers which have been produced in the United States, and as I am in a condition to produce to your Lordships, an inference might fairly be drawn not favourable to the result of the negotiation in which we are engaged they would be calculated to induce us to augur unfavourably of the result. For this reason, therefore, I should have wished not voluntarily to submit to the House, in such a stage of the negotiation as that to which we have now arrived, communications which are calculated to produce such an opinion. (Hear.) But, at the same time, it is my intended opinion that such an opinion is unwarranted. I cannot bring myself to believe, my Lords, however the effect produced by the papers I have referred to might be as I have said, I cannot, I repeat, bring myself to believe that we are in a condition to arrive at any thing like a calamity that can befall a nation, and the greatest crime generally that a nation can commit (hear, hear), he may rely that every effort consistent with the national honour will be employed to avert it. (Hear, hear.) My Lords, I will not lay claim to your indulgence beyond what I am fairly entitled to; but, if I might, without presumption, add the expression of an opinion, it would be, that you would submit to the conduct of Her Majesty's Government with a confidence in their determination, and just, without any sacrifice of honour, or of the real interests of the country. (Hear, hear.) But, my Lords, on the other hand, it is certainly possible (though I would not believe it) that war is the result. Such

PRINCE CZARTORYSKI.

Prince Adam Czartoryski is the eldest son of Adam Casimer, Prince of Czartoryski, and Starost of Podolia; he was born on the 14th January, 1770.

Having spent a portion of his early youth in England, studying the spirit and effects of constitutional government in the school of Pitt, Fox, and Burke, he returned to Poland, in 1791, to take arms against Russia; and, after receiving several marks of distinction for his gallantry, continued to fight under the banner of his country till the suppression of its independence. Such of his vast estates as were within the Polish territory appropriated by Russia were in consequence confiscated; and it was only through the intercession of the Court of Vienna with the Empress Catherine, that these possessions were restored; but on condition that Prince Adam and his brother should reside, as hostages, in St. Petersburg. Once there, she peremptorily insisted on their entering the service; and the former was attached as aide-de-camp to her grandson Alexander, whose favour and confidence he then acquired, and continued long afterwards to enjoy.

He has, throughout his life, been steadily guided by the love of his country, always sacrificing to it every other consideration. He has endeavoured to serve its interests in different ways, as circumstances would best allow. When there was no chance of obtaining for it all he wished, or all to which it was entitled, he did not give up its cause in discouragement, but strove unweariedly for all that was possible. In early life he was captivated with the liberality—which he had helped to inspire—of the Emperor Alexander, then, perhaps, sincerely expressed, and sought to secure every attainable advantage for Poland, when its independence was out of the question. At the Congress of Vienna he laboured successfully to establish for his country at least a semblance of independence, and such an approach to it as promised to leave an after-chance of something better.

In his capacity of President of Public Instruction, he laboured so assiduously and successfully to instil true patriotic feelings into the minds of the Polish youth, that Novosiltzof charged him, in a despatch to the Emperor, with "having retarded for a century the amalgamation of Poland with Russia."

To the impetus and direction which he then imparted to public instruction is probably owing much of the intellectual and patriotic tendency which now jointly distinguishes the emigration. Most of its celebrities studied like Mitzkiewitch, or taught like Lelewel, in universities and schools founded by his influence, and under his immediate direction.

The partisans of Prince Adam dwell with pride on the display of civil courage made by him in 1826, when, after the revolt on the accession of Nicholas to the throne, the Senate of Poland was convoked to constitute a supreme Court of Appeal for the purpose of trying the Poles implicated in the conspiracy. Czartoryski was at the time travelling in Italy, where he had retired when Alexander began his reign of terror in Poland, but he instantly returned to take his place in the Senate. This body, it is well known, with a single exception to its unanimity, acquitted the accused, and made a bold report to the Emperor, in which it recalled the stipulations of the treaty of Vienna, the official declarations of the Emperor Alexander, and his speeches to the Diet, whereby he had declared the kingdom an independent state, and that the Polish provinces were intended to treble the extent and importance of the nascent kingdom. It recalled to the Emperor the terms of the Constitution, and of the oath to maintain it, which he was violating together. This report, made in the name of the dying President Belinski, was written by Prince Adam.

"When the revolution of 1830 broke out, he entertained the conviction that the moment chosen was unpropitious, yet, sooner than neglect any opportunity which might possibly lead to the emancipation of his country, he joined the patriots heart and soul, utterly regardless of the princely fortune and the high position he was sacrificing."

When called to the Presidence of the Executive Pentarchy, he was frequently in the field during the sanguinary campaign, or, as it might perhaps more properly be termed, campaigns, against Diebitch and Paskevitch; he was present at the battles of Wawre, of Demblé, and Iganie; and, after he had abdicated his office, took part in the last success of the Polish arms at Miedzirzecz.

When Warsaw was attacked, he marched up with the army of Ramorino, vainly attempting its relief. When this corps was forced by treble forces to seek refuge on the Austrian frontier, Prince Adam crossed the Vistula, with a few officers, and succeeded in joining General Rozytski in the palatinate of Sandomir. He had thus successively, when their cause was desperate, joined the last wrecks of the national army; and, at length, driven with Rozytski on to the territory of the Republic (!) of Cracow, he only quitted that city, when the Russian troops were entering it.

He thus commenced his public career at twenty, fighting against the enemies of his country, and the age of sixty overtook him in the ranks of those who were striking the last desperate blows for its freedom against the same oppressor.

Since the expulsion of those who constitute the present emigration, it ought not to be forgotten that Prince Czartoryski has either been chosen, or tacitly allowed by its members of all parties, to act in its name for their common interest, and he may be said assiduously, skilfully, and successfully to have assumed the direction of all relations entered into for the general weal of this body, and of the country represented by them, with foreign Governments and parties.

The emigrants of all shades of opinions seem to have left this duty to him, in the full conviction that he would do all that could be done in this respect; and it would appear that their flattering confidence in his patriotism and activity has not been misplaced. Through his exertions the Representative Assemblies of France and England have been urged to protest against the Russian occupation of Poland, and Ministers to commit themselves upon this subject. His efforts have contributed powerfully to the dissemination of the anti-Russian feeling which is now rising amongst the Sclavonians beyond the Russian boundary, and particularly amongst those of the Turkish Empire. Czartoryski, in his younger days, when Minister of Foreign Affairs to Alexander, and full of faith in the sincerity of the youthful Potentate's liberalism of feeling, had entertained the thought—by no means novel in Russian policy—of gathering all the Sclavonic nations beneath the sceptre of the Tzar, who then promised to devote his power to the glorious task of civilising and enfranchising so large a portion of mankind. With this view he had formerly opened channels of communication with these Sclavonic branches, and acquired a knowledge of their feelings and condition, which proved highly useful to him when he sought to expose to them the nature and objects of the Russian Cabinet.

It would be difficult for the nation, if it chose a constitutional chief, to do otherwise, from his unexceptional position, than select Prince Adam for that office. For whom else could they choose, at least out of his family, even if his virtues, services, experience, and abilities had been far less than they have been officially pronounced to be by the enemies of his country, who, in the contumacious trial by special commission, which confiscated all his property, and condemned him to an ignominious death, declared in the counts of his indictment:—

PRINCE CZARTORYSKI.

"That the exalted station of the Prince, the illustrious name he bore, his vast fortune, his widely-extended influence, and the great abilities commonly attributed to him, had been the cause why, at the moment of insurrection, a great many persons had watched the conduct of the Prince, and found example in it."

In the same manner that Prince Czartoryski has since successfully directed the foreign relations of the Polish emigration, did he unsuccessfully manage the diplomatic intercourse of the country during its short-lived independence; but his friends and partisans strenuously and emphatically deny that he ever trusted to diplomacy alone, instead of arms; and that, on the contrary, whilst neglecting no imaginable means which might conduce to success, he placed his faith chiefly in the result of battles.

It is, besides, only fair to state that the diplomatic negotiations into which Prince Adam entered—as mere auxiliary means, according to his declaration—though unsuccessful, were far from being ill-judged in their direction; and, with a little better fortune, or if pushed a little further, might have led to very different results. "Durez, durez jusqu' au printemps," said the French Minister, holding out a prospect of intervention; whilst the correspondent above quoted says—"In 1836, when I was at Howick with Prince Czartoryski, Lord Grey declared to him that had he been as well informed on Polish matters at the time of the revolution as he was then (in 1836), the Government of Great Britain would not have remained aloof.

The Prince is, it is true, seventy-five years old; but his is a cruda viridisque senectus. He is in the enjoyment of excellent health, rides often on horseback, and in mind is as active and vigorous as ever. He belongs too to a family remarkable for longevity. His father was past ninety when he died; his mother, the famous Princess Czartoryski, died only ten years ago, aged ninety-six."

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

DRUIDIC STONES IN MONMOUTHSHIRE.

Monmouth, like other border counties of England, is rich in architectural relics and monumental memorials of ages long past, which may, in a manner, be regarded as the land-marks of history:

> I doe love these ancient ruines,
> We never tread upon them, but we set our foot
> Upon some reverend historie.

The specimens figured in our Illustration, are referred to the period when the Druids held sovereign sway over the people of Britain, and made even Kings their servants.

DRUIDIC STONES.

These three stones are situated near the town of Treleck; the perpendicular height of the smallest is 9 feet 2 inches; of the middle one, 10 feet 1 inch; and of the tallest, 11 feet 10 inches. They all incline; the largest being 15 feet long, above the ground, and 14 feet in circumference at the base. The stone is externally grey, from exposure to the atmosphere; but, when broken, the internal colour is seen to be red.

The people of the district call these monoliths "Harold's Stones," and suppose they were set up to commemorate his victory over the Britons; but antiquaries attribute them to the Druids, and regard them as corresponding with the first object of idolatry throughout all the world—a plain, unwrought stone.

We are indebted to a Correspondent, E. E. D., for the sketch of these relics, as well as for the substance of the preceding details.

THE INDIAN WAR.

We have been favoured by a correspondent with the annexed pen-and-ink sketch of the recent Battle at Ferozshuhur, sent from camp by an officer to his friend at Umballah. The dotted line in the plan denotes the route taken by the 3rd Dragoons, when (charging) they came up in time to co-operate with the Infantry, and assist them in taking the guns, all of which were captured at the point of the bayonet and sabre. It is obvious, from the position of the guns, how deadly must have been their fire upon our men, as they advanced to the attack.

Our readers will find, in the following letter, some additional particulars of interest connected with the operations of the British troops against the Sikhs. The letter, which is written in a very characteristic style, is from Ensign Alexander the son of Colonel Alexander, who was wounded during the conflict:—

Camp, somewhere near Ferozepore, on the Banks of a
"Nullah" (river), Jan. 2, 1846.

My dearest Uncle,—Before this letter reaches its destination, you will, no doubt, have seen and read the Governor-General's despatch, containing an account of the two actions fought—one on the 18th of December, and the other on the 21st and 22nd of the same month—also, a list of the killed and wounded; and, amongst the latter, you will see flourishing my father's and my own name; but, when you see them, be not alarmed, for we are both, thank God, doing well; and, what's more, you will not only see us mentioned amongst the killed and wounded, but, I hope, amongst the gallant and brave. One thing I can safely say, that we have neither of us disgraced the family, nor the Irish blood flowing within us. I suppose you would like to hear my account of the battle; well, as much of it as I saw you shall have.

In your last letter to me (received yesterday) you advised me to offer my services as a cavalry volunteer, should there be war with the Punjaub. You will be surprised to hear that I offered myself, more than a fortnight ago, and was accepted, and made acting aide-de-camp to Brigadier Gough on the spot, who commanded the 2nd Brigade of Cavalry, consisting of the Governor-General's body-guard and the 5th Regiment of Light Cavalry. I thought myself one of the luckiest dogs on the face of the earth, and all I wished for was a fight that day—just that I might have an opportunity of showing the brigadier what sort of fellow he had for an aide-de-camp. By Jove, uncle, I had scarcely expressed the wish when a letter came to say that the Sikhs were in force not far ahead. The order was immediately given to advance in lines, draw swords, and load pistols; and we advanced in a most beautiful line—horse artillery and cavalry together; the infantry in the rear a good distance. Well, we advanced in this way for many miles; and, at last, seeing no enemy, the order was given to halt at a place called Moodkee, and mark out the ground for the camp, which was done in a short time; and, soon afterwards, we found ourselves seated round a table in the open air, eating and drinking away at a splendid lunch, or tiffin (as they call it in this country). But, a soldier's life is so uncertain, you don't know what a minute may bring forth. There we were—eight of us—seated round this table, talking, laughing, eating, and drinking—little thinking what was in store for us. We had been in this way for about half-an-hour, when, all of a sudden, one of the officers jumped up and said—"Do you hear the 'assembly' sounding?" We were on our feet in half-a-second, and soon after every man was on horseback. I took up my post close to the bugler, and followed him wherever he went. The order was given: "2nd Brigade, form a line and advance; the enemy are within a mile of you!" The gallant young fellows of the 5th gave a cheer—enough to do one's heart good who heard it—and advanced steadily. We had proceeded about three-quarters of a mile from camp when we heard a bang and a whiz, and then another and another in rapid succession; our artillery came up in the meantime, and began firing at theirs. The cavalry were drawn up in line behind the artillery, and every now and then a round shot from the enemy's guns came into our ranks. The infantry had not come up at this time. An order came from the Chief, telling the cavalry to go a smart trot, and turn the left flank of the enemy. At this time I was not with the brigadier, he having sent me to camp to tell the 4th Lancers to come up at a gallop and join the rest of the cavalry. When I returned I found the cavalry moving round the flank, and I was obliged to go at a good gallop to overtake the brigadier. Whilst passing the 5th, a round shot came whiz quite close to me, and entered their ranks; that was the first shot that took effect that day; it broke two of the horses' legs, and that was the last I saw of the 5th Light Cavalry. Her Majesty's 3rd Dragoons were leading, followed by the 2nd Brigade, and also by the 4th Lancers. We had gone in this way for a mile, when the Dragoons ahead of us gave a cheer; they had just got a glimpse of the enemy. We took up their cheer—had scarcely commenced, when an order was given—"body-guard, right wheel!" I turned round to see what was the meaning of the order, and the first thing that caught my eye was a body of the 8th cavalry among a lot of bushes. A great number of the body-guard men did not hear the order, and followed the 3rd Dragoons. We managed, however, to get about 40 of them together, and went at the enemy in sections of threes—not being able to form line and charge, on account of the bushes. The cheer I told you of before, that the 3rd Dragoons gave, raised my Irish spirit to such a pitch, that I said to myself "Now, then, for the honour of old Erin," and in another minute I found myself in the middle of the Sikhs. I was surrounded by four of these blackguards, all cutting and slashing at me with their swords, and, to make bad worse, I lost both my stirrups; there was not a man of the body-guard near me at the time; it was a dreadful situation to be in, certainly; and the only thing left was to make a last effort, which I did by digging both my heels into the sides of my little horse, and giving one or two jolly cuts with my sword, which cleared the way for me. I soon found myself amongst the body-guard again, with only a slight wound on the thigh. Not long after this, we were at them again, and I got a shot right through the muscle of my right arm, and another a little higher up, which went through my coat and my shirt, but never touched my skin. Was not that a narrow escape? Four officers out of six were wounded that evening; I mean those of the body-guard. Well, after fighting for some time, we (60 of us) gave about 200 of the Sikhs as good a licking as ever they had got. But, if these fellows had fought as well at the end as they did at the commencement, they would have cut every one of us up; for we are no match for them in hand-to-hand work. They use their swords and manage their horses a great deal better than we do; and they proved it that evening. Two of the officers had their reins cut; a fellow tried that at mine, but missed, and caught my horse such a cut behind the ear!

I must tell you something of my father, and the narrow escape he had that evening. My dad, with his regiment, lost sight of the brigade soon after we made the move round the enemy's flank. The dust and smoke were so great that you could not see your hand before you. Had it not been for that, the 5th would have been up with us when we attacked those fellows in the bushes, and the consequence would have been that they would all have been butchered, and, very likely, we should not have been so severely cut up. When my governor found himself all alone with his regiment, he was rather puzzled what to do; but, rather than stand still, he moved on with his regiment towards some dust he saw in the distance, not knowing whether it was the enemy or ourselves that was kicking it up, and caring very little which—but on he went. After ten minutes' cantering, he was astonished to hear his men cheering, and asked why they did so? They said they saw the Sikhs ahead. He had not time to give them an order, for no sooner had they commenced cheering, than his horse—a brute he gave 1000 rupees for only a week before—took to its heels, and rushed off right into the middle of the enemy's infantry. Not a man of the 5th went after him, though they would follow him to the —, if they had orders; but they were obliged to keep to their ranks. The Sikhs fired volley after volley at him; but, by some luck or other, he went right through their ranks without getting a bit. He was a long time riding alone by himself, and at last he came up with the Commander-in-Chief, Sir Robert Sale, and the 31st Queen's. He was talking to Sir R. Sale when he was shot; and, at the same time, my governor was hit by some grape-shot in the left arm, and had his sword broken over his head; and an hour or two after the fighting was over, and we all returned to camp and had a splendid dinner. Now then, uncle, I must hurry over the account of the next week, which lasted twenty-four hours—the Waterloo of India. We had two days given us after the Moodkee affair to rest our limbs and bury our dead. On the morning of the 21st, we marched at sun-set in battle array—the infantry leading, followed by artillery, protected by cavalry. We marched about 12 miles when the halt was sounded. We dismounted, and had something to eat. We had about a quarter-of-an-hour's rest, when we were on the move again towards the enemy's entrenched camp, which was distant about two miles. In a short time we were within gun-shot of it. The halt again sounded, and the Governor-General, Commander-in-Chief, and all the general officers, held a consultation, whether we should attack them at once or wait until the following morning. Sir Hugh Gough was for attacking them at once, and it was given in his favour—so, at three o'clock, our heavy guns opened upon their camp. There was a heavy fire kept up from both sides. At last, we managed to set fire to their camp. Our infantry made three or four charges at their batteries, and succeeded in driving the fellows away from their guns, and spiking them; but they could get no further than the guns. The enemy's infantry fought beautifully. I don't mean to say they could lick ours; but they blew hundreds of our brave fellows up by springing mines, and then coming down in numbers, and firing at us with their matchlocks. It was about nine o'clock when our infantry retired from the camp. I was at that time with the 5th Cavalry, talking to my father, when a round shot came right between us both, and killed a trooper and a horse behind us. By Jove, uncle, I shall never forget that as long as I live: the whiz that that ball made was ringing in my ears for an hour afterwards. We bivouacked for that night close to the enemy's camp, and they amused themselves by firing at us with their big guns the whole night. At daybreak on the morning of the 22nd we went at them again, and drove them out of their entrenchments at one o'clock. The Governor-General sent for the 5th Cavalry, and ordered it to go ahead four miles to see if the Sikhs had gone off. We had scarcely gone a mile when the blackguards came down on us again. That was the critical moment; the fate of India was at stake: it was a regular case of fight or die, and the former we did in style. At three o'clock in the afternoon of the 22nd the fate of India was decided, and the most bloody battle ever fought in this quarter of the world finished. At five o'clock that evening we went into Ferozepore, and bivouacked that night.

Best love to all, and believe me ever to remain your affectionate nephew,
AUGUSTUS H. ALEXANDER.

The Globe says, "We have obtained leave to copy the following portion of a private letter from a gallant officer who commanded one of the regiments engaged in the severe three days' battle on the bank of the Sutlej:—Camp Runreeka Ghaut, on the left bank of the Sutlej, 15th January.—God only knows how this desperate war will terminate. Our loss in killed and wounded has been almost three thousand. God only knows how I escaped. I commanded the — in the 18th, at the close of that battle; and I commanded —— in the battles of the 21st and 22nd. My Arab charger was shot on the night of the 21st, while in square. Lord Fitzroy Somerset's son received his death wound in the ranks of the 56th; he was a noble and gallant soldier."

JELALABAD.

This place is associated with the most brilliant successes of the lamented Sir Robert Sale; for here, in the winter of 1841—42, with a handful of British troops, the gallant Commander made a most heroic defence against a numerous and infuriate army of Afghans. The date of our sketch, obligingly forwarded by a Correspondent, is 1842; the fortifications were destroyed in October, that year, by order of General Pollock, on his final evacuation of Afghanistan.

Jelalabad is the capital of the province of the same name, and is situated nearly a mile from the south bank of the river of Kabool (shown in the second distance of the sketch), and five miles below the confluence of the Soorkh Rood. It is stated to have been founded by the Emperor Akbar, called also Jelal-ud-din. Two other towns of greater extent formerly stood near the present, and their ruined defences can still be traced. Jelalabad is wretchedly built of unburnt bricks, and has little either of manufactures or trade, though advantageously situated on the main road from the Punjaub to Kabool. The amount of population is variously stated—from 3000 to 10,000. A considerable portion of the number are Hindoos—here, as in other places, the monopolizers of trade. The place owes its importance to the fact of its being the residence of the Governor of the fertile province of which it is the chief town. (Thornton's Gazetteer.)

The annexed Engraving is from a drawing by Captain George Powell Thomas, Bengal Army; and may be relied on for its fidelity.

CHINESE BEDSTEAD.

This highly-curious specimen of the beaux meubles of China is now to be seen at the warehouse of Mr. R. A. C. Loader, 24, Pavement, Finsbury. It was the property of a Mandarin, and was taken at Pekin, by a Captain, during the late war. It is, perhaps, the finest piece of Chinese cabinet-work ever seen in England, being carved, solid rosewood and ash, in many parts three inches in thickness. The design is truly tasteful, and not merely distinguished by its elaborate beauty. The Canopy (not shown in our engraving) is of teak, finely perforated. Another peculiarity is the Dressing-room, which is attached, and is of a like character. The entire weight is 1097 lbs.

This would appear to have been the great family Bedstead of the Mandarin from whose establishment it was taken. It was highly prized; for in China, as in England, the best Bedstead is held almost in veneration, and is handed down, from generation to generation, for hundreds of years.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 21, 1846.

That the "letter killeth" is abundantly proved in our courts of law, in those cases where the strict terms of an enactment are made the means of violating every principle of common sense and equity. Instances need not be quoted from the past, for every day is adding to their number; and one class of suits alone—that known as "Railway Cases"—is becoming very fertile in proofs of the fact that law and justice are often of no kin together. It is the golden age of scheming-attorneyism and bubble-blowing speculators; for, though they have been the actual men in getting up plans of railways, for which surveyors were employed, and numerous agents set to work in a style, to borrow a phrase from another class of managers, "regardless of expense," they contrive, and the law abets them in contriving, to escape the consequences of their own misdeeds, had things prospered they would have bagged all the profits; but they back out of all the responsibility of payment, and leave it to that numerous class, almost a tolerable fraction of the whole human race, "Railway Committee-men."

The engineers and others who have demands to make for work and labour done are entitled to fair payment if their work has been fairly executed; but we conceive that equity should throw the charge on the real employers, the active spirits, the Company, in fact; for everybody else connected with it appear, in most cases, to have been mere cyphers. The attachment should be made, too, against the general funds of the undertaking; if they are insufficient, it shows that the engineers have given extensive credit to a concern that did not deserve and should not have commanded credit at all. The law does not countenance a creditor who has been utterly reckless in his dealings, and it would have been a great advantage to the public had engineers, whose work is so expensive, ascertained beforehand what were the prospects of payment, and whether or not there were really sufficient funds at the back of the undertaking. If, as sometimes appears to have been the case, engineers were themselves among the first promoters of the scheme, the case is still worse; and to give them a remedy against the individuals they have coaxed into the Company by the terms of a prospectus, and who took no share whatever in the management, is only to legalise and protect a refined system of plunder.

Let each shareholder be liable to his part of the expenses with others; but the law becomes a violation of justice when it permits individuals to be singled out from others equally liable, and made to defray the whole charge of proceedings of which they had no knowledge, and which neither controlled nor regulated. The letter of the law may support some of the recent decisions; but we think Judges might show a little less virulence against the victims of these speculators: they seem to exult in what is really, on their part, abetting extortion from the Bench, by virtue of Acts of Parliament, which those same Judges not unfrequently denounce as unintelligible. They are now lending the law to assist fraud and robbery: far better would it be to treat such cases like the Jew's suit for the "pound of flesh," no cases in which it is desirable, for the sake of "a great right," to do "a little wrong"—and, instead of insisting on the letter of the law, inspire Juries with something like the spirit of equity.

The parties were James Duff, Esq., M.P., son of General Sir Alexander Duff, and Lady Agnes Georgiana Elizabeth Hay, second daughter of the Earl and Countess of Erroll. Amongst the numerous distinguished persons present were Lord and Lady Cowley, the Marquis and Marchioness of Ailesbury, the Marquis of Hertford, Lady Powerscourt, &c.

ARRIVAL OF JOSEPH BUONAPARTE IN LONDON.—Joseph Buonaparte came by the Calais Packet on Thursday, and has arrived at the Brunswick Hotel, Hanover-square.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND IN THE COLONIES.

A numerous meeting of the merchants, bankers, and traders of the city of London was held on Tuesday, at the Egyptian Hall, Mansion House, "to adopt resolutions for providing the ministration of religion and the means of education, in connection with the Church of England, for our emigrant countrymen in the British colonies."

The Lord Mayor was in the chair, supported by the Bishop of London, the Bishop of Llandaff, the Bishop of Jamaica, Lord John Russell, Lord John Manners, Lord Courtenay, M.P., Lord John Tyrrell, Sir George Larpent, R. M. Milnes, M.P., the Rev. Sir H. Duckenfield, Archdeacon Robinson, Archdeacon Harrison, the Dean of Chichester, R. Mangles, Esq., M.P., Alderman Copeland, M.P., Baronet, Esq., M.P., Archdeacon Manning, Sir C. Hunter, H. Aglionby, Esq., M.P., G. P. Young, Esq. T. D. Acland, Esq., Alderman Farebrother, &c.

The Bishop of London, in proposing the first resolution, said, that frequently as he had attended their meetings, he could truly say he never experienced so much satisfaction as on the present occasion, when he saw not only the chief magistrate of the greatest city in the world, the representatives of its principal men, but also so large a number of its inhabitants assembled for the purpose of doing honour to the Church by means of the colonies. (Applause.) After referring to letters from Canada, Australia, Newfoundland, &c., to prove the spiritual destitution existing in the British Colonies, he (the Bishop) proposed the following resolution, and resumed his seat amidst great applause: "That while a great present deficiency of the means of public worship and religious instruction exists throughout the British colonies, about 40,000 persons, for the most part of the poorest class, annually go out as emigrants, to settle in those countries."

Sir Thomas Baring, M.P., seconded the resolution, which was unanimously adopted.

The Bishop of Jamaica, in an eloquent speech, proposed the following resolution: "That the poor labourers and workmen, who are compelled to seek an independent subsistence for themselves and their families in the Colonies, and are thus deprived of the advantages provided for them at home, in their own parish church and school, have a strong claim on their countrymen for help, in providing churches and schools for their children with the means of religion and the means of education."

Lord John Russell, in seconding the resolution, said:—"I rise to address you, not only as being connected with this city, having the honour of being one of your representatives, but likewise having held a situation under the Crown which gave me an opportunity of knowing the situation of the Colonies (hear, hear) I had also the means of learning how valuable are the efforts which are made by this Society for the diffusion of Christianity in the Colonies. (Cheers.) It is, therefore, with great pleasure that I rise to second the resolution which speaks of ministering to the poor labourers and workmen, who are compelled to seek a subsistence for themselves and families in our Colonies, some of those advantages provided for them at home in their own parish churches and schools. (Applause.)

The resolution was agreed to.

Archdeacon Manning proposed the following resolution:—"That the merchants, bankers, and traders of the city of London, whose commercial interests are so closely interwoven with the prosperity of the Colonies, are specially called upon to promote their moral and spiritual welfare."

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

It was then agreed that a subscription should be opened, and thanks were voted to the Lord Mayor

THE BENEVOLENT SOCIETY OF ST. PATRICK.

The 53rd anniversary festival of this society was celebrated on Tuesday evening at the Freemasons' Tavern. The attendance was not very numerous, there being only about 120 persons present. Among the nobility and gentry assembled on the platform we observed the following: Lords Palmerston and Lincoln, Viscount Canterbury, Baron Rolleston, General Sir C. Malcolm, General Caulfield, Sir W. Somerville, General L'Estrange, Sir T. B. Lennard, Sir R. E. Campbell, Sir J. N. R. Campbell, Mr. R. Arundell, M.P., Mr. J. Collett, M.P., Mr. Butler, M.P., Mr. J. W. Fitzpatrick, and Mr. Shaw, M.P.

The cloth having been drawn, and the usual loyal toasts having been proposed, and drunk with all the honours,

Mr. Somerton, who filled the chair, gave "The Army and Navy." In introducing the toast, he expressed a hope that a period was fast approaching when wars would cease. He hoped that means might be found of settling differences between nations, more suitable to human parties, without having recourse to the lamentable struggle of arms; but if it was our misfortune ever again to be compelled, by the violence or injustice of any other nation, to draw the sword in defence of our rights and honour, they might be sure they would find our army and navy equal to any emergency.

General L'Estrange and Admiral Malcolm acknowledged the toast on behalf of their respective services.

The President then proposed "Health and Prosperity to the Benevolent Society of St. Patrick." In doing so, he said that in most other countries the duties of public charity were discharged entirely by the Government; but, in this land, they were mainly supported by the voluntary contributions of private individuals. Yet the sources of it never could run dry, and he could only liken it to those streams which flowed from lofty mountain ranges, and which, however supplied, cannot be found wanting for centuries after the whole Providence had destined them.

The next toast proposed was the "Health of the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland."

The Earl of Lincoln returned thanks, and, on rising, was received with considerable applause. He said that it was his duty, in consideration of the office which he had the honour to hold, to rise, in the absence of the Lord-Lieutenant, to thank them for the compliment which they had paid him. He hoped that he might be allowed to interpret the reception which he had met with as an acknowledgment, with respect to the Lord-Lieutenant, of his desire to co-operate in any measures which might promote the good of the country over which the Sovereign had placed him as Viceroy. In immovin. the condition of Ireland, he was sure they would all agree with their noble President that education stood pre eminent. He trusted that Government, and societies, and individuals, might do much separately for the amelioration of that unhappy country, but the greatest good for Ireland would be effected by the co-operation of all. The moment had arrived when the Government was called on to make great exertions on behalf of the physical wants of Ireland; but he trusted that private charity would flow not less unintermpitedly from private sources

The secretary of the society, read the report, preceded by the Stewards, marched round the hall, their neat and healthy appearance eliciting the marked approval of the company.

The delivery of the ball was graced with the presence of many ladies, who were pestiet spectators of the festivities going on beneath.

The band of the Coldstream Guards was in attendance, and the musical and other arrangements were excellent.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY.—Tuesday being the festival set aside by the Roman Catholic Church as a special honour to Ireland's Patron, and which is kept with so much reverence and subsequent jollity by the natives of the Sister Isle, the annual service was performed at the Roman Catholic Chapel in Soho-square, designated after the festival devoted to the memory of the Irish Apostle, which occasion a solemn high mass was celebrated before a very crowded audiitory, and a sermon, suitable to the occasion, was delivered extempore by the Right Rev. Dr. Morris, Roman Catholic Bishop of Troy

FANCY FAIR IN THE THAMES TUNNEL.—A fancy fair, to celebrate the third anniversary of the opening of this stupendous and extraordinary undertaking, is announced to be held in the Tunnel on Monday next, and lasts for seven days.

THE NEW GATES AT THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.—The new gates, which have for several weeks past been in the course of erection at the western or grand front of the Royal Exchange, have been just completed, and are thrown open

BANK OF ENGLAND MEETING.—On Thursday, a Quarterly General Court of the Proprietors of Stock in this Corporation was held, for the declaration of a dividend for the current half-year. The Court was very fully attended. The Governor, Mr. J. B. Heath, took the chair. The Governor said he had to acquaint the Court that this was a quarter-y meeting, held pursuant to the charter, to consider of a dividend, and he was happy to state, that the Directors having considered the Bank's accounts, they recommended that a dividend of £3 10s. out of interest and profits should be made, and without any deduction for the Income-tax. The Court of Proprietors would, no doubt, require some information as to the Rest. On the 31st of August, 1845, the amount under this head was £3,988,887, showing an increase of £15,363. On the 28th of February, 1846, the amount was £3,988,420, showing an increase of £100,543. Therefore, upon the whole year, there had been an increase of £115,906 (Hear, hear.) He hon. Chairman then put the question that the usual dividend should be declared, which was agreed to, as also a vote of thanks to the Directors for their excellent management.

WOODEN PAVEMENT.—The CITY COMMISSION of Sewers decided on Thursday, by forty votes to one, that Regent-street should be paved with granite; and that the street should be closed for that purpose for three weeks.

REDUCTION IN THE PRICE OF BREAD.—On Wednesday, the price of bread fell, in various parts of the metropolis, from 7½d. to 7d., and some to 6½d. The highest price of bread is now 9½, and the lowest 6½d. per 4lb. loaf.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS.—New Oxford-street is now fast approaching completion, and it is expected that the roadway will shortly be thrown open for the passage of vehicles. The whole of the buildings abutting on architectural frontage present a most pleasing appearance, particularly when viewed from the end of Tottenham-court-road. And further improvements are about to be effected in this locality, the whole of the houses fronting St. Giles's Church having been demolished preparatory to the erection of a handsome crescent on the site.

POSTSCRIPT.

SUICIDE OF CAPTAIN M'LEOD, OF THE "GREAT LIVERPOOL" STEAMER.

In part of our first impression we were enabled to announce the suicide of Captain M'Leod, the commander of the Great Liverpool steamer, which was recently lost. We have since received some additional particulars. The following is an extract of a letter from the Peninsular and Oriental Company's agent at Coruna (E. Santos, Esq.), dated Coruna, March 12:—

"I returned from the week's visit of the Great Liverpool on the 10th inst.

"The melancholy death of Captain M'Leod, which took place on the morning of the 8th instant, has, as you may well suppose, greatly added to my labours.

"Poor Captain M'Leod has been, ever since the unfortunate loss of the Liverpool, in an extreme depressed state, and caused me very serious apprehensions. At five o'clock in the morning, I went to the habitation where he, with one of his officers and the doctor had been sleeping. I told them to get ready, as every thing had been arranged by me for an early start to Coruna. I asked Captain M'Leod how he had rested, when he replied that he had not closed his eyes, went to the window, and agreed with me on our leaving for Coruna. He then immediately after, he took off his coat, and went into his sleeping-room, I thought to wash. We soon heard a noise, and the landlord coming in to report the same, made us all rush into his room, where, since the unfortunate loss of the Liverpool, where the distressing catastrophe was perpetrated, every one of his fellow sufferers following his remains to the grave with heavy and mournful hearts.

"Captain M'Leod was a gentleman of extremely high spirit and honour, and it is not improbable that the severe sufferings, anxiety, and trials, the loss of the vessel entailed upon him, superinduced the committal of the dreadful deed.

"Mrs. M'Leod, with her youthful family, resided in Southampton. The distressing intelligence was communicated to her as delicately as possible, but it is impossible to describe the agonising state of mind of this truly unfortunate lady.

"Capt. M'Leod was a lieutenant in the navy; his commission bears date the 19th of July, 18—.

"The conduct of the natives is described as villanous in the extreme: they openly pitched everything they could lay their hands upon, accompanied in many instances with acts of violence.

"The unfortunate ship had entirely disappeared, not a vestige of her was to be seen. Occasionally, however, fishing-boats ashore; but they were quickly pounced upon by those ravenous wolves in human shape, and divided amongst them."

WINDSOR, Friday Evening.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Instructions have just been received at the Castle to prepare the suite of private apartments for the reception of her Majesty. It is expected that the Court will arrive at Windsor on the end of the ensuing week. In conformity with the advice of her Majesty's medical attendants, it has been determined that the Court will not again visit the Isle of Wight until after her Majesty's accouchement. The Duke and Duchess de Nemours are expected to arrive at the Castle about the latter end of May, or the beginning of June, to escort her Majesty and the Prince Consort to Paris, upon a visit to the King and Queen of the French. The infant Royal family, as at present arranged, will remain at Osborne House during the absence of their illustrious parents on the Continent. It is expected that the Queen and Prince Albert will be away from England at least three weeks.

DEATH OF REAR-ADMIRAL SKIPSEY.—This gallant Admiral, who had been residing at Brighton during the latter years of his life, died there on the Wednesday evening, in the 90th year of his age. W. Skipsey, Lieutenant of the Berwick on Keppel's action in 1778, and commanded the Terpsichore in 1781; of the Bridgewater, a 20-gun sloop, and commanded the Termagant in the expedition to Egypt in 1801. Gazetted 1756.

TERMINATION OF THE CIVIL WAR IN THE CITY.—The civil war in the City between the Corporation and the Waterman's Steam-tug Company has terminated. After many negotiations the Navigation Committee have rescinded the order prohibiting the Watermen steamers from calling at Blackfriars' pier, the original cause of the dispute, and now the Watermen land and embark passengers as usual at the pier, on their way to and from Woolwich and Greenwich. The St. Paul's-wharf Pier, once dragged away by the Corporation forces and brought back again by the crew of the Watterman No. 5, is to be permanently retained for the use of the Watermen's Company. All legal proceedings between the Company and the City have been by the present suspended.

SEVERE WEATHER IN THE NORTH.—A letter from Newcastle-upon-Tyne, dated Wednesday night, says:—"The weather, which has been unusually fine here for some time past, yesterday became cold and frosty, and during the night a snowstorm commenced, which has continued with unabated fury to-day. Indeed, we still see nothing but a wide waste of white, and the snow is nearly five feet deep, and the roads are almost impassable. The railway trains have been delayed, and some not able to go at all; and, from the accounts received from Berwick, it will be impossible for the coaches to run northward. Those due this evening have not yet arrived. This is the most severe storm of snow experienced in this district for many years."

THOUSANDS OF MECHANICS WANTED IN MANCHESTER.—Large posters were yesterday displayed throughout the metropolis, announcing that at no less than 4000 mechanics, belonging to the underwood, carpet, and other trades in Manchester, were wanted immediately at the following wages in Manchester and neighbourhood: Carpenters and joiners, 28s. per week; bricklayers, 30s. per week; plumbers, 27s.; slaters, 26s. per week; plasterers and painters, 26s. per week; and labourers, 18s. per week.

GREAT ROBBERIES OF JEWELLERY AT HULL.—Since Monday great excitement has prevailed in Hull, owing to the commission of two extensive robberies at the premises of the principal jewellers of the town. The amount of property plundered, principally in jewellery, to several thousands. Both robberies were accomplished on Sunday, and, it appears the first was discovered at about eight o'clock at night at the shop of Mr Isaac Daniel, jeweller and watch manufacturer, in Queen-street. It seems that Mr. Daniel, shortly before the above hour, had gone to put the Minerva Hotel, in the same street, in the part of an hour returned and apparently found the premises in the same secure state as when he left. On entering, however, he noticed a large dog which he kept in the house lying on the floor dying, and near the poor animal some pieces of poisoned flour. The robbers must have used the utmost expedition, as they could only have been on the premises from five to ten minutes. Mr. Daniel's loss is said to amount to between £1000 and £2000, consisting of gold and silver watches, thirty guards and chains, a large number of wedding-rings, diamond and other pins, silver spoons and forks, &c. &c. The second burglary took place the same street, on the premises of Mr. Reed. The proprietor was in the habit of sleeping on the premises, but, unfortunately, he did not do so on Sunday night. The door was fastened with the patent bolt-locks, and on the door being opened in the morning it was discovered broken, and, after plundering the interior, he locked them, as if nothing had occurred. The gold and silver watches, gold chains and guards, diamond pins and rings, gold pencil-cases and silver plate, and other costly articles, which were stolen, the gross amount of which is estimated to be £2000.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.—Our Paris Correspondent states that the Chamber of Deputies rejected the proposition of M. de Remusat, by a majority of 192 to 184. The Paris papers of Wednesday exhibit considerable excitement in consequence of the speech of M. Thiers, who, in supporting the proposal, attacked Louis Philippe personally, and even went so far as to assume that Monarch of acting contrary to the principles professed by him at the Revolution of 1830.

PORTUGAL.—We have letters from Lisbon to the 13th instant, but they are destitute of news. The proposals of Sir R. Peel had created great sensation at that capital, but it does not appear that there is any intention on the part of Portugal to follow the example of establishing free trade. The Revista Nacional contains the following:—"The reduction which Sir R. Peel proposes to make in the duties on a variety of agricultural productions will open a vast horizon of hope for Portugal. At the same time, however, our manufacturing industry will have to redouble its exertions, for it will have to sustain against a rival more formidable than ever, as the reduction of duties to which the operation of that measure must lead, will arm English industry with greater power than it has ever had. For our own part, our best plan is to defend ourselves, if necessary, by still higher protective duties, and by that name to obtain all the benefit we can from Sir R. Peel's concession, which as little injury as possible to our own manufactures."

GREECE.—The Augsburg Allgemeine Zeitung contains letters from Athens to the 29th of February. The Chamber of Deputies had at last brought the discussion on the Address to a close, and presented it to the King. Colonel N. Stratos, deputy from Sparta, had been murdered in Laconia by his Arabian servant.

PATRICK'S DAY AT DUBLIN CASTLE.—The usual military display which has been annually resorted to for the gratification of the people on St. Patrick's Day was observed on the occasion of relieving guard this day at the Castle. At eleven o'clock the troops under orders ensemble from the Royal Barracks, led by a squadron of the Queen's Bays, followed by Lieutenant-General Sir Edward Blakeney, attended by Town-Major White, and a brilliant staff. As soon as the gallant general made his appearance outside the barrack-gate, he was received with loud cheers; his arrival at the Castle was also the signal for a continuous round of applause. The bands of the Queen's Bays and the 89th Regiment played Patrick's Day, during the process of relieving the military, who were on duty in the Upper Yard, during the process of relieving the military, who were on duty in the Upper Yard, during the process of relieving the military, who were on duty in the Upper Yard precision. This was rather dangerous work, as the ground was formed of a stone pavement, and as the bullets rebounded amongst the assembled crowds. The chiefs of the mountains are almost covered over with silver. Cracow swarms with military, who are quartered in all the monasteries. Many of the Prussian forces occupy the Jewish portion of the city, where the accommodation is of the worst kind. The Russians are principally quartered in one of the suburbs. This afternoon I went to Podgorze. The houses were not so much damaged as might be imagined, only the impressions of the gun-shots being discernible on the walls. In the evening I went to the theatre in Cracow, to see the 'Daughter of the Regiment.' The spectators were not numerous, and were composed chiefly of military. Only a very few ladies were present. As I proceeded to the post, at half-past ten P.M., a remarkable stillness pervaded the city, and not even a patrol was to be seen or heard. The conduct of the Prussian commander, General Brandenburgh, is the subject of general commendation. His first inquiry, on entering the city, was after the prisoners; and as soon as he was informed that those persons who had been arrested were in chains, he ordered the latter to be removed, observing that the prisoners were not yet legally tried."

The Correspondent of the above paper next enters into some details respecting the insurrection, from which it appears that two persons were put to death by the insurgents of Cracow on suspicion of being spies; that Professor Mischnewski forced the dictator Tyssowski, under the threat of shooting him, to abdicate his post; that the former, on being sentenced to death for that act, had sought refuge in Prussia; that a number of priests and monks who accompanied an armed force towards Bochnia were taken prisoners by the Austrians, whose general subsequently refused to hold a parley with the dictator, but who received a deputation of citizens. The writer adds that the terms offered by the Austrian commander were so unfavourable that the deputation refused to accede to them; that about four in the morning of the 3rd inst., 2000 armed insurgents quietly withdrew to Kressowitz, taking with them, from the public treasury, about 200,000 Polish florins; that a small body of Circassians first entered Cracow, and that the revolutionary Minister of Finances (the banker, Wolff) has been summoned to make good the money removed by the insurgents, scarcely one-third of whom had surrendered to the Prussians.

We find the following in the France:—"A diplomatic communication was made a few days ago by the Austrian, Prussian, and Russian Ministers, to M. Guizot, intimating a resolution come to by the three Powers to interfere in re-establishing order in Cracow, and declaring their intention to occupy the city and territory as long as may be required to suppress the present spirit of the population. M. Guizot has returned an answer, stating that the Cabinet of Louis Philippe should make no objection to this intervention. The answer was the subject of discussion in the Council of Ministers, after a private audience, granted by Louis Philippe to Count d'Appony, the Austrian Ambassador. A similar communication has been made to Lord Aberdeen by the representatives of the same three northern Powers at London, but the answer of his Lordship has not yet transpired."

THE ENGRAVINGS.

We have illustrated the characteristics of the Polish people, and the localities of the Insurrection, at pages 188, and 192. The views are:—

Cracow, the capital of the republic of the same name, lying on the left bank of the Vistula, at its confluence with the Radeva, and inclosed by three hills. The town is surrounded with promenades, which have replaced the old ramparts, walls and towers. It is the antient capital of Poland, where its Kings were crowned and buried; and the tourist is still led to imagine it a place of importance, from its numerous lofty towers and buildings; but, on entering the town, he will find it dreary and deserted. Its most striking ancient monument is the Gothic cathedral, the finest in Poland, represented in our engraving. It was destroyed by fire, and rebuilt in 1320. Here the Kings of Poland were crowned; and its numerous chapels recal the events of the history of this Kingdom, from Boleslaus to Kosciusko. Of the seventy-one churches which Cracow once contained, only thirty-eight are, at present, devoted to the purposes of divine worship. There are, besides, a castle, an episcopal palace, an university and numerous other public buildings; but the population is under 25,000.

Posen, one of the oldest cities in Poland, is the capital of the province and of the government of the same name, and lies on the left bank of the Wartha, where it is joined by the Loyna. It has three suburbs, four gates, and is pretty regularly built. It has a castle, twenty-six churches, chapels, a fine town-hall, &c. The population is stated at 30,000.

SPANISH PEASANT GIRL.

PAINTED BY INSKIPP.

We have already characterised this picture as one of the gems of this year's Exhibition of the British Institution. We have, accordingly, transferred it to our pages; and, notwithstanding the almost insurmountable difficulties which the Engraver has to encounter in the reproduction of works, the principal merit of which lies in colouring, we confidently hope that the annexed Illustration will convey a fair notion of Mr. Inskipp's beautiful production, and amply justify the high position we have already awarded to it. To those who have not seen the original picture, the gracefulness and natural freedom of the pose, the charming expression and character of the face—by-the-by, quite free from attempts at prettiness—and the admirable execution of the foreshortening of the arms, will be here apparent; as well as the bold and felicitous effect produced by the masterly distribution of light and shade. The picture was purchased immediately after the opening of the Exhibition Gallery.

STERNE'S MONUMENT.

An intelligent correspondent, a clergyman, who is known to us, says—"This being the month in which occurs the anniversary of the death of Sterne, I beg to send you a representation of his grave-stone, erected, as a tribute to his genius, by strangers Performing duty in the burial-ground of St. George's, Hanover-Square, situated in the Uxbridge-road. I remarked to the respectable clerk, Mr. Scarman, on its dilapidated state, which rendered the inscription almost illegible, and suggested that, as a public monument it should be restored, as the expense could not be great, and would be easily obtainable by small subscriptions. Mr Scarman received the suggestion in the best manner, and, by a collection of merely shillings, has effected a very desirable and necessary public object."

The following is the inscription on the monument:—

"Alas, poor Yorick!"
Near to this Place, lies the Body of
The Rev. Laurence Sterne, A.M.
Died September 13th, 1768,*
Aged 53 Years.

"Ah! mollior ossa quiescant,'
If a sound head, warm heart, and breast humane,
Unrallied worth, and soul without a stain;
If mental power could ever justly claim
The well-won tribute of immortal fame,
Sterne was the man who, with gigantic stride,
Mowed down luxuriant follies far and wide
Yet, what though keenest knowledge of mankind
Unsealed to him the springs that move the mind;
What did it cost him? Ridiculed, abused,
By fools insulted, and by prudes accused,
In his, mild reader, view thy future fate;
Like him despise what 'twere a sin to hate.

This monumental stone was erected by two brother masons; for, although he did not live to be a member of their society; yet, as his incomparable performances evidently prove him to have acted by rule and square, they rejoice in this opportunity of perpetuating his high and irreproachable character to future ages.—W. & S.

* This date is erroneous; he died on the 18th of March, 1768.

NEW ENTRANCE TO THE ROYAL BOTANIC GARDENS, AT KEW.

These very handsome Entrance-Gates to the Royal Gardens, have just been erected from the design of Decimus Burton, Esq. In the gates themselves, skilfully executed by Mr. Walker, of York, a successful attempt has been made to revive the old art of ornamental wrought-iron work, which has, unfortunately, fallen into disuse since the introduction of casting.

The stone piers, surmounted by vases, and their faces bearing floral enrichments, have a noble appearance: the whole of the ornamental work was carved by Mr. J. Henning, jun., whose works as a sculptor are so well known. Other improvements of interest connected with these Gardens are in contemplation, and which we may have some other o[illegible]unity of noticing. The Gardens will be very shortly opened to the public.

MUSIC.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The opening Concert of this truly national institution on Monday last, at the Hanover-square Rooms, was one of the most memorable nights in the annals of the Society. The room was crowded to excess; his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge and a host of distinguished amateurs, and every professor of note, being present. The engagement of a permanent Conductor for the entire series of Concerts in the person of Mr. Costa, whose fame in the creation of the Opera orchestra had been European, was the great event. The judgment of the Directors of the Philharmonic Society proved to be quite accurate in making this appointment. A greater triumph was never achieved. For once unanimity prevailed. The oldest members of the Society frankly admitted, that never before in this country had the great Symphonies and Overtures been so marvellously executed; and the critics have one and all handsomely acknowledged the genius of Costa in the management of his forces. It is necessary to inquire into the secret of such an important result, and the first point to be considered is the disposition of the orchestra itself, which was alluded to in last week's Illustrated London News, but which we now endeavour to explain graphically to our readers. We beg to refer to the accompanying plan.

To persons acquainted with the general arrangement of an orchestra, it will be seen that a complete revolution has been effected. The rapid and almost perpendicular rise of the old plan was long a matter of complaint—now, the elevation is reduced considerably; players with drums and trombones, &c., are no longer perched up in the roof, to drown the arranged instruments, which were in a valley, with a formidable array of double basses in the front, effectually to stifle the melody from the first violins. Cost . has got rid of such monstrosities; an . studying the principles of acoustics, he has s right, and successfully, to blend the various tones.

It will be seen that the organist's seat is now in front of the Conductor, and just under the player's place are the drums. To the right and left of the the organ are six double-basses, forming the first row counting from the top; in the next line, a double-bass is seen at each extremity, three violoncelli and two trumpets being on the left, and three trombones and three violoncelli on the right. Looking still at the orchestra from the body of the room, the third row will be found occupied by the four horns, two flutes, two clarionets, two oboes, and two bassoons; the fourth row is assigned to two violins, three tenors to the left, two violoncelli in the centre, and three tenors and two violins to the right. The two small platforms at each end of the fourth row are devoted to eight violins.

We now arrive at the fifth row; to the left are four violins, with four tenors in the centre, and four second violins to the right. This is a beautiful point in the placing Then comes the sixth and last row; here, immediately in front, is the first violin, or Chef d'attaque, the absurd title of Leader being dispensed with for ever. By his side are four first-rate violins, with the leading violoncello and double bass in the centre, and four leading second violins to the right. We have marked the pianoforte in our plan, because that will be the situation when it is required for a concerto player, but its use for vocal and instrumental purposes is entirely done away with, and it will not be in its place, when there is no pianist to exhibit his powers. The Conductor stands or sits in front of all the instrumentalists, so that his gestures and beat can be distinctly seen. We will now supply a list of the players:

First Violins. T. Cooke (principal), H. Blagrove, Sainton, Willy, Deloffre, Dando, Griesbach, Wagstaff, E. Thomas, W. Cramer, Thirlwall, Patey, Banister, Gattie, W. Thomas.

Second Violins. Watts (principal), Ella, J. Loder, Watkins, Case, Westrop, Anderson, Pigott, W. Blagrove, Payton, Jay, Calkin, Jun., Perry, and Marshall.

Tenors. Hill (principal), Moralt, Kearns, Lyon, J. Calkin, Joseph Calkin, Glanville, Alsopt, Abbott, Chatlonet.

Violoncelli. Lindley (principal), Lucas, Hatton, Crouch, James Calkin, Banister, W. L. Phillips, W. Loder, and Hancock.

Double Basses. Howell (principal), Flower, Severn, Pratten, Wilson, Casolani, Griffiths, Schroder, and Castell.

Horns. Platt, Rae, Jarrett, and Harper, Jun.

Trombones. Smithies, German, and Winterbottom.

Trumpets. Harper and Irwin.

Flutes. Ribas and Card.

Oboes. G. Cooke and Malsch.

Clarionets. Williams and Lazarus.

Bassoons. Baumann and Godfrey.

Drums. Mr. Chipp.

Ophicleide. M. Prospère.

The record of the above gives:—

First Violins	15
Second ditto	14
Tenors	10
Violoncelli	9
Double Basses	9
Flutes	2
Horns	4
Trombones	3
Trumpets	2
Bassoons and Oboes	4
Clarionets, Drums, Ophicleide, Harp, Triangle, &c.	8
Total performers	—80

On Costa's entrance into the orchestra, he was much cheered, and then the band began Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 9, at the conclusion of which the applause was deafening. Indeed, the sensation created by the colouring given to this most hackneyed work, was one of utter amazement to the old Haydnites, who exclaimed loudly that they had only heard it for the first time that evening. Mr. Lockey was announced to sing Mozart's "O, cara, immagine," from the "Zauberflöte," but, being indisposed, his place was taken, at a few hours' notice, by a Mr. Rafter, a pupil of Crevelli. It was Mr. Rafter's début in London, and, before such a critical auditory, he was, of course, very nervous; but there is promise in his style. Here another innovation was remarked: all the violins played in the accompaniments, instead of being half taken off, as heretofore, and yet such a piano was preserved, that the voice of the singer was fully sustained, and not drowned, as formerly. In the finale to Spohr's Violin Concerto (No. 11, in G), Costa's skill was still more manifested, and was the admiration of Sivori, Parish

(a) This strikes us as a novelty not to be found in "the books."
(b) Preparatory to an attack on the Q's Pawn with B and Q.
(c) The only move apparently to save the Q's Pawn.
(d) Hastily in anticipation of Black's playing Q's B to R's 3d.
(e) To get the advantage of a "passed" Pawn, and give free range presently to his Q's B.
(f) Had he protected the Q's B with either of his Rooks, White would have won both Bishops for his Rook.
(g) By this mode of play Black loses a Pawn, but we doubt if he had any other less disadvantageous to him.
(h) This move involved so many remote contingencies that it required some nerve and the nicest calculation to venture on it.
(i) Ingeniously played.
(k) His only safe move.
(l) Black's game was to bring this B to bear on the adverse K Kt's P; he would have saved time, therefore, by moving it at once to its 5th.
(m) If White had played his Rook to Q Kt's 7th with the view of winning the K Kt's P, Black might have played R to K 3d, leaving the Pawn to be taken, and then to K R 3rd.
(n) It was remarked by White, after the game, that his opponent over-rated the strength of the attack on the K Kt P. Independent of taking the Bishop, which seems the most effectual way to avert the menaced danger, White might have played Kt to K 3rd, Q R P one; or R to Q 2nd; and, in each case, have won the game.
(o) It is too apparent that taking the Knight would have cost Black his Queen.
(p) This move was, of course, foreseen when White ventured to advance the Q R Pawn.
(q) His only play to preserve the winning Pawn.

GAME THE TWELFTH.

WHITE (Mr. H.)	BLACK (Mr. S.)	WHITE. (Mr. H.)	BLACK. (Mr. S.)

24. Kt takes P	B to K B 4th	48. B to K B 3rd	B to Q 3rd
25. Q B to Kt's 2d	B takes Kt
And, after many moves, the game was abandoned as drawn.

(a) He would have lost a piece by taking the Pawn with his Q's Bishop.
(b) Black labours under the disadvantage of having too good a game. He might now have changed off the Knights, and played Q's Pawn one step.
(c) To prevent the advance of the Q's Pawn.
(d) The sulpineness of his opponent has enabled White to extricate himself, and get his forces into tolerably effective array again.
(e) The start of playing without looking. This heedless move loses a Pawn which, with common attention, must have won the game.
(f) This appears a forcible move, but is actually a very bad one.
(g) Here again Black plays without, consecanding to examine the position; otherwise, he must have seen that, by simply playing on his K B P, he wins easily.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS, RECENTLY DECEASED.

THE REV. SIR S. SYNGE HUTCHINSON, BART.

Sir Samuel Synge Hutchinson, of Castle Sallak, county Wicklow, son of the Rev. Edward Synge, M.A., of Syngefield, and grandson of Dr. Nicholas Synge, Bishop of Killaloe, succeeded to the title, as third Baronet, at the decease of his maternal uncle, the Rev. Sir James Hutchinson. Sir Samuel was born 22nd April, 1756, and consequently, at the period of his decease, had not quite completed his 90th year. He married first, in 1787, Frances, daughter of the late Hans Wood, Esq., of Rossmead, County Westmeath, by whom he had one daughter; and, secondly, in 1801, his cousin Dorothy, daughter and coheir of John Hatch, Esq., by whom he had another daughter, Sophia, wife of Captain Coote Hely-Hutchinson, brother to the Earl of Donoughmore; and one son, Francis, who died in 1833, leaving by Louisa Frances, his wife, daughter of the Hon. Francis Hely-Hutchinson, a son, the present Baronet, and other issue.

MRS HUTTON.

Catherine Hutton, the daughter of William Hutton, the historian, of Birmingham, was born Feb. 11th, 1756. At an early period she published three novels, viz., "The Miser Married," "Oakwood Hall," and "The Welsh Mountaineer," none of which, however, ever attained much celebrity; and, indeed, she never seemed to think well of them herself. She furnished her Walter Scott with a sketch of the life of her father's friend, Lage, for "Ballantyne's Novelists' Library," and amused a retired life with other literary essays. Like her late friend, Mr. Upcott (a short Memoir of whom appeared in the "Obituary" of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of the 4th of October last,) Mrs. Hutton possessed a fine and beautifully illustrated collection of autographs, and her eagerness in this pursuit may be gathered from the following extract of a letter which she wrote within the last few months of her life:—"I have been a collector upwards of twenty years, and have amassed upwards of 2430 autographs and 1800 odd portraits, and am as voracious as ever."

Her cheerfulness, up to the latest period of her advanced life, never deserted her, and her correspondence, which was very extensive, was uniformly marked by kindness of disposition, and a liveliness of manner, surprising to all.

A short Memoir of the early days of this extraordinary woman will be found in the Appendix to the well-known Autobiography of her Father.

Mrs. Hutton expired on Friday, the 13th, at her residence near Birmingham, having attained her 90th year a little more than a month.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE MACCLESFIELD BRANCH RAILWAY.—TWO MEN KILLED.—An inquest was held in the board-room of the Stockport Infirmary, on Tuesday, on the bodies of John Seal and John Barnes, who died in consequence of injuries sustained on the Macclesfield branch of the Manchester and Birmingham Railway, on Sunday last, while at work; one set of waggons had left another for, and was about to overtake another between Bramhall and Hazel Grove, before the collision, as escaped. Verdict, "Accidental death."

GOSSIP OF THE WEEK.

The debate on the first reading of Sir Robert Peel's Bill, promises to rival in length and tediousness that which introduced it to the House. Lord George Bentinck goes on, in fulfilment of his promise, fighting from pillar to post, dividing on silk, on corn, and on brandy, and beaten from each position by larger and larger majorities. His Lordship reverses the old adage, "Divide et impera" (Divide and conquer), into "Divide et vincere" (Divide and be conquered). What good he promises to himself or the public from this obstinacy we are at a loss to conjecture. Meanwhile fever-stricken Ireland looks up from its meal of rotten potatoes to impolore succour which cannot be rendered until the Protectionist minority has had its say, and been beaten off its last foot of standing ground.

The great events of the week have been the philanthropic movement in the Court of Aldermen, and the appearance of General Tom Thumb in the irregular drama, at the Lyceum. Of the two, we are inclined to attach most importance to the latter. The result is small, it is true, but we do not anticipate any result so great from the motion of Alderman Sidney, for the introduction of the separate system into City prison discipline, or the petition of the Working Classes' Association for the improvement of the dwellings of the poor. Praiseworthy as the objects of both these movements are, they are hopeless, when urged in Guildhall. There may be a great profession of sympathy, but we fear that there is more of Mr. King's spirit in the Common Council, when he laughs to scorn the notion of the Corporation doing anything for the houses of the poor as a dream of ridiculous and hopeless humanitarian fanaticism, than of Dr. Lynch's, who introduced the petition. So we turn to the small fact—General Tom Thumb. Some sticklers for dramatic legitimacy may affect indignation at the sight of so small a thing, paraded on the stage for his smallness. It is illegitimate—there is no doubt of it; but it is curious, and awakens more reflection than the strutting of many a bigger actor.

There is no appearance of any mental dwarfishness in this abridgment of Transatlantic humanity. We never saw more eager, wakeful curiosity than peeps out of those restless little eyes from under that elfish and exaggerated brow. Neither mind nor body, small as the latter is, and the former might be expected to be, seems weighed down by the constant effort and exhibition of his daily levees and his nightly performances. The little face is as intelligent, the little legs as sound and active, at midnight as at noon. We saw the epitome as he was carried out of the Lyceum Theatre the other evening, after his performance. He was tucked under his tutor's arm, his tiny bullet head protruding from the tutor's cloak, the bright small eyes, restless as a bird's, peering round the stage, which was being arranged for the farce of "Next Door." "What's the name of this piece?" "What is the stage divided into two for?" "May I stop and see it?" followed fast upon each other. The General was reminded that his supper hour had arrived, and his love of the dramatic art seemed for the moment absorbed in the anticipation of the evening repast. We were tickled with the notion of Tom Thumb's supper. We amused ourselves by anticipating what it might be—the wing of a lark, or an infantine chicken, prematurely extracted from the egg, with a first course of a minnow en papillotte, and a doll's cup full of gravy soup. "And what shall you have for supper, General?" we asked the mannikin. We never saw a gent. at Evans's look bigger or more self-important than Thumbling, as he replied, "I should like a Welsh rabbit."!!

Conceive Tom Thumb sitting over his Welsh-rabbit! Conceive the Welsh-rabbit—the infinitesimal square of toast and the fabulous mite of cheese! We have not yet recovered the shock. We fancied for a moment that we might unconsciously be a Brobdingagian, and Thumb a man of proper and lawful size.

There is one point connected with this little fellow which diminishes the sad and disagreeable impression which the sight of dwarfishness leaves behind it. He looks like a child—a diminutive child, it is true—but still one from whom all hope of growing bigger is not absolutely shut out. In this way he moves our sympathies without shocking them, and unconsciously infuses a kindly corrective into the spirit of idle curiosity, which, no doubt, moves most to visit him. The women absolutely grow soft and tender-hearted over him. It is a strange feeling. They have him as a sort of small man, but yet as an infant. The firmness and finish of his manner contrast so oddly with the decidedly childish character of the head and body. In fact, he gives them a new sensation. We do not wonder at the crowds he attracts. All other dwarfs we have ever seen were simply repulsive. Tom Thumb is pleasant, though a thought elfish to look upon.

We overheard the remarks of an Irish scene-shifter, as the General was carried past him—

"The dawahy thing! By the powers, Sir," addressing himself to one of the actors who stood near him, "if they had a thing like that in my country, I would be putting him on a hot shovel, over de fire, to see would he fly up the chimney—and sorra' blame to 'em at all, at all—sure he's so small!"

We feel convinced that that Irishman firmly believes that Tom Thumb is a changeling, or fairy child, and we recommend his guardian and tutor (most accomplished and elegant men, by the way, both of them) to see that Tom is kept out of the way of the aforesaid carpenter, in the neighbourhood of anything more dangerous than a property fire, made of a transparency, with a candle behind it.

We confess a partiality to Tom Thumb. We desire to commemorate him in an ode.

ODE TO GENERAL TOM THUMB.

Poor little mannikin:
Thy country hath sent to us many things
So small, the fairy chariot Shakspeare sings
M.ght take them in,
And trot along as with no load at all:
She sends us dividends extremely small,
Small manners, and small poets, and small jokes,
And small originalities;
Her N. P. Willises, and other folks
Who measure at their ease
Thy small proportions, never deeming how They're smaller far than thou!
The grounds on which they claim their Oregon
Are mighty little;
Well may they that would stand such grounds upon
Not bate a tittle,
Or they'd have none at all—
They're now so very small!
But though in the vapour of their idle talk
They loom as large
As through Thames fog a barge,
Like some huge admiral, doth seem to walk
The muddy waters;
And in "high quarters"
Grave men parade their little patriotic
(Which means Quixotic)
Intentions, how they mean to chaw up whole
Each Britisher who dares to call his soul
His own!
Nor these alone,
Being small things, believe that they are big—
Each Broadway prig
Prates of equality and liberty;
Nor deigns to see
The black slave crouching underneath the lash
Whose stripes should dash
The stars from out Columbia's flag,
And quench the brag
That, o'er the Atlantic sea,
Is manhood free!

But there is no pretence in thee,
Sharp-eyed epitome
Of childish mannishness.
Thou dost profess
To be the smallest man that walks the earth;
When I think on thy birth,
It much amazes me, thou dost not cry
"I'm twelve feet high,"
And that thy country calls it out, exemplarily,
"Behold a giant!"

INCRUSTATIONS IN STEAM-BOILERS.

A valuable paper was recently submitted to the Society of Arts by Dr. Ritterbrandt, "On the Formation of Incrustations in Steam Boilers, and on the means of preventing it." It was stated that the cause of the explosions of boilers was the thick incrustation of carbonate of lime, which takes place in consequence of the carbonic acid gas, by which the lime of the water was held in solution, being drawn off by heat. Dr. Ritterbrandt adds a proper proportion of chloride of ammonia to the water, the muriatic acid of which combines with the disengaged carbonate of lime, an insoluble salt, and forms a muriate of ammonia, which is readily held in solution by the water. The boiler is thus kept free from incrustation and is rendered much more durable, and is at the same time freed from the inconvenience above-named.

THE WEATHER OF FEBRUARY.

The past month presented another very unusual temperature, as well as a close atmosphere, for this period of the year. From the night of the 8th ult. into the 15th there was a downfall of hoar frost, although it had little effect upon the solid state of the air. The lowest point of cold was on the night of the 16th, when the thermometer was not below 29 deg.: the highest, in the shade, was on the 28th, 68 deg.; and in the sun, on the 26th, 83 deg., making an extreme difference of 54 deg. The diurnal average of the whole month was at night 41.18 deg.; shade, 39.44 deg.; sun, 85.73 deg. The month of February has been usually a cold month, but this has been conspicuous in the mildness of its character.

BANKRUPTCIES IN THE LAST YEAR.

The number of bankrupts during the last year amounted to 1025, comprising nearly all trades and professions. The highest number was that of victuallers, which was sixty-three, and the lowest number the class of attorneys, there being one only. The only business accepted from the list of bankrupts list was that of undertakers. [There seems no uncertainty about the business of undertakers, for people must die be the times what they may.]

THE POLES.

If we may believe the Russian statistics, the Poles are reckoned at this moment at 5,500,000 souls. Of these, 5,000,000 are in the various provinces which Russia has obtained at different times for her share in the dismemberment; Austria has 2,311,000; Prussia, 3,000,000 Polish subjects. The free state of Cracow contains 136,000 inhabitants.

FLY-FISHING.

That fly-fishing is the sublimity of the sport, and the worm-fishing is the antipodes of it, few will be bold enough to deny. For what can exceed trout and salmon fishing—the wild ramble by the river and stream of merrie England, or by the "hill-girded lochs," of the land of flood and mountain? The whole scene teems with life, every spot is full of beauty, every moment is replete with interest. Compare this with the regular flat, stale, and unprofitable float-and-punt work, grilling under a broiling hot sun in the dog-days, or a drizzling day in September, off Battersea-reach, Twickenham-meadows, or Kel-pie island, repeating Hood's "Comic Annual" lines—

I ground-bait my way as I go,
And dip at each watery dimple;
But, however I wish
To dredge the fish,
To my penile tury will not play simple!

At a bread-ne gudgeon would gape,
But they're so nice upon different terms now!
Have they taken advice
Of the Cockle Street Dame,
And rejected their Dried of Worms now?

HORTICULTURAL NOVELTIES.

At a late meeting of the Horticultural Society, there were distributed some seeds of the Brassica Chinensis, or Shanghai oil plant, sent over by Mr. Fortune, from China. This is a plant of the cabbage tribe, which yields oil by expression, and a large quantity has been sent over to this country for experimental trials.

CLASSICAL ADDITIONS TO THE LOUVRE.

There have just been placed in one of the salles of the Louvre, several antique fragments from Greece. Amongst them are a bas-relief, representing Thesens as the protective hero of Attica; a bas-relief, with the Nine Muses between Mercury and Apollo; and another from Crete, containing a figure of Jupiter, seated between Europa and Cadmus, both highly venerated in that island. There are also some marbles from Asia Minor, one of which, from the town of Mylasa, is particularly important, as it contains three decrees of the reigns of Artaxerxes II., Mnemon, and Artaxerxes III. These decrees are well known to savans.

THE ELECTRIC GIRL.

M. Arago, a day or two ago, communicated to the Academy of Sciences the result of the examination of the electric girl, made by the academical committee:—"The committee declare that the fall of a table by the mere contact of a silken thread held by the young girl in question was not repeated before them, nor does the girl possess the faculty of distinguishing, by the touch, the direction of the compass." The committee did not pursue the investigation of these abortive attempts any further. "The committee, under these circumstances, have come to the conclusion that the communications made to the Academy respecting Mdlle. Angelique Cottin must be regarded as unproved."

THE MARCH OF INTELLECT.

It is said that the magazines that are to supply the Mormons to California will number 5000, and will form a line twenty-five miles long! In the front there will be a press and types, from which will be issued every morning a paper, to be sent back to inform the rear-guard what is going on in the van!

ART UNIONS.

The Select Committee appointed to consider the objects, results, and present position of Art Unions, and the most expedient means of placing them on a safe and permanent basis, have just published their Report, extending to 330 pages. The Report, including the origin and progress of the several associations of this kind which have arisen out of the London Art Union, and supplying statistics of their receipts and expenditure, the Committee proceed to deduce from the very conflicting evidence which has been brought before them, the opinions which form the most interesting feature of their Report. The witnesses combat the objections which have been made to the effect of such associations on art.

IMPROVED LOCOMOTION.

As an instance of the facilities for locomotion afforded by "rail," we may mention that Mr. P. Miles, M.P. for Bristol, took part in the debate on Monday evening week in the House of Commons, and was also present at the Bachelors' Ball at the Bath Assembly-rooms, more than 100 miles distant, on the same night.

NEW MANUFACTURE OF NAPHTHA.

A manufacture of a novel character is about to be established at Weymouth, for the manufacture of a kind of naphtha, or oil; the bituminous clay near the Burning Cliffs is the source from whence it is to be extracted. Several eminent chemists from France have been experimenting for some time on its properties, and have now concluded a contract for large quantities.

EXTRACTION OF PARTICLES FROM THE EYE.

A German writer has recently proposed that when a foreign body, such as a particle of straw, dust, &c., gets between the eyelids and globe of the eye, but without being mfracted, a solution of gum arabic dropped into the eye, may be advantageously employed for its extraction, as the solution does not produce any disagreeable sensation.

MILLINERS' APPRENTICES.

If we enter the work-room of some dress-maker in tolerable business, we shall see a number of girls, many of them pale and emaciated, crowded together, and under the superintendence of a forewoman, whose office it is to keep order and urge on the appointed task. Of these some are "apprentices," others are "day-workers," the remainder are what are termed "improvers." The apprentices are joined with the proprietress of the establishment for a certain period, generally for six at two or three years, sometimes five. They are apprenticed usually about the age of fifteen, and receive board and lodging from the mistress. The premium, of course, varies according to the situation and notoriety of the house. It is sometimes as high as one hundred guineas. The day-workers live at home with their own friends in small lodgings, and receive a certain sum per day. The "improvers" are young girls from the country, who have been sent up to London for a season, generally about two years ago, to learn the business, and who come up from the country, and remain usually six months with their employer, during which period they make themselves generally useful; their time is entirely at the disposal of the dress-maker, they reside with her, but receive no wages and pay no premium. During the London season the fatigue they undergo is excessive. At a period of life when adequate rest, and even some degree of exercise, are absolutely necessary to the healthy growth, they are confined, with scarcely any intermission for their meals, which they are frequently obliged to eave half-finished to return to their work, often till three or four o'clock in the morning, in a heated and unwholesome atmosphere. The whole frame exhausted, and the nervous system frequently too much unstrung for the [illegible] to sleep, succeeded by [illegible] expected to be early again at the [illegible] Such are the [illegible] of the [illegible] of the [illegible] frequently [illegible] the seeds of [illegible] No wonder that many [illegible] to untimely graves, by causing the [illegible] to become [illegible] in after life the diseased mothers of an unhealthy and miserable offspring. It is lamentable to see the change that sometimes comes over the country girl shortly after her admission as an apprentice. Arriving, perhaps, from her happy village home, where she has been the pride of honest and industrious parents, her cheeks redolent of rosy health, her step elastic, her spirits light and buoyant, at first the novelty and excitement, and constant variety of the busy town amuse her; she delights in the companionship of girls of her own age, and survies to the utmost of her power to win the approbation and confidence of her employer. By degrees her pallid cheek and attenuated form show that the loss of fresh air, and the absence of accustomed exercise, are taking into the bud of youth. Her appetite leaves her: she sighs occasionally over her work, but utters no complaint. Then comes the short hacking cough, the supernaturally brilliant eye, the moist spot. Soon she despatched an haste to her native home, but rest then comes too late. This is not a highly-coloured picture, sketched by fancy, but the history of many a poor girl, the words of truth and soberness. And if it be possible to prevent such tales from being so common, if we can devise any scheme for rescuing our victims from being immolated on the shrine of Vanity and Fashion, will not every Englishman and every Englishwoman—for much is in her power—help him with us in the sacred work?—Fraser's Magazine.

NEW ROYAL MARINE BARRACKS, WOOLWICH.

THE FITTING-OUT OF THE "CALCUTTA."

If anything could have been wanting to assure us of the dexterity of British tars—of their ability to accomplish even what would heretofore have been esteemed impossibilities, and of their readiness, under good treatment and judicious command, to engage with almost superhuman spirit and energy in any work to which they may consistently with their calling be appointed—it would be abundantly afforded by the smart and seaman-like act just performed by the crew of the Albion in fitting-out the Calcutta, 84 gun ship, at Devonport. The esprit they have evinced is worthy of the naval supremacy of their country; and the steadiness, and quiet and orderly perseverance they have shown, have earned for them a fame which will not be without its effect upon the entire Navy.

In reference to the Calcutta, an amount of work has been done in a manner and within a time that is quite unprecedented. The alacrity displayed by the Albion's people could not have been exceeded: from the hearty Captain N. Lockyer, C.B., and the highly respected Commander, W. Chambers, down to the youngest boy in the ship, all have been animated with those feelings which at once proclaim the British seaman, and his indomitable energies.

Immediately upon its being known that the crew of the Albion was to fit out the Calcutta, each man on board appeared to be delighted with the contemplation of the work chalked out; nor were these little inducements withheld which an officer always has at command, and which, though sometimes thought trifling in themselves, have no trivial influence with the men, and more closely bind them to their officers, as shown in the attentive and quick dispatch of the orders given. The fitting-out of the Calcutta excited the greatest possible interest among nautical men; for the excellent discipline on board and the smartness of the men were well known, and proportionate to this were the expectations indulged in as to the celerity they would exhibit. These have, however, fallen far short of the actual result. It is but justice to the Captain, Commander, Master, and other officers, to observe that in no point could the work have been done better than it has been. There was no bustling or driving: all went noiselessly on; the entire crew, seamen and marines, were admirably stationed, and everything that would occasion confusion or any waste of time, was avoided. It is proper to mention also, that not the slightest assistance was derived from any quarter whatever.

On Monday morning (the 9th inst.), at six o clock, the ship was ready for operations, but in no way furthered—there had been no preparatory work done. On Monday evening, the main-yard was up; cross-jack-top, mizen topsail-yard, mizen and topgallant-masts on end, &c. On Tuesday morning, the fore-yard, fore main-topsail-yard, and topgallant-mast were fitted; in the evening the rigging was rattled down, the stores on board; the main and lower deck guns, in, &c. In fact, by Tuesday night, the ship was completely rigged and tolerably ready for sea; but, the starboard watch had not completed drawing all the stores, namely, hemp cables, and a few of the sea-stores, together with some spare spars which had to be got from the mast-pond. With the exception of these, the ship was ready; and by Wednesday at noon, all was on board but a few articles which were afterwards supplied. This having been done, all was accomplished; the tanks were in, stores, mess utensils, &c. complete; and, in saying that she was ready for sea, we mean perfectly ready in every respect and particular. She was in a position to cope with any enemy, as far as her general fitments were concerned. On Thursday morning, at half-past nine, she was hauled off; and, at one o'clock, when the tide suited, was towed into the Sound by the Tartarus steamer, and the Confiance tug. The whole of the work had been achieved within six-and-thirty working hours; for although she did not go into the Sound until Thursday, she was, to all intents and purposes, finished the day preceding.—Abridged from the Devonport Independent.

The annexed Engraving of the Calcutta is from a drawing by Mr. Hornbrook, the marine artist, of Charlotte-street, Fitzroy-square.

THE "CALCUTTA."

Shipwrecks and Loss of Life.—The Cape of Good Hope Gazette contains an account of the loss of the barque Francis Spaight, from Manilla to London, by striking on the ground near the Slave Lodge, about a mile from the village of Papendorff. The captain and twenty-one of the crew were drowned.—Two wrecks, accompanied, we regret to announce, by a mournful loss of human life, upwards of eighty persons having perished, were on Monday reported at Lloyd's, namely, that of the British barque, Ida, 550 tons burthen, belonging to the port of London, and the John Minturn, an American-built ship, of near the same tonnage; both lost while on outward-bound voyages from their respective ports.

Cheap Steam Travelling.—Steamers are now plying between London and Westminster Bridges for the small sum of one penny for each passenger.

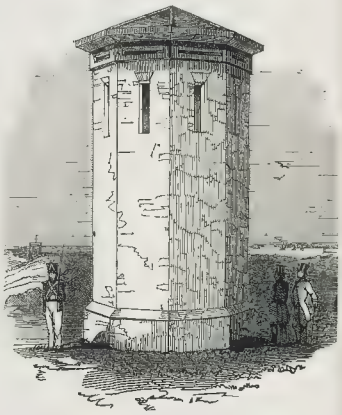
The New Crop of Potatoes.—A paragraph has recently been going round the press to the effect that the new crop of potatoes exhibited such signs as to make sure that they were diseased, and would be a failure similar to that of the last. It is, however, positively asserted by those who are most likely to be well informed, that the new crop will, in all probability, be a very good one, at all events an average one.

Railway Disputes.—It is rumoured in the city that an attempt will be shortly made to put into operation the 7th and 8th Victoria against several of the railway companies whose affairs continue in a disputed and litigated position. A case on the subject has been submitted to counsel, whose opinion is favourable; and, although some little difficulty apparently exists respecting the service of notice, that, it is understood, can be overcome by a loophole in the act. The question, it is said, will be raised in the course of a few days before the Bankruptcy Commissioners.

The South Eastern Railway.—The directors of this railway have given the public the accommodation of two express trains daily both ways upon this line. One leaves the Bricklayers' Arms at eleven o'clock in the morning, and the other, London-bridge, at four o'clock in the afternoon. The trains stop at Tonbridge, Ashford, and Folkestone, and make the journey both ways between London and Dover in two hours and a half.

NEW ROYAL MARINE BARRACKS, AT WOOLWICH.

The building of this very capacious and convenient lodgment for the Royal Marines was commenced at Woolwich, some time since; and, has just been expedited in consequence of the Board of Ordnance having given notice to the Admiralty that the west square of the Royal Artillery Barracks, at present occupied by the Woolwich division of Royal Marines, will be shortly required for the accommodation of the 10th battalion, about to be raised, and the numerous recruits for the Royal Artillery almost daily joining at head-quarters. The whole of the brick-work of the extensive new Barracks, capable of accommodating upwards of 1000 men, with residences for their officers, has been erected; and, it is expected, will be fully completed within three months from the 1st inst. The basement story will be occupied as kitchens for cooking, and will contain large iron ranges, with every convenience for that purpose. The floors are formed of flag-stones adjoining the fire-places, and elsewhere, of asphalte, on a concrete foundation.



HEATING AND VENTILATING APPARATUS, MARINE BARRACKS.

To prevent the possibility of the building being destroyed by fire, the whole of the joists are of metal; and the only parts of wood are the window-sashes and steps leading to the first and second stories. The floors of the first and second stories are of asphalte on concrete foundations, placed upon brick arches, and there are no fire-places in the apartments above the basement-story; the whole of them being heated by an apparatus for circulating hot air, which is worked by the aid of an Archimedean Screw, eight feet in diameter, connected with a furnace in winter; and is, by an adaptation of the works, capable of circulating cold air from the exterior to the whole of the interior of the Barracks in summer. The motive power for working the screw is attained by weights, on the same principle as an eight-day clock; and when wound up, will cause the screw to revolve with great velocity for eight hours before it will cease working on the weights reaching the bottom of the building. In front of the first and second floors, a large open space, the entire extent of the building, has been constructed and arched over for the men to take exercise in wet weather, and every care has been taken for their comfort.

On the north side of the Barracks for the men, substantial and commodious dwelling-houses have been built for the Colonel in command; the Colonel second in command; and for officers' quarters. In a line with the Barracks for the men, the staff non-commissioned officers' quarters have been constructed; and a spacious room for a library, and a piece of ground set apart for a racquet-court. On the south side are the mess-room and ante-rooms, with dwelling-houses for officers' quarters. The ground in front of the barracks for the men is in progress of being levelled, as it will be required for drill before the contractor can finish the out-buildings and boundary walls. In the rear of the Barracks, a building is constructing for a magazine or store-room. Here also will be placed a framework, to represent the bows and part of the sides of a ship-of-war, with two port-holes in the bows, and two on each side, for exercising the men with large guns in the duties they will have to perform at sea.

Our artist has sketched the new building; together with the main portion of the heating and ventilating apparatus.

THE THEATRES.

LYCEUM.

"Hop-o'-my-Thumb" is a tale familiar to all the lovers of nursery literature, and different versions of it are popular with the children of almost every country. But it has, until now, never been properly put upon the stage; the impossibility of finding a becoming representative of the little hero, having always been an obstacle to its effective representation. The famous General Tom Thumb has at length essayed the character, and the result has been that he has achieved a perfect success.

TOM STEALING CROWNS.

The extravaganza produced at the Lyceum on Monday evening, entitled "Hop-o'-my-Thumb, or the Ogre and his Seven League Boots," is an adaptation, rather than a translation, by Mr. Albert Smith, of a French fairy vaudeville, called "Le Petit Poucet," by Messrs Dumanoir and Clairville, which was brought out at the Vaudeville Theatre last May, for the purpose of introducing the General to the Parisian play-going public. The French piece is in prose, and in five acts. An English audience would not sit this out; so each act has been compressed into a single scene, an original introductory one has been added, and the dialogue has been written in the metre usually adopted in burlesques.

On the rising of the curtain, we find Oberon (Miss Hodson) holding court in a moonlight glade, surrounded by the fairies. The elfin monarch calls Friar Rush to his presence, and wishes to know what he has been doing all night. Rush replies: -

> Sire, I have play'd those tricks the whole night through,
> Which, Shakspeare says, Queen Mab was won't to do.
> Oberon. Shakspeare! who's he?
> Moth. A person who wrote plays,
> But very little known, Sire, now a-days.
> Oberon. We never heard of him
> Moth. Sire, that's no wonder,
> For latterly he has been much kept under.
> Undone by foreign ballet dancers' spells:
> I think his house of call is Sadler's Wells.

He then whispers to the King, that he has found an extraordinary little person, in his rambles, whom he has shut up in a fillbert to keep him safe. Oberon wishes to see him: the filbert is produced, and cracked, and Hop-o'-my-Thumb is discovered called up in its inside. Oberon directly determines to keep him as his page; and Moth (Miss Turner) says: -

> Moth. (with a look) What name shall I put down in our Court Journal.
> Hop. The General!
> Oberon. You mean to say the Kernal.

Thumb has, however, no wish to remain, and, taking to his legs, he creeps into the boss of a daisy, and gets away, to the great bewilderment of the fairies. We next come to the cottage of a poor wood-cutter, Robin (Mr. Bender) and his wife Bradget (Mrs. Woollidge), who are in most distressed circumstances, from the following causes:—

SHOE CARRIAGE.

> Rob. I tell you 'tis no use, wife: near our hut
> There's scarcely any timber left to cut.
> These railway schemers, levelling far and near,
> At last have got a railway even here.
> They've felled the timber which once grew so thick,
> And even I, at last, must cut my stick

The six eldest children come in and want their breakfast. There is nothing for them: and whilst they are lamenting their plight, Margery (Miss Arden) and Solomon (Mr. Emery) come in to complain of various offences against propriety of conduct committed by Thumb.

> Brad. The General Tom Thumb, d'ye mean to blame?
> Sol. The General Torment were a better name.

They call for him, and he appears from the salt-box, whither he had got, with the intention of catching some birds, by the popular practice of putting salt upon their tails. King Cole (Mr. F. Matthews) next arrives, with his three fiddlers. his secretary, Lord Thomas Noddy (Mr. Turner), and his army of five—going in pursuit of an Ogre, who is ravaging the land. He wishes the General to head the troops: the little hero consents, but, after reviewing them, changes his mind, and, as they are marching away, he escapes, by walking betwixt their legs back again. The woodman then determines to lose his children in the forest, and starts off with this intention. We next come to this forest, and Thumb enters under an umbrella, which entirely conceals him. It is raining very hard, and he climbs up a tree, and gets into a bird's nest for shelter, after fighting off the old bird. The six brothers arrive, and lament their lot, as they had dropped some crumbs on the road to find the way back, and the birds have eaten them all. Thumb, who is up in the tree, sees a light at a distance. At the same instant, one of the boys discovers an enormous shoe, which the Ogre has lost in the forest. As Thumb is tired, they put him into the shoe, and, making some harness of their scarves, draw him off. As they start, Oberon appears with his fairies, as a guard, bearing illuminated bell-flowers, and the procession forms a pretty tableau for the end of Act I.

The first scene of Act 2, introduces us to the Ogre's castle, where his wife, Grabalotta (Mr. J. W. Collyer) is instructing his seven daughters in culinary mysteries.

> Now mind your lessons from this precious book,
> Called, as you know, "The Ogre's Perfect Cook;"
> Which your dear father loves so to peruse
> Before he puts his victims into stews.
> Against to-morrow learn these things to do—
> "How to make soldiers into Irish stew,"
> "To grind bones into bread, by the new mill,"
> "To devil lawyers for a breakfast grill." [A knocking.

King Cole, the Secretary, and two soldiers arrive, drenched by the storm; and Grabalotta gives them shelter, intending to keep them for her husband. To their horror they see some clothes hanging about, formerly worn by certain relatives whom the Ogre had eaten. They are going away, when Thumb and the children arrive, and impress shelter. Grabalotta puts them to bed in a room on one side of the house, whilst her daughters are asleep, in their legendary golden crowns on the other. The Ogre (Mr. Silver) then returns, and goes down to the cellar for some pale ale. And now comes a pantomime scene in which Thumb is most effective. He creeps out of a pie in his night gown; and taking the crowns of gold from the heads of the young Ogresses, puts them on his brothers', in turn transferring their cotton night-caps to the little girls. The Ogre returns: finds the pie empty, and is going to murder the boys in his anger. But seeing the gold crowns, he concludes they are his daughters. King Cole and his Secretary at this moment escape; the Ogre rushes after them with his seven-league boots, and Thumb and his brothers get off in safety. We next find all parties met together in the forest. The Ogre has eaten the remains of King Cole's army, and takes a doze after his meal. Thumb steals his boots, and flies with them. The last scene represents the little hero in his fairy palace, with exquisite Lilliputian furniture. He has breakfast, receives his blanchisseuse, is shaved, and, on the arrival of a despatch, goes off to the wars with most martial ardour. As he has the seven-league boots, he is not long in returning to the court of King Cole with the Ogre, his wife, and children, prisoners. Great honours now await him: the fairies receive him in triumph, and he drives off in his state carriage drawn by four beautiful little real ponies.

FIGHT WITH THE EAGLE.

The piece was entirely successful; and no one would have given the little actor credit for possessing so much stage tact and comic humour. His appearance, pantomime, and general performances were so irresistibly indicrous, that the audience shouted again with delight, and laughed and applauded until they left off for very weariness. He was loudly called for at the conclusion, and literally covered with bouquets, which he had great difficulty in carrying off, one being as large as himself. At last, however, he succeeded, amidst renewed acclamations.

The other ladies and gentlemen supported him excellently. Mr. F. Matthews was very great as King Cole, and his Secretary was effectively impersonated by Mr. Turner. Messrs. Silver and Collyer came out admirably as the Ogre and his wife: and we must compliment Miss Hodson upon her singing and appearance in Oberon. None of the parts are, however, of first-rate importance, the "General" being the attraction; and the piece was not written for the Lyceum, but to suit the exigencies of provincial and Transatlantic theatres; hence all allusions to, and jokes on, topics of the day would have been out of place. There is little doubt but that it will be played all over England, as there is nothing in it beyond the power of any country theatre to accomplish.

ADELPHI.

Mr. Stirling Coyne does not often treat us with a new farce, and this is much to be regretted, for, when he does, it is sure to be so comical—so preposterously funny—that screaming audiences are sent home to their beds in great doubt as to whether they have received most pleasure from the performance or pain from their aching sides. And equal to—indeed we may say surpassing—anything he has ever done, is his last production, brought out at this house on Monday evening, and quaintly entitled, "Did you ever send your wife to Camberwell?" It was one roar of laughter from beginning to end, and will have a capital run. Mr. and Mrs. Honeyborn (Mr. Wright and Miss Woolgar), form a married couple, not in very good circumstances, having wedded against the consent of their friends. They have an aunt who resides at Camberwell, with whom they wish to be reconciled; and, to effect this, Mrs. Honeyborn starts on the journey which produces all the situations of the piece, as well as its name. Mr. Honeyborn is somewhat addicted to gallantry: and, as soon as his wife has started, prepares to follow up a little flirtation with another lady, which he has been, very improperly, carrying on for some little time. In the same house lodges Mr. Isaac Crank, a watchmaker (Mr. O. Smith), from Stoke-Pogis, who has come up to town to carry out some new invention of a motive power. He comes into Mr. Honeyborn's room to borrow a pair of bellows, and leaves his hat behind him.

TOM AND THE OGRE.

COMING OUT OF SALT-BOX.

Soon arrives Mrs. Crank (Mrs. F. Matthews), who has come up from the country with her baby, to see what her husband is about. She mistakes Honeyborn's room for her husband's—the notion being strengthened by finding the hat; and, dreadfully upset at also discovering a female's cap, puts the baby in Honeyborn's bed, and rushes off in a frenzy of jealousy to destroy herself. Anon, Crank returns to find his hat; and, recognising his baby, immediately suspects his wife's fidelity, and rushes off in a similar frenzy, but to destroy Honeyborn. Next enters Honeyborn, who, seeing the baby, dreads the jealousy of his wife, and hides it behind a chest of drawers. Crank returns; there is a "row" between them, in the course of which the drawers are upset. Honeyborn, of course, believes that the baby is crushed to death, and makes his escape by the roof. Mrs. Crank now returns, and, worn out in body and mind, lies down in Honeyborn's bed. Bad weather coming on, Honeyborn comes back, and finds her there, just as he hears that his wife is returning. Mrs. Honeyborn returns also from Camberwell, and finds her husband on his knees to Mrs. Crank. Crank arrives, too; and the intense fun of the situation may be conceived. At last, all mistakes are explained. The aunt enters with the baby, all right and alive; and Wright finally inquires of some particular individual amongst the audience, "if he ever sent his wife to Camberwell?"

We have rarely seen a piece in which such capital situations followed so rapidly upon one another, or where the laughter was more continuous and hearty—indeed, at times, it almost stopped the performance. The farce was very cleverly played. The terror and perplexity of Wright, the quaint nature of O. Smith, and the jealousy of Mrs. Mathews, were admirable. Miss Woolgar was effective, as Mrs. Honeyborn, but the part was by no means a good one—quite beneath her talents. The cheering at the end was most uproarious, and the performers were loudly called for. It is safe for fifty representations, and, perhaps, as many more after that.

HER MAJESTY'S.

The performance of "Ernani," on Tuesday, was signalised by the appearance of three new singers, who did not, however, fulfil the anticipations that were entertained of them. They had been, it appears, engaged for merely secondary characters, in addition to the overflowing number of artists already forming the troupe of this establishment; but, on arriving, the talents of this young tro appeared so promising, that they were allowed to try their skill in the principal parts of Verdi's fine opera: they disappointed expectation, and will now, probably, return to that rank which the degree of merit they have at present attained seems to point out for them. It must be said, however, in justice to these artists, that we had not a favourable opportunity of judging of their talents. The soprano (Madame Pasini) and the tenor (Castiglioni) were evidently so paralysed by fear, as to be unable to show what powers they really might possess. The baritone (Benedi) will remain a useful addition to the troupe; he has a good voice, which only needs training to become effective.

It was with much pleasure that we heard "Ernani" again. This opera is of that stamp which constantly gains upon the mind. The two finales of the first and second acts are chef d'œuvres of composition. When the ear has become sufficiently accustomed to their sounds to follow the varied melodies introduced in them with such wonderful skill, the effect produced is indescribable. The sensations called forth by such music as this, when listened to with unswerving attention, are far more profound, though of a different nature, than those elicited by the hearing of the most pleasing simple melody. Combinations of the human voice and of instruments must always, if skilfully managed, produce a powerful effect and this is especially the case with these two finales, in which every bar has a meaning, and in which, consequently, at each hearing, some fresh beauty is revealed. This opera does not contain so much varied melody as "Nino," but the latter has nothing equal in grandeur of conception and imaginative power to these two compositions, which are unsurpassed by any modern lyrical work we can at this moment remember. The duet between Ernani and Elvira, the trio at the end of the opera, and the aria "Ernani involami," are also deserving of much admiration. We hope to hear these charming morceaux performed ere long by more efficient artists. We must not, however, omit our tribute to Forrassari, who played the part of Silva with his wonted artistic power.

"Catarina" has been repeated nightly since the opening of the Opera House. Lucile Grahn is charming in this ballet. Her proud and fearless look; her gestures so natural, and, it might be imagined, unstudied; and her expressive pantomime, inspire every one's admiration to the last her wonderful flying leaps, and apparent defiance of the laws of gravitation. Let it be added that her bandit's costume is particularly becoming. The first dance in this ballet, the "Pas Strategique," is very pretty and effective. The military evolutions of the "female brigade" are highly amusing, and are executed with wonderful precision. There is one movement, in which Lucile Grahn bends forward shouldering her gun, and poising herself on her left foot, all her muscles indicating the action, where he relates his escape from his pursuers, his gestures convey silent description which no language could equal. The music at this moment is also very expressive. The scene of Salvator's Studio is also extremely pretty and well executed. Louise Taglioni is a decided favourite. She is extremely graceful, and has far more power of muscle than would be expected from her smallness of stature.

To conclude, this is a very pretty ballet—the story is admirably told, with all the additional effectiveness which picturesque costume and scenery, and admirable dancing, can bestow.

COUNTRY NEWS.

WINDSOR ELECTION.—On Saturday last, Mr. Neville, who recently vacated his seat for Windsor, in consequence of accepting the office of Lord of the Treasury, was re-elected for that borough without any opposition. Mr. Neville's colleague was Capt. Bulkeley, of the 1st Life Guards, and the nomination was seconded by Mr. Wm. Jennings. After Mr Neville had addressed the electors, a vote of thanks was moved to the Mayor.—Mr. Adams, the Mayor, caused much merriment by laughing, arising and saying "Gentlemen, I have to return you my best thanks for the honour you have conferred upon me by drinking my good health." The worthy chief magistrate, however, as soon as the merriment had subsided, corrected himself by observing, "I am so unaccustomed to public speaking, and my health has been so often drunk in small parties, that I landed I was along with one now. However, I return you my best thanks for the honour you have paid me."

REPRESENTATION OF WIGAN.—A requisition has been forwarded to Mr. W. E. Gladstone, signed by many of the leading members of the Conservative and Liberal parties in Wigan, requesting him to allow himself to be placed in nomination as a candidate for the borough, in the place of the Hon. Mr. Lindsay, who has resigned. It is generally expected that Mr. Gladstone will accept this invitation, and that he will be returned without opposition.

BRIGHTON AND CHICHESTER RAILWAY.—A further portion of this line was opened on Monday from Worthing to Leominster, the Arundel and Littlehampton station of the line, and about ninety persons were conveyed on a double line to and from Worthing to Littlehampton, and all the works are most substantially finished. The telescope bridge over the Arun is so far completed as to allow of the passage of an engine and tender. On Monday morning the rain started simultaneously from Brighton and Littlehampton at a quarter past seven o'clock, and trains continued to run without interruption during the day. The remainder of the line to Chichester will be opened in the first week in May.

EXECUTION AT MORPETH FOR PARRICIDE.—On Tuesday morning, at eight o'clock, Ralph Dobyns underwent the extreme penalty of the law in front of the county gaol at Morpeth, in the presence of a few thousands of spectators, for the murder of his father Since receiving his sentence he was very attentive to the spiritual instructions of the chaplain, the Rev. T. Finch He walked to the scaffold, assisted by the turnkeys, and bowed with a great deal of composure His appearance on the scaffold caused no apparent excitement among the crowd who behaved with great propriety, and manifested a perfect silence while the chaplain, with considerable emotion, and in very impressive accents, commended the soul of the unhappy man to the mercy of his Creator. The fatal bolt was then loosened, and the poor wretch, with scarcely a struggle, was launched into eternity. During his imprisonment he has addressed a letter to the inhabitants of the vicinity of making a full confession of all the circumstances of his crime. The prisoner accordingly requested to be supplied with pen, ink, and paper, and he committed to writing an ample confession.

POLICE.

A WHOLESALE DRAPER AND MILLINER THIEF.—At WESTMINSTER OFFICE, on Monday, Emma Shepherd, a decently dressed young female, was charged with shop-lifting. There were no less than 8 rec robberies committed by the accused, on the same morning, at different linendrapers' shops, two of which were distinctly proved against her, the third was equally undeniable, but the prosecutor was not in attendance She commenced operations at Mr. Parton's, Queen's-row, Pimlico, where she requested to be shown some ribbons, but left the shop without making any purchase She next visited Mr. Spencer's, Warwick-street, at Pimlico, on a similar pretence, and lastly repaired to Mr. Foot's, Warwick-street, Pimlico, where she was shown a number of articles. Whilst the shopman was occupied at the other end of the premises in getting down other goods, she was observed by one of the customers to place a bundle of artificial flowers under her dress, but, finding herself closely watched, after remaining about ten minutes, she replaced the property upon the counter. A policeman was sent for, and she was taken into custody, when rolls of ribbon were found upon her, which were found to have been stolen from the other linendrapers named. The prisoner had no money in her possession to make a purchase with. She made no defence, and was committed for trial.

RAILWAY LITIGATION.—At LAMBETH Office, a day or two ago, Mr. Samuel Henry Powell, a gentleman residing at North Brixton, appeared to answer to an information laid under the 7th and 8th Victoria, chapter 85, intituled "An Act for Stock Company's Act, by Mr. Samuel White, a surveyor, of Missenden, in Buckinghamshire, alleging that he, being one of the promoters of the "Grand Junction, Great Western, and Direct London and Birmingham Railway," had neglected to register the Company, as required by the act, by which he had rendered himself liable to a penalty not exceeding £20. The complainant, Mr. White, had once employed by the Messrs. Demprey's party to the Bill, and had drawn a portion of the projected line, and his bill came to £280. This amount, however, the Messrs. Dempsey were unable to pay him, on account, as he alleged, of their not being paid by the Company; and finding himself in this predicament, Mr. White made an examination of the registry at the office of Mr. Sergeant's-inn, Fleet-street, when he discovered that neither the Company itself, the office at which the business was carried on, nor even the name of the solicitor, had been ever registered, and he in consequence adopted the present proceedings under the act of Parliament.—Mr. Norton convicted the defendant in the full penalty of £20 and costs.—Mr. Smith, the solicitor, gave notice of appeal, and on a subsequent day attended, with Mr. Powell and a third gentleman, to put in bail in compliance with the terms of the Act of Parliament, to prosecute an appeal against the conviction at the quarter sessions to be holden next month at Reigate. The bail as tendered, was at once accepted.

CHARGE OF MURDER.—At CLERKENWELL Office, on Monday, Martin Jennings an athletic Irishman, aged 34, was brought up on the wilful murder of Mary Murray, a poor woman, aged 47, residing in George-court, Golden-lane, St Luke's. It appears that on Sunday morning last, at an early hour, the prisoner and some other Irish labourers went to a house in the above-named locality, when the deceased woman entered. They had something to drink; a quarrel took place between the prisoner and deceased, and the former challenged her with stealing a shilling from him. The woman denied the charge, and a scuffle ensued, the prisoner refusing to deliver him up the shilling, the prisoner commenced an attack upon her and beat her most violently about the head and neck, and pursued her through the passage leading to the back yard, and pitched her head foremost into it. Constable 31 G and other officers were attracted to the spot, when the prisoner said he wished to charge the woman with robbing him of a shilling. They found her lying apparently dead in the yard, and on moving her, after identifying some of his property, the prisoner was sent to Cambridge for trial. The prisoner resides in that town.

THREE WEEKS AFTER MARRIAGE.—At SOUTHWARK Office on Tuesday, John Tassner, a youth, apprentice to a woolstapler in Bermondsey, was brought before Mr. Cottingham, charged with assaulting and general ill-treatment of his wife Letitia, to whom he had been married only three weeks. The case was a second charge preferred against the defendant of absenting himself from his apprenticeship. It appeared that the defendant had absented himself from his work some days since, and his master having gone at the office on Monday, and after identifying some of his property, the prisoner was sent to Cambridge for trial. The prisoner resides in that town.

ROBBING LORD BURGHLEY'S ROOMS AT CAMBRIDGE.—Last week we stated that Edward Stebery, a fashionably-dressed young man, had been examined at SOUTHWARK Office, charged with breaking into chambers occupied by Lord Burghley, St. John's College, Cambridge, and stealing upwards of £50 worth of property, consisting of diamond shirt studs, pins, and brooches, the property of his Lordship. Lord Burghley appeared at the office on Monday, and after identifying some of his property, the prisoner was sent to Cambridge for trial. The prisoner resides in that town.

TRACTS FOR THE TRAINS.

BY ALBERT SMITH.

No. I.—ADDRESS.

PEN the Safety Valve! Our brains are overcharged with vapours, which we wish to get rid of for our readers' amusement. We have a high-pressure anxiety to inform him of our intentions with respect to these "Tracts;" and we challenge him, in all amity, to crack a joke with us. Here lies our gage—but, whether it be a broad or a narrow one, he must determine.

And yet a commencement is a terribly nervous piece of business; it is like the first plunge for the summer in a cold bath. Stout men even quail at it, and invent absurd delays; put in their feet only, and wait for others to go in first, on whose gasping "B—b—b—b—beautiful!" in reply to a query concerning the temperature of the water, they place great reliance. Little boys shiver on the bank, more from fear than cold, and hug their knees, until hard-hearted companions insidiously kick them in. That is just our present position. We have trembled a long time; but the information of the printer's devil that the press is waiting makes us plunge at once, whether we like it or no. Ugh! here goes!

How shall we strike off first? There are several ways of doing so. "In an age like the present, &c.," is good as an opening phrase; so is, "Perhaps, at no period has the desired, &c.;" and so also is "The increasing demand for literature adapted, &c." All will do: we will take the last. The increasing demand, then, for literature adapted to particular classes renders it a matter of some surprise that none has appeared expressly devoted to railway travellers. Bradshaw's Guide is the only book we know of; and this, although a most valuable work in its place, cannot be said to be an amusing one when steadily read through from beginning to end, for it wants plot; its incidents are unconnected; there is no sustaining interest in its pages, and one too closely resembles the other. There are the advertisements, to be sure, some of which are illustrated, and in these the study of character and knowledge of the human heart is comprised. But even powerfully and poetically as some of them are written, their continuous perusal wearies. It is as unsatisfactory as reading a jest-book right through. We tried to do so once, but the attempt was a failure. It was a little book called "Laugh and grow fat," and it had a picture of a stout man in top-boots throwing a company into screaming convulsions of delight by the supposed reading. We began with avidity, and went on to the last joke—we never felt so depressed. But this, by the way.

Railway travelling requires something to beguile the time, in spite of its velocity. For, if you get in the middle seats, you only see your vis-a-vis; and, if you get by the windows, two-thirds of your journey passes in a cutting. And the very speed requires a new style of literature. People on coaches formerly took novels and newspapers. Now, such reading is preposterous; you get to the terminus before you can arrive at the end of either a chapter or leader. Or, if that does not happen, you get to a tunnel; and you might as well try the poetical impossibility of reading "by the glow-worm's light," as endeavour to see anything by the glimmer of the illuminated finger-glass, in the roof of the carriage.

We come forward to supply this void—everybody who launches a new work always does. The literature of our "Tracts for the Trains" shall be so light, that it will in itself brighten the tunnels: so short that nothing shall break its continuity. We propose to publish a tract every week: and as it is the custom to give away wonderful presents with newspapers, we shall present a copy to our readers. That is to say, following the generosity of the showman of the country fair, who says, "Now, ma'am, put sixpence into my hand, and you shall see the show for nothing:" to the great delight of the old lady addressed, we offer a "Tract"—gratuitously, to all investing a like sum in the purchase of our Journal. Remember, we have several thousands of sterling jokes to be given away!

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

An ingenious musician, who goes up and down daily, between London and a country station, proposes to establish another class on the line, besides the first and second—that for learning the cornet-à-piston, which popular instrument produces great ill-feeling between lodgers when taught indoors; indeed, to indulge in the worst pun we ever recognised, a cornet may be succeeded by a left-tenant.

NOVEL USE OF THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.

The medium of tuition will be the wires of the electro-telegraph. On these, being five, notes will be fastened by non-conducting materials: and the pupils will play them as they travel. The andante movements will be placed close to the stations, where progress is slow; and the tunes will be so arranged as to finish at all the stoppages. These will be constantly changed, to extend the benefit to all classes; for instance, galoppes will be chosen for the Express Trains; sets of quadrilles for the stopping ones; and marches, or dirges, for the luggage-class. At the same time, the passengers generally will be diverted with agreeable harmony. The invention is registered.

CHARADE THE FIRST.

(To be answered in our next.)

Mr. Fitz Montague lives in May Fair,
And people declare
His things are so rare
They cannot conceive how the deuce they got there,
His pockets were always considered so bare.
But there they all are, there's no doubt about that,
From the or molu lamp to the white lama mat.
There are porcelain vases, and wonderful clocks,
And Pompeii bronzes, and old Roman crocks;
And "warranted" paintings, by every old master,
And Towers of Pisa in white alabaster,
And carvings, and closets, and escritoires old,
And china from Sevres, all flowers and gold,
And glasses from Venice, that flew into bits,
And frightened the poisoners out of their wits,
By shewing the presence of arsenic grits:
(So some folks receive it
But I don't believe it,
Nor, you, so I hope, if you're still in your wits.)
Indeed his whole house may be properly stated
To be Essence of Wardour-street much concentrated.
How did he get all his wonderful things?
Silk velvet dressing-gowns, shirt-studs and rings.
Never for cash to the Bank he had been
Never his name on a railway was seen.

FIRST VIEW OF LONDON.

Still he was plausible, highly connected;
Had certain relatives, widely respected;
They might have paid: but his treasures, if not,
Only by means of my first could be got.

There's an ancient public school,
Little famed for dunce or fool;
Whence, some time, a valiant wight
Stole its flogging-block one night.
There's a poet, every day
Winning, more and more, his way;
Painting, with a genius strange,
"Lockaby Hall" or "Moated Grange;"
Though the Timon christen'd "New"
Vows that nothing he can do.
Now the two initials take,
And my second they will make.
A Latin word stands forth to you,
Perchance the first you ever knew.

There's tumult at the terminus: the train's about to start;
And omnibuses, cabs, and vans, arrive from every part;
And, on the platform, up and down, the luggage-barrows rumble,
And, in the locomotives' tubes, the steam begins to grumble;
Or, puffing from the chimney, falls condens'd like misty rain;
And guards pull open lockers, and then bang them to again.
At last, the word is given, and the engine goes along,
And to the welkin, fields, and hills, pours forth its shrieking song.

A RIVER PHENOMENON.

The passengers soon settle down; some talk, some silent keep;
And some get out, and some come in, and others go to sleep:
But woe betide the luckless one, who, getting to the goal,
Finds out, to his confusion, that he hasn't got MY WHOLE.

LAYS OF THE LINE.—No. I.

THE PASSENGER TO HIS CARPET-BAG.

One struggle more, and thou art free.
Ho, guards! undo the door.
Our carriage is the last of all,
And crowds leap out before.
There's but one buss—on, on, they press;
Come, come, we must not lag;
Squeeze through the door—the struggle's o'er,
My own—my carpet-bag!

My carpet-bag—my beautiful!
The box-seat we have won;
Twelve stalwart forms to gain it strove,
But we have not been done.
From underneath the hindmost seat
This arm thy form did drag,
And bore thee bravely to the buss,
My own—my carpet-bag!

Let others of portmanteaus boast,
And hair-trunks leather'd o'er,
They but enrage the struggling host,
By blocking up the door.
I better love thy yielding form,
Which ne'er too full was known,
With thee again the buss I'll storm,
My carpet-bag—my own.

IMPRESSIONS OF TRAVEL,

Formed during a ten minutes' journey through London, by a stranger arriving by the Blackwall, and departing directly by the Dover Line.

The principal productions of London are chimney-pots and third-pair-back bed-rooms.

The approach to this great city is not imposing. For some time ships and houses are so confused that the Indiamen seem to have got into the gardens, behind the dwellings, during one of the high tides we read of, and there left. I witnessed a similar phenomenon from the river, before I landed, where, at times, I appeared to see large steamers going along the fields. This optical delusion, so a gentleman told me, was owing to the windings of the river.

The poorer inhabitants of London all live underground, so that the roofs of their houses barely reach to the level of the rail; and you see traffic in subterranean streets, far below you. Hence, these are generally called low neighbourhoods, and are frequently flooded by the high tides. These do some damage, which is usually covered by the quantity of eels and flounders left in the beds upon the falling of the waters. The loss of life is small, as the beds are all waterproof; and warming is generally given by the nose of the sleeper grating against the ceiling as he is floated up. I am told that many inhabitants of the more patrician districts find the difficulty of keeping their heads above water, far greater than in these poor ones. I had an opportunity, at Blackwall, of seeing whitebait. It is a curious delicacy, made of light paste pinched into the form of a fish, and fried in lard. Sometimes minnows are added in small proportions. Its chief use is to provoke the eating of brown bread and butter, and drinking of punch.

GRAND CONTEST OF THE OMNIBUS AGAINST ALL ENGLAND.

RAILWAY COMMITTEES.

ASSEMBLAGE OF THE GROUPS.

The substantial Railway Committee business of the Session was commenced on Monday, the Committees or Railway Groups having then assembled.

The appearances of the avenues leading to the Committee Rooms was varied by the presence of numerous barristers, with their gowns, wigs, and briefs, hurrying to and fro; and the wretchedly small Committee Rooms proved quite inadequate to accommodate the crowds that were striving to squeeze into them. Of the three groups, one consists of eight competing railways in Kent; another of the railways through Sussex and Kent; and the third of railways for the south-western district of Scotland.

The most important classification of lines is comprised in the Kentish and South-Eastern Group, where the contest is to be renewed between the South-Eastern and North Kent. In this Group, the preamble of the bill of the Brighton, Lewes, and Hastings Deviations, and Eastbourne, &c., Branches Railway, was declared to have been proved.

In Group 14, Mr. Daniel O'Connell presided as chairman; for, though exempt, as an "aged member," from serving on committees, he had no wish to accept that privilege of age. His appearance when presiding was generally very sedate, and his actions and words remarkably deliberate; nor could an ordinary observer be able to discover in the person of the grave, aged-looking man before him, the burly agitator of the Dublin Corn Exchange and of the Covent-Garden Anti-Corn-law League.

On Tuesday, two of the Committees on Railway Groups were accommodated in the Chancery Courts, and the business proceeded with more comfort. In the North Kent Railway not much progress was made, beyond stating the case and the examination of a few witnesses, and a considerable time was wasted by their examination and cross-examination on points that had been stated by the Committee not to be material. In the Group over which Mr. O'Connell presides (15), there was much more progress made, and the preamble of the South Eastern (Tunbridge Wells to Hastings and Rye) was declared to be proved. A similar decision was given in regard to the Brighton and Chichester Railway (Steyning branch).

It being St. Patrick's Day, Mr. O'Connell appeared with an immense bunch of shamrock, resembling a good-sized cabbage, in his hat, with which he sat in the Court all day, looking most grotesque. The hon. and learned Chairman, in a very quiet way, decided very promptly against some of the propositions of counsel, at which the latter expressed themselves much dissatisfied, and one of them (Mr. Hill) spoke in a manner not over respectful to the tribunal he addressed.

In Group IX. (Glasgow District) the Committee decided that "The preamble, so far as those portions of the scheme went, which propose to make the deviation from the original line, and the branch to Queensferry, was duly proved, but that that part of the preamble relating to the branch from the main line to Port Dundas was not proved."

The chief object of interest on Wednesday, among the Railway groups, was Group 14, the North Kent Railway, and the opposition to it on the part of the South Eastern Railway Company. The whole of the day was occupied in the examination and cross-examination of Mr. Vignoles, the engineer. One of the main points of contention between the two Companies is, which first projected the line through Canterbury to Dover.

On Thursday, in Group 16, the preamble of the London and Brighton (Kent Grinstead) Branch Bill was declared proved, and the several clauses of the bill were then read and passed.—The Committee adjourned till Monday.

MAGISTERIAL CHANGES.—Mr. G. P. Elliott, of the Western Circuit, has been appointed to succeed Mr. Henry, at the Lambeth Police-court, on the promotion of the latter to Bow-street, vice Mr. Twyford. We understand that Mr. Grove, of the Greenwich Police-court, has tendered his resignation.

WHAT WILL THE LORDS DO?—The Chronicle contains the following intimation of the probable course of the Houses of Lords in regard to the Corn-laws:—"We rejoice that recent circumstances strongly confirm the belief which we have, on various occasions, more or less confidently expressed, that the House of Lords will adopt that course which patriotism and prudence alike recommend—the course indicated at once by an enlarged view of national policy, and by that deference to an unequivocally declared public opinion which is an essential element of all rational and practical Conservatism. It is with much satisfaction that we have learned, that a meeting of Peers favourable to Protectionist principles, held a few days ago, for the purpose of organising a Parliamentary opposition to the Ministerial measure, was so thinly attended—twenty-five was, we believe, the outside number of noble Lords present—that it was judged advisable to separate without coming to any definite resolution. The obvious inference is, that, whatever may have been, or may yet be, the predilections of a considerable portion of the aristocracy in favour of agriculture Protectionist Cabinet."

IMPORTERS OF CORN.—It appears from a return, on Saturday, issued by the order of the House of Commons, that, on the 12th of February, 1846, there were 617 importers of foreign grain, then in bond, in Great Britain and Ireland. The same return gives the quantities imported by each individual. The totals are as follow:—Wheat, 1,117,971 quarters, 6 bushels: barley, 8912 quarters: oats, 88,327 quarters: peas, 4805 quarters: beans, 9455 quarters: Indian corn, 13,748 quarters, wheaten flour, 703,961 quarters: and oatmeal, 666 quarters.

THE CONVICT WICKS.—We understand that no facts sufficiently favourable to the cause of the convict (now under sentence of death in Newgate, for the murder of Mr. Bostock, in Drury-lane) have transpired, which could induce the proper authorities to recommend the Crown to remit the capital punishment, and, therefore, if nothing intervene within the next fortnight, the wretched youth will undergo the last sentence of the law on Monday, the 30th instant.

FIRE AT A COTTON FACTORY AT LEICESTER.—A fire broke out on Saturday night at the extensive factory belonging to Messrs Harris and Hemel, cotton and India-rubber web manufacturers, Leicester. In the course of a few minutes the fire obtained such an ascendancy that the flames burst out in a large body from the different windows, and shortly afterwards extended to the second, third, and fourth storeys of the building, each of which contained a large quantity of cotton in a raw state, bobbins and spindles for winding, webbing, &c. In one room there were several bales of goods, packed ready for exportation, to the value of £3000, but by the exertions of the police, firemen, and others, a great portion of them, as well as the stock, was saved; nevertheless, from the combustible nature of the articles, the flames spread so rapidly that the whole of the building, exceeding to a frontage of between 300 and 400 feet, was completely gutted. The damage is estimated at a rough calculation at between £4000 and £5000. The property is insured to the amount of £10,000; but still from the stoppage of the works, and the consequent inability of the firm to complete a number of orders they have on hand, they will be very severe losers.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 204.—Vol. VIII.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, MARCH 28, 1846. [Sixpence.

THE STATE OF IRELAND.

Those nations are the happiest, says the sage Knickerbocker, which make the least figure in history, and give to its pages neither "brilliant" chapters, nor "calamitous" periods, nor any of those events in which the interest of history is said to consist. And thus the countries we hear least about at the present time, are those where the people are most prosperous. What nation has been more comfortable and contented than Holland since what may be called her greatness in history ceased? What people could be more miserable than when they were furnishing "interest" to the period of the bloody-minded Alba and his tyrannical master? One of their own canals flows not more peacefully now than the course of their present history; and the "fat weed" of Lethe's wharf is not a better type of comfortable, though perhaps inglorious ease, than a well-fed citizen of the Seven United Provinces. From how many other lands goes up a voice of perpetual lament, the expression of unrest and suffering? Poland is one of them; she is a fountain of bitter waters, closely sealed and kept down by the stamp of military power, yet ever and anon bursting out with dangerous effervescence; and there is another nation sadly prominent in the rank of kingdoms, nearer to ourselves, and for whose condition we are deeply responsible: Ireland is one wide stream of discontent, dark and turbid, perpetually flowing, and deepening the longer it runs. The space it occupies in the debates of Parliament is an unhealthy symptom; like a prominent place in history, it is purchased by great suffering and calamity; we wish the inevitable discussions which are forced on the Legislature were more likely to be fruitful of result.

Earl Grey brought forward the State of Ireland, on Monday evening, in the House of Lords; but, except that he expounded the evils that afflict it in stronger language and with freer views than those usually urged in that placid and exalted atmosphere, little or no advantage has been gained by it. And, even in reading the able speech of Earl Grey himself, we are driven to lament the tardy wisdom of statesmen; they seem, indeed, to be "slowly wise." They never possess the will to do good and the power of effecting it at the same time. There is not an element in the present social condition of Ireland that was not equally in operation when the noble Earl was one of its rulers; but it is not till all power has ceased, that the wish and will to do good is acquired. The political wisdom that should inspire the policy of a Government is reserved till it can serve as a weapon against political rivals; the miserable condition of Ireland is mounted as a cheval de bataille, and ridden with great effect against the ranks of the Conservative Government; but it was quietly stabled when the Whigs were in Downing-street. All that they urge upon the Peel Ministry was then urged by others upon them, but no heed was taken of the warnings. Office seems to paralyse effort, and the knowledge of evils is not accompanied by any bold or effectual attempt to redress them. "Coercion and money," Earl Grey complains, are the only remedies that have yet been tried in Ireland. Did the Whigs ever suggest any other? And of these they applied the first much more unsparingly than the last. We think it high time that this bandying of charges between the two great political parties should cease; they have each neglected their duty grievously. The question is getting beyond them both; and, if not attended to better than it has been hitherto, will, as many other neglected questions have done, settle itself.

In the present state of things, an immediate danger must be provided against. Famine and fever are the two active enemies that must be met at all hazards: like a breach in the walls of a besieged town, our strength must be concentrated there till the danger is lessened or has gone by. But there still remain to be settled the far wider questions of the internal government and regulation of the town itself, which is so estranged and disaffected as to be kept to its allegiance by little save the presence of a strong garrison.

It is acknowledged by a Minister of the Crown that our rule in Ireland is a military occupation rather than a civil government. After six or seven centuries of dominion, a greater condemnation of our policy could not be pronounced by our most violent enemies.

Measures have been taken to meet the evil, which, it is to be fervently hoped, is only temporary. The Government has done much—more, indeed, than most previous Governments have ventured to do. But of permanent measures we see none. By some extraordinary perversity, for which it is impossible to account, no measure for Ireland is made complete and efficient. The Poor-law there, instead of, as in England, giving the destitute man a claim upon the land for support, is altogether inoperative. No relief whatever is permitted out of the workhouses, though it is well known that to build enough of them to give the necessary relief in, would be utterly impossible. Thus, at the very time a Poor-law is most necessary, it is a dead letter, and a parcel of Fever Bills and temporary acts are required to supply the deficiency.

The amount of Poor-rate, and the allowances given in relief in Ireland, are perfectly absurd: there is all the parade of a law; all the machinery of an enactment and none of its advantages. Even the Bill under which the Grand Juries are empowered to raise money to be spent in employing the poor at the present moment, throws all the burden on the occupiers of the land, already overburdened, while the owners of the soil, who exact and receive rents higher than in any part of Europe, go untouched. The Irish landlords escape all imposts: all is thrown on the occupier. The Government "hopes" they will come forward liberally at such a time; but it is a crisis that requires certainties, not hopes—why not compel them? There is a very general impression abroad that the money England has sent over to Ireland in former famines, has, by some means or other, found its way into the pockets of the landlords. There is as general a fear that the same thing may occur again. In the present enactments, the rates for expenses are all paid by the occupiers; the rents of land are such as no man would dare ask in England: where the most barbarous system of cultivation prevails, rents are higher than in the most favoured counties of England. The Marquis of Westmeath doubts if so much as £18 per acre is received for land let on "conacre;" but, on the other hand, he admits £12 and £13 per acre, where there is no crop but the worst kind of potatoes! Does any country in Europe present such an anomaly? Yet there is no Income-tax, no Absentee-tax, no Poor-rate, no contribution insisted upon from the receivers of such rents, for meeting famine and disease; the English Treasury and the poor occupier must do it all. In dealing with Ireland the English standard of justice and fair play seems always lost sight of; hence the countless anomalies that Ireland presents.

The debate, independently of the speech of Earl Grey, which imported into the House of Lords opinions that have been entertained by large numbers without it for many years, presented some curious points; the most curious, perhaps, is the display of Lord Brougham's peculiar Liberalism, as extraordinary in its way as the Duke of Newcastle's Toryism; both are of an antique and decaying school. Lord Brougham says all attempts to deal with the evils of Ireland are "impossible;" the Church cannot be disturbed; the rights of private property are sacred, and Coercion Bills are necessary to make the people respect them. The only remedy he can suggest is that England should pay the Catholic priests! He is equally unhappy in what he proposes to do and in what he says cannot be done; we do not believe that England will ever consent to the payment of the Catholic Church, and we do not believe that the rights of property are so sacred as not to be interfered with when they are converted into a public injury. Certainly we show grievous disregard of these "sacred rights" in England; at the present moment, Parliament is daily taking from individuals all control over the disposal of their own lands and tenements, and compelling them to be sold, however reluctantly, for public purposes, the owner having no voice in the matter. In London a man cannot build a stable or a coach-house without the law controlling him, and through a district surveyor saying it shall be done this way and that, and no otherwise. The law of England does not recognise this total exemption of property from all interference; the law in a thousand ways checks the "doing as we like with our own," and wisely too, or the power of property would become, as it has become in Ireland, an oppression. And most strange it is to hear this doctrine of the total exemption of property from control, asserted by a man who has presided over the great Court of Equity of the kingdom, and must, officially, have ordered masses of property to be dealt with according to the rules of the law he administered, totally regardless of the interests of individuals. Can he not recognise some kindred power in that body—the Legislature—which should regulate the equity of nations?

The Land Tenure in Ireland must be interfered with; amendment is not confiscation, and a change in the system would benefit both landlord and tenant. The Irish landlords are exactly what bad laws have made them; what they have had the power to do, that they have done. They are the sole possessors of the means of life to the people, and, in the universal struggle to obtain it, they receive a competition price far above the intrinsic value. If we suppose the captain of a ship becalmed in the tropics, seizing the whole stock of water on board, and selling it to the passengers at double the price of wine, we see a principle at work fully understood by the middle-men of Ireland; and the law abets him, by giving him powers of ejecting and distraining unknown in England. It is not a mere preference of an agricultural life that makes the Irish peasant cling to his acre of ground so fiercely; it is the grasp of the wrecked seaman on the plank that stands between him and death. Nearly all the crime of Ireland is agrarian; the assassinations, against which the Coercion Bill is directed, are all to be traced to the land and its holdings. The law gives no remedy to the peasant, and he takes one himself; it would be the same in England in similar circumstances; have we not seen agricultural labourers dancing and shouting with horrid glee round burning ricks, and refusing all aid to quench the flames? In Ireland, we see Catholic and Protestant, Repealer and Orangeman, Landlord and Peasant, falling alike under the sentence of that terrible code which has grown up in the absence of legislative "interference with property." It is not a war of sects and castes: it is that total recklessness of others' sufferings, that desperate and frightful selfishness, which are exhibited in all times of overwhelming peril. In the Black Hole of Calcutta, men and officers crushed each other down to get at the pool in the struggle for air; in shipwrecks, men have torn each other to pieces for a footing on the raft. At such times, the nature of man is changed, and he becomes as ferocious as a beast. And it is when such passions are aroused, and are covering a land with murders, that what is called a great man, a leader, a statesman, is found saying that property cannot be controlled; that there are evils for which remedy is impossible! We have conquered the empire of the Moguls; we have colonised half the world; we cover the whole of it with our fabrics; we have made the elements our vassals; and we cannot establish peace and contentment within our own bounds, or correct the errors of past legislation in the matters of leases and tenures! What a satire has Lord Brougham pronounced on the wisdom and power of those to whom the destinies of England are entrusted! It is a dangerous creed, that of inaction; it is only the wise man who sees the "Lion in the path," to determined men, in perilous times, with honest purposes, there are no "impossibilities."

SIR HUGH GOUGH.

Sir Hugh Gough, Commander-in-Chief of the Army in India, is the fourth son of George Gough, Esq., of Woodstown, in the county of Limerick. He entered the Army in 1794, and after serving in the south of Ireland, was present at the campaign of the West Indies and the Brigand War, obtained his majority in the 87th (Irish) Regiment, which he commanded at Talavera, Barossa, Vittoria, Nivelle, and Tarifa; for his services in these actions he had an honourable augmentation of his arms granted him.

He became Major-General in 1830; and, in 1837, proceeded to India in command of a division of the Indian Army; from thence he was ordered to China to take the command of the British troops during the hostilities with that empire; this post he held in the attack of Canton, and during the whole series of operations, which concluded with the signing the treaty; for these services he received his Baronetcy, and the thanks of both houses of Parliament. He has, since that period, been made Commander-in-Chief of the Indian Army, and has conducted the whole of the difficult operations on the Sutlej (the details of which are given in the recent official despatches; he has again received the thanks of Parliament for his distinguished services.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Wednesday.

Fashion rules every where in Paris—a thought of diversion mixes with everything the most serious—and nothing succeeds unless fashion be its tutelary deity. The ladies of the highest fashion the merveilleuses, the incroyables, les femmes—have been of late days so eagerly flocking to St. Roch, and to the Pelian discussion in the Chamber of Peers, as at the new comedy of M. Empis, or at the Floral Ball of the Duchess de Cazes. The conférences and sermons of the Abbé Lacordaire and Ravignan are attended by a crowd of belles in the most elegant of costumes: a certain modification being made, however, in allusion to the circumstances, from the casaka mantle of finest cassimere and the garland of marjordons, and the pleureuses on the bonnet, to the magnificently embroidered handkerchiefs—the supposed lachrymatories of the fair Magdalens of fashion. At the discussion on the Polish question in the Chamber of Peers the crowd was immense, and the struggles of the ladies for places incessant. All the fair Parisians of note were there, from Mdlle. Rachel, the tragic muse of France, in the Privileged Box, to the noble Duchess of [illegible]mart, and her fair relatives, helplessly rolling in the crowd on the stairs. [illegible]rain de peuple literateurs of France, had already shown in his splendid speech, that his mental aberration only regris in hours of exhaustion; but this day, Victor Hugo, the Duke d'Harcourt and the Count de Montalembert, the first representing the genius of fraternity, the next the secular church, the latter the Jesuitic principle pervading all ranks of society—each in his turn advocated the cause of Poland, as being that of France. All the orators distinguished themselves on this occasion, except Victor Hugo, who forgot several important and connecting parts of his speech; but "ce qui est remis n'est pas perdu," says the French proverb, and nothing was lost, for they resumed their place when his oration found its way into the official journal, the Moniteur, the following day

As I descended from the spectator's tome I heard a eccentric Lord say to a Member of the Chamber of Deputies, "The last of the Polish [illegible]ors is dead," and, like the money subscribed, are only destined to the burial of the dead."

One of the most agreeable balls of the season was that just given at the Luxembourg, by the Duchess de Cazes. The occasion was not merely due to the courtesy of the fair hostess. An association of ladies has been formed in Paris for encouragement of the cultivation of the Camelia. The Duchess is President; the Baroness de Mackau, wife of the Minister of the Navy, Secretary; the Committee consisting of the Marchioness de Bourne, the Countesses de Castellane, de Rumbuteau, the Baronesses de Rothschild, de Jacqueminot, &c. The exhibition for prizes took place in the Duchess' grand apartments, at the Palace of the Luxembourg. How the seamless, cold-loving plants liked the heated impure atmosphere, how far the emulous proprietors were pleased, I cannot tell; but the diplomacy of the Duchess in turning them into ball-room ornaments, was most triumphant—all Paris was there, from the highest dignitary of the land to the humblest pretender to a pictorial or musical name.

FRANCE

The Paris papers are void of domestic news of interest, but they seem to attach some importance to a division in the Chamber of Deputies on Tuesday, in which the Ministers had a narrow escape of being outvoted on the amendment moved to General Jacqueminot's proposition for increasing the number of officers in the Paris National Guards.

Algiers Journals to the 18th had been received at Paris. The following is from the Akhbar of the 17th:—"Just as we were going to press, we learnt that General Yusuf has made himself master of the camp of Abd-el-Kader, near Boussada. The Emir fled with a few ragmans, but before he retired he had given orders for the massacre of two French prisoners, M. Lacroze, the Chargé d'Affaires for the Arabs, at Tanet, and M. Courby, the interpreter, taken in the affair of Sidi-Brahim. This barbarous order was on the point of being executed, when our troops came up and prevented it. General Yusuf took the tents, cattle, &c., abandoned by the Emir in his flight." The Duke d'Aumale and the Prince of Saxe-Coburg arrived at Algiers on the evening of the 17th. Their arrival had just been preceded by the return of Marshal Bugeaud, whom they visited immediately after landing. A violent storm had been raging on the coast, and in some parts of the interior of Algeria, for two days, when these accounts left.

Madame de Salvandy, mother of the Minister of Public Instruction, died on Monday at Paris, after a long and painful illness.

We find by the Paris papers that the bill for granting to the secret police services an additional sum of 1,000,000 francs, has passed the Chamber of Peers, by the majority of 109 to 2.

A sad accident happened on the Paris and Rouen Railway on Saturday last. A special train, which left Paris with the Government Commissioners sent to inspect the fortifications at Havre, ran against a diligence mounted on a truck, which, contrary to orders, was carelessly left on the rails. The effect of the collision was the immediate destruction of the diligence.

The special train by which the collision was caused was not intended to stop at the station of Bonnières, and every precaution had been ordered on the previous day to prevent accident. On emerging out of the small, covered station immediately preceding the station the red signal was seen, and the breaks were put on, and the train came up to the station at a diminished speed. The Rouen train, which left Rouen at six o'clock, was then in sight, and they were about to pass on it a diligence, which was upon the down line at the entrance of it. Switch that was to remove it to the tail of the up train. The motion of the down train was almost stopped when the buffers of the engine struck those of the truck on which the diligence had been placed, and overturned it. In the coupé [illegible]ce were two gentlemen and a lady, all of whom were thrown out. [illegible]mmanded was killed, and the other and the lady had their legs broken by the Rouen train, which came up at the moment at a rapid pace, and [illegible]ved only a few minutes. Two persons were also injured seriously by the same train: one while picking up his hat had both his hands and legs crushed. The cries uttered by the sufferers being heard, the special train stopped, and the deputies who were in it ran to their assistance, and did all in their power to relieve them. Thirteen other passengers more or less seriously wounded.

BELGIUM

We find by the latest Brussels papers that the Ministerial crisis is at length at an end. The following is the list of the Ministry formed by M. Rogier, all the members of which are of liberal opinions:

M. Rogier, Minister of the Interior.
M. De Brouckere, Foreign Affairs.
M. De Haveay, Justice.
M. Delfosse, Finance.
M. D'Hoffschmidt, Public Works; and
M. Chazal, War Department.

SPAIN.

The Journal des Débats has received an express from Madrid announcing the formation of the new Ministry. General Narvaez, Duke of Valencia, is appointed President of the Council and Minister of War. The Madrid Gazette, of a subsequent date, has reached us. It officially states that M. Xavier Burgos is Minister of the Interior; M. Egaña, Minister of Justice; M. Orlando, Minister of Finances; and General Pezuela, Minister of Marine. It was believed that either M. Gonzalez Bravo, or the Marquis de Pidal, Intendant of Madrid (Duke de Soto Mayor) would be appointed Minister of Foreign Affairs. A very extraordinary scene was witnessed in the Chamber of Deputies on the 16th inst. After the approval of the acts of the previous sitting, some un important notes were read, and the Minister of Grace and Justice announced that the Queen had sanctioned the new electoral law, which was received with marks of satisfaction. Senor Zozaya, deputy for Alava, then stated that he wished to ask a question. The President asked on what subject, and he was answered that it was regarding himself. Though unusual, the President, from a feeling of delicacy, allowed Senor Zozaya to proceed upon which, after reading several articles of the Constitution, and complaining of the Chamber having been called together without the order of the day having been previously fixed, he said that he had risen with the object of protesting against the acts of this day, as being totally illegal, but an attack on a prerogative of the Crown. This gave rise to a scene of uproar and confusion quite unparalleled among the deputies. General Pezuela, inspector of cavalry, and brother of the Marquis de Viluma, having, from his elevated seat, demanded to be allowed to speak, which the President refused until it came to his turn, he went into the centre of the Chamber, in front of the President, loudly protesting against the sitting, which, he said, attacked the prerogatives of the Crown, and usurped its rights, on which account he would leave the Congress. Loud cries of "Out, out," from the deputies here followed, and Senor Pezuela proceeded towards the door. The President, who had by this time commanded, and several orators had been heard, the proposition was approved by 111 white balls against 41 black.

San Gonzales Romero then called upon the Government to inform the Chamber, as far as their position would allow, what was the present state of the Ministerial crisis so much talked of recently. The Marquis de Mafiores observed that the Queen had given no direct or indirect indication of want of confidence in the Cabinet

The Chamber of Deputies met on the 17th, and a considerable crowd again gathered in the hall, in expectation of another tumultuous scene; but the President adjourned the sitting, which had scarcely commenced, on receiving a note from the Marquis de Miraflores to the effect that a new Cabinet was formed, and another from General Narvaez, ordering, in the Queen's name, the sitting to be suspended

Accounts have been received, stating that the state of the Ministerial crisis so much talked of recently. The Marquis de Mirafl in which revenue to the extent of £400,000 per annum was actually sacrificed, and in which a much larger amount was risked.

Mr CHILDERS supported the second reading

The debate was adjourned. The House sat till a quarter to one o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

THE ROYAL ASSENT.

The Royal Assent was given, by commission, to the Fever (Ireland) Bill, and the Metropolis Building Act Amendment Bill.

The Print Works Bill was read a third time and passed; and, after the presentation of some petitions, the House adjourned till Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS TUESDAY.

ART-UNIONS. Mr. WYSE obtained leave to bring in a bill to legalise Art-Unions

IRISH RELIEF BILL.—Mr. P. SCROPE obtained leave to bring in a bill for the better protection of life in Ireland, by means of the better relief of the destitute poor therein

POSTPONEMENT OF BILLS Sir J. GRAHAM postponed, till after Easter, the Friendly Societies Bill, and intimated that Mr. Fielden would likewise postpone the Factories Bill.

THE ADJOURNED DEBATE ON THE CORN IMPORTATION BILL.

The adjourned debate on the second reading of the Corn Importation Bill was resumed by Lord FORDINGTON, who reached up opposed it. He distrusted the measure. He had deep apprehension and doubts as to the means by which it had been promoted, and no political prejudices, no deference to any men, would induce him to support it.

Mr. PLUMPTRE likewise opposed the bill, from the firm conviction that, if carried, it would inevitably produce the degradation and ruin of the working population, and the impoverishment of the empire at large.

Mr. HAWES spoke in favour of the bill.

Sir J. TROLLOPE contended that the opinion of the country was in favour of Protection, and he asserted that, while other countries were eager enough to take advantage of our free imports, they gave no indication of following our example.

Sir J. HANMER spoke in support of the measure

Lord HARDINGE expressed his regret that the Government had thought fit to postpone for three years the complete development of the measure before the House. Referring to the subject of agricultural compensation, he enumerated the heavy means of transfer as one of the chief burdens upon landed property a burden which Government, by simplifying tenure, might remove. The present measure ought to have been accompanied by such an alteration.

Mr HARRISON wished to know from the other countries were eager enough to take advantage of our free imports, they gave no indication of following our example.

Lord HARDINGE expressed his regret that the Government had thought fit to postpone for three years the complete development of the measure before the House. Referring to the subject of agricultural compensation, he enumerated the heavy means of transfer as one of the chief burdens upon landed property a burden which Government, by simplifying tenure, might remove. The present measure ought to have been accompanied by such an alteration.

Mr HARRISON wished to know from the other countries were eager enough to take advantage of our free imports, they gave no indication of following our example. He saw the right hon. Baronet (the Secretary of State for the Home Department) smile, but the right hon. Baronet should not smile during the discussion of a great question (Laughter.) Gentlemen opposite might smile, but he was not to be put down by the smiles of the hon. member for Stockport and all the crew behind him. (Laughter, and cries of "Order.") The right hon. Baronet at the head of the Government, was now the leader of that party, but he (Mr. Rashleigh) would read the sentiments expressed by that right hon. gentleman so late as 1844. The hon. member proceeded to read an extract from a speech delivered by Sir R. Peel in 1844, deprecating the removal of protection, and predicting the ruin of the agriculturists from the change then proposed in the Corn-laws. Such were the opinions expressed by the right hon. Baronet in 1844, and the House had a right to know what had caused his tergiversation. What was it that had caused such a change? Formerly, the motion of the hon. member for Wolverhampton was met with silent contempt, and defeated with large majorities. In his opinion, that was the constitutional way to beat such motions. (Laughter.) The hon. member for Bolton also smiled, but let him take care this was no smiling question. (Loud laughter.) The sooner the hon. member got up that peculiar grimace, the better for himself. (Loud laughter.) The right hon. Baronet had spoken of the prosperity of the manufacturing districts; but it should be recollected that there was no truck system there, and that they had thriven under Protection. He had that day received a letter from a gentleman employing 3000 persons, who apprehended the greatest danger from the right hon. Baronet's measures.

Mr F. T. BARING promised his best and most cordial support to the measures proposed by Sir R. Peel. The right hon. gentleman complimented the Protection party for the spirit, the intelligence, and the ability with which they had fought their battle, when thrown upon their own resources, under very disadvantageous circumstances, but he thought that as they undertook to form a new party, they were bound to make known their schemes of legislation, and make a declaration of their principles.

Mr SHAW carried the attention of the House to the Irish element of the question He intimated his continued favorability in the remarks which had reached Government of the failure of the potato crop in Ireland, reading a variety of letters to confirm his statement of the cheapness of potatoes in various districts of the country

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER reiterated his apprehensions of famine and disease, and said that every successive account from Ireland became more alarming. He accounted for the present prices of potatoes in Ireland by supposing that those who were about to emigrate in consequence of their potatoes rushed to the markets, and sold them for what they could get.

The Earl of MARCH made a speech in favour of Protection.

The debate was then adjourned till Thursday.

The Mutiny Bill and the Marine Mutiny Bill were read a third time and passed.

The House adjourned at half-past twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The house met to-day at twelve o'clock.

Various petitions were presented in reference to railway bills.

Ferguson's Naturalisation Bill was read a third time and passed.

EDINBURGH AND GLASGOW RAILWAY. Lord DUNCAN moved the second reading of the Edinburgh and Glasgow and Scottish Central Railways Junction Bill.

Mr. FOX MAULE opposed the bill, and moved as an amendment that the second reading should be postponed for six weeks. A discussion ensued, in the course of which Sir G. CLERK said, as the House had agreed to the appointment of an Amalgamation Committee, it ought to suspend all bills to which amalgamation was aimed, until that committee had made its report. He therefore thought it the bill ought to be postponed. Ultimately, Mr. FOX MAULE altered his amendment to the effect that the bill in question should be suspended till the Amalgamation Committee had made their report. Some further discussion took place, and the House then divided. The numbers were—

For the second reading	.. .. ..	40
For Mr. F. Maule's amendment	.. .. ..	34
Majority for the second reading	.. ..	6

When the gallery was re-opened, another discussion ensued; but ultimately the bill was read a second time.

The second readings of the Election Notices (Ireland) Bill, of the County Elections (Ireland) Bill, and of the Factories Bill were postponed in consequence of the illness of Sir J. Graham.

The motion to go into Committee on the Turnpike Roads (Scotland) Bill was carried, on a division, by 30 to 18; but in Committee, its principal clause, relative to the sale of spirituous liquors by toll-bar keepers, was lost upon a division. The bill, consequently, may be regarded as thrown out.

On the motion of Col. WOOD, a bill to amend the laws relative to the settlement of the poor, brought in by him in 1833, was ordered to be re-printed.

Mr. W. PATTEN's Committee on the Amalgamation of Railroads was nominated as follows:—Sir George Clerk, Sir George Grey, Mr. Pakington, Mr. Evelyn Denison, Mr George Hope, Mr. Gibson Craig, and Mr. Wilson Patten.

The House adjourned at half-past four.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

THE ADJOURNMENT FOR THE HOLIDAYS.—The Duke of WELLINGTON gave notice that on Tuesday the 7th of April, he should move the adjournment of the House till the 21st of April. The Duke of RICHMOND: I should wish to know from the noble Duke, when it is probable that the Corn-bill will be proceeded with. Is it probable that it will be before the 27th? The Duke of WELLINGTON: I should not think it at all probable; it is not out of the Commons yet. Lord RICHMOND: I should suggest to the noble Duke that it is not at all probable that the bill will come up before that time. They are going on with the Coercion Bill next week

Some petitions respecting Railway Bills were then presented.

THE POOR-LAW COMMISSIONERS. Lord BROUGHAM gave notice that soon after the holidays he should call the attention of the House to the conduct of the Poor Law Commissioners in Wales, by Mr. Henry Walter Parker.

The Duke of RICHMOND presented a petition from the operatives of the Tower Hamlets against Free Trade. He was happy to see that the operatives were manifesting their attachment in favour of the principles of the good old times

The Consolidated Fund Bill, and the Insolvent Debtors' Bill (India) were read a third time and passed.

The House then adjourned at a quarter to six.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

AMALGAMATION BILLS.—Mr. WILSON PATTEN brought up the 9th Report of the Railway Classification Committee, and moved, that in conformity with the recommendations contained in the Report, no Amalgamation Bill be proceeded with before the 1st of May—Agreed to.

THE COERCION BILL. Sir WILLIAM SOMERVILLE gave notice that he would, when the order of the day for proceeding with the Irish Coercion bill was moved, move that the other orders of the day should be read first.

THE ADJOURNMENT. —Sir R. PEEL said that, in answer to a question put to him the other night, he would move the adjournment over Easter for eleven days, that is, from the 8th to the 20th of April. The right hon. Baronet added that he would propose that the Irish Coercion Bill be read a first time on Monday next. He had said he would not proceed with any other measure until the Corn Bill were disposed of, but he thought the Coercion Bill should be made an exception.—Mr. O'CONNELL said that however reluctant he was to impede the progress of the Corn Bill he should feel bound to oppose the progress of the Coercion Bill in every stage.

THE LAW OF SETTLEMENT Mr. BANKES rose to propose the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the present law with respect to settlement under the Poor-laws. Mr. BROOKES seconded the motion.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM opposed the motion —After some discussion the motion was withdrawn

THE ADJOURNED DEBATE.—The adjourned debate was then resumed.—The principal speakers were Mr. C. BULLER and Lord G. BENTINCK.—The debate was again adjourned, and the House rose shortly after one o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

Several bills were advanced a stage.

Lord BEAUCHAMP presented a petition from Thomas Slingsby Duncombe, Esq., M.P., complaining that a petition had been presented to their Lordships, containing certain false and slanderous imputations on his character, and praying their Lordships to adopt some means to enable him to prove, on oath, the falsehood of those allegations.

THE CHARITABLE TRUSTS BILL.—Lord BROUGHAM suggested the propriety of postponing the second reading of the Charitable Trusts Bill until after the Easter recess, for the purpose of making certain amendments. The Lord CHANCELLOR said that the provisions of the bill were precisely the same in those of the bill of last Session, with one or two exceptions. He had no objection to postpone the second reading, and refer the bill to a Select Committee, if it should be thought advisable. (Hear, hear.) After some discussion it was agreed to postpone the bill till after Easter. The House adjourned at half-past six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. FRIDAY.

THE WINDOW DUTY. Lord DUNCAN said that, in consequence of the representations of his constituents of the inconveniences arising from the protracted debate upon the Corn-law Bill, he should postpone his motion for the repeal of the Window Tax till after Easter

THE CORN-LAW IMPORTATION BILL.—On the order of the day for resuming the adjourned debate upon this bill, Mr. COBDEN presented a petition from some tenant farmers praying the House to pass the bill as speedily as possible.

THE ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The debate on the Corn Importation Bill was resumed by Sir J. GRAHAM, who said he was unwilling to protract the debate, as he was certain that the country was sincerely anxious to have the measures passed as soon as possible (hear), but he felt is his duty to state his opinions upon the subject. He then said that he had not used any influence with his tenants to induce them to support this measure, and that, regardless of taunts as to changes of opinion, he should feel it his duty to meet the emergency (hear), convinced as he was that, by voting for this bill, he should advance the public good. (Hear.) The right hon. Baronet then proceeded to animadvert upon the arguments which had been used in the debate, and to reply to them. One reason other countries were eager enough to take advantage of our free imports, they gave no indication of following our example.

The right honourable Baronet then entered into the question of the price of corn, and contended that an alteration of the present sliding-scale had become absolutely necessary. He then particularly addressed himself to the arguments of Lord George Bentinck, and denied that the farmers looked with consternation upon this bill, as the noble Lord had contended. He did not believe that either landlords or tenants out of the atmosphere of that noble gentleman's residence, and of Newmarket, would be found to support the present law, which would protect the public from the extravagant rise on the price of corn to which they were subjected under the present law. The right honourable Baronet then remarked upon the variation in the price of corn during the last year determine the people to become instruments for the execution of their plans; and they at the same time supposed that when the governors should be overthrown, and the Utopia of the Polish Kingdom established, they would be able to turn the storm raised by them in any manner which might appear most convenient to them; but it is easy to perceive, particularly in Gallicia, that such projects were insane, and could not be executed. The country has been under the sovereignty of Austria for eighty-three years, and when it passed over to Austria it was in the most miserable state of political organization. Our laws and good institutions have been introduced into Gallicia. At present the effect of those institutions has been appreciated, and the mass of the people is persuaded that it is the Throne which protects them as well as all their existence. This is what the Polish emigrants who brought about the movement have misunderstood or forgotten. They thought to find the people of the same feelings as themselves, but they were mistaken. The peasantry of Gallicia do not understand communal phrases, and they detest the Polish system, reminding them as it does of their misery; the great majority of the preachers of liberty are with them the oppressors of their peasantry. When the nobles persuaded the peasantry to revolt, and the insurgents, who had assembled in vast numbers in different parts, wished to compel the peasants, by harsh treatment, to participate in the revolt, the movement which they wished to foment turned against the instigators themselves. Many of the latter fell victims to the rage of the people, and the rest were delivered by them to their natural protectors. Peace has now been restored in Gallicia, and the movement no longer deserves the name of revolution, but rather of counter-revolution, now that the fire of the revolution has been extinguished at Cracow, where it was all-powerful, and that the mass of the revolutionists of Gallicia, whose projects have miscarried, is incapable any longer of disturbing the peace of the country. It is evident, however, that time will be necessary after such violent shocks to calm the public mind, and that the task of the Government is no easy one. The Government has given its first attention to this task, and it will proceed with the greater confidence in that necessary work, being persuaded of the faithful attachment of the generality of the population to it.

"Be pleased to communicate this despatch to the Cabinet to which you are accredited, and which we wish should be informed as soon and as correctly as possible of the precise state of things.

"Vienna, March 7."

SHIPWRECK IN TABLE BAY, CAPE OF GOOD HOPE. TWENTY-ONE LIVES LOST.

The bark flew fast
On her outward course,
And strain'd the mast
To the wild winds force.
They are clearing the waves
Of the Table Bay,
Where the tempest raves
With furious sway.

The bark flew fast
Neath Heaven's dark cope,
They'd soon have gained
The Cape of Good Hope!
All orders rings along the deck,
The bark has struck;
'Tis now a wreck!

The boat! the boat!
'Tis now afloat,
By numbers crowded,
In darkness shrouded.

Fly! ply the oar
To the looming shore.

In vain! 'tis lost!
Mid the breakers tost,
Each struggling wretch's desp'rate cry
Proclaims the dark waves victory.

Oh! Heaven! it is a dreadful thing
The terror of the tempest's wing;
The waves have gulphed their hapless prey,
As the winds swept over the Table Bay.

On Wednesday morning, the 7th of January, about half-past eight, the barque, Francis Speight, parted from her anchors, in Table Bay, and, in attempting to beat out, grounded, broadside on the beach, near where the ill-fated ship, Waterloo, with nearly 500 souls, was lost, in August, 1842. The gale, at the time the Francis Speight struck, was at its height: the surf was tremendous, making a clean breach over the vessel, carrying away the bulwarks, long boat, main hatch, and part of the deck, with one of the crew. Meanwhile, the shore was thronged with people, and the utmost anxiety prevailed for the fate of the unfortunate crew. A signal from land to the wreck to send a rope was attended to, but, unfortunately, it broke. Rockets were then fired, with lines attached; and one was thrown across the fore-topmast stay, but remained there, probably, from the impossibility of any of the crew getting it: as the vessel was fast breaking up, and, from the fearful rolling, the masts were every moment expected to go over.

After some extraordinary delay, a whale-boat was brought from the town, on a waggon, and manned with a volunteer crew of six brave fellows, who, with difficulty, launched the boat and dashed through the surf, and were speedily alongside. All except the carpenter, fifteen in number, got into the boat; and, in pushing off, got astern of the vessel, to leeward. At this moment, a terrific sea upset the boat, and twenty-one poor souls were struggling in the angry surf for life. Anxious spectators on the beach were horror stricken; men on horseback were seen plunging in the water to save the lives of their fellow-creatures at the risk of their own; but eighteen sank to rise no more!

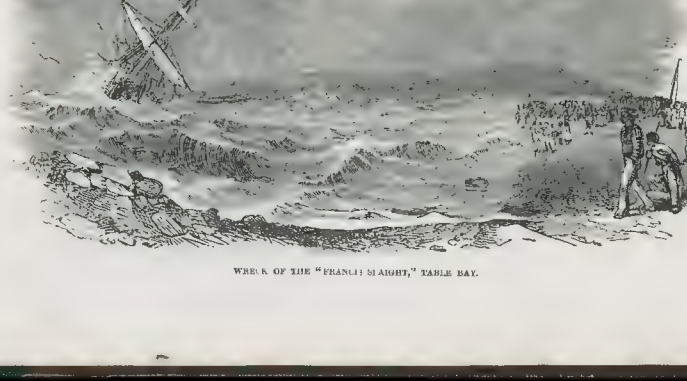
After this a large surf-boat, towed by a smaller boat, was seen approaching from the North Jetty. One boat was capsized by the other being thrown over it, and two lives were thus lost.

Shortly after the accident with the whale-boat, the man who had refused to go in it was seen standing on the foreyard, holding on by the stay; he then came down, and was seen to enter the forecastle; just after this the foremast came down with a tremendous crash: all was anxiety for the fate of the poor fellow, but, after the gale, about five o'clock, he was seen on the broken timbers of the wreck; a boat put off, and he was landed in safety. This man (James Robertson), and John M'Leod, seaman, were all of the crew that reached the shore.

The names of the persons drowned are, Hen. Patterson, master; Thomas Haydan, first mate; Magnus Smith, second mate; Henry Hiatt, Steward; William Symes, cook; George Hutchings, John Smith of Leith, John Smith of Edinburgh, William Widdee, Edward M'Donald, David Evans, seaman; John Mitten, Thomas Beddoe, William Hall, Richard Parker, apprentices; and six men belonging to Cape Town.

The ill-fated vessel, Francis Speight, arrived from Manilla on the 3rd of Jan., and put into Table Bay for refreshments; she was to have sailed on the day of her wreck; the captain was the last to get into the boat. The cargo was valued at £50,000, and was all damaged.

The great loss of life by the wreck of the *Water*oo, being occasioned mainly by there being no safe-boat, the inhabitants of Cape Town, before noon the next day, subscribed a sum sufficient to procure a life-boat; and a large one, with air-tight lockers, was built, and handed over to the Humane Society! Why this boat was not on the spot at the time of the above catastrophe remains to be explained.



WRECK OF THE "FRANCIS SPEIGHT," TABLE BAY.

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS

ST. MICHAEL'S, CORNHILL.

"This Church," says Mr. Godwin, "is one of the seven in the city of London, which are dedicated to the Archangel Michael, the patron saint of France; and, as its distinguishing name implies, formerly stood in Cornhill. In the reign of Edward VI., however, it was excluded from the street so called, by the erection of four houses; so that it must now be described as standing on the east side of St. Michael's Alley." The site of the present fabric is inferred to have been occupied by a church during the Saxon dynasty, but no record of it remains; and the earliest statement with regard to a church here occurs in the 12th century, in 1303, it was conveyed by the Abbot and Convent of Evesham to the Drapers' Company, in whom the right of presentation is still vested.

In the year 1421, was commenced a new tower, or steeple. In this year it appears that the old tower was burned down; for, in the present Robing-Room there is an engraving from a curious pen-and-ink drawing, purporting to be a representation of the tower "before the fire of 1421." In the church rested the remains of Robert Fabian, the Chronicler, and Alderman of London: he was Sheriff in 1493, and died in 1511. And, in the Churchyard, Thomas Stow, grandfather of the antiquary, John Stow, was buried in the year 1526. From his will there appear to have been at its date no fewer than seven altars in St. Michael's.

This old Church, with the exception of the tower, (with a celebrated set of ten bells,) was burnt in the Great Fire of 1666; and the present building was commenced by Sir Christopher Wren in 1672. Fifty years afterwards, the tower was rebuilt also by Wren.

The body of the Church, 87 feet long, 60 feet in breadth, and 30 feet high, is in the Italian style of architecture: it is divided into nave and aisles, by Doric columns and arches, which support a plain groined ceiling. There is an organ at the west end; and a handsome altar-piece opposite to it, adorned by two paintings of Moses and Aaron.

The tower is by far the most attractive portion of the design: it is bold and lofty, and, as our Engraving shows, is of a totally different character from that of the body; being of the florid, or perpendicular style—the last period of pointed architecture in England. Upon this, Mr. Godwin (Churches of London, vol. I.) sensibly observes: "One cannot well understand the motives which induced Wren to build the church entirely different in style to the tower, which was standing; or why, having built the church, he did not afterwards, when called on to erect the tower, design that in conformity with it."

The tower rises to the height of 180 feet, and forms one of the most prominent ornaments of the City when viewed at a distance. It is an imitation of the splendid "Chapel Tower" at Magdalen College, Oxford, (145 feet high), completed in 1505.

ST. MICHAEL'S, CORNHILL.

Ralph describes St. Michael's Tower as "a very magnificent building," and deserving "very justly to be esteemed the first thing of that sort in London." Wren has, however, so Italianized his design in the mouldings, and circular-headed windows, as to render Ralph's praise very questionable. Nevertheless, the upper portion is beautiful in outline. The body of the church is surrounded by houses; and this may have induced Wren to bestow greater attention upon the tower, and greater still upon the upper portion which is most seen.

THE IRISH MEMBERS AND THE COERCION BILL.—A meeting of the Irish members was held at the Reform Club on Wednesday evening. We understand it was determined that upon the motion being made for reading the Coercion Bill a first time, an amendment will be moved to postpone the first stage of the bill until after the passing of the Corn Bill.

RETIREMENT OF LIEUT.-GEN. LORD BLOOMFIELD, K.C.B., G.C.H.—Lieut.-Gen. Lord Bloomfield is about to retire from the command of the garrison of Woolwich. He will be succeeded by Major-General Sir Thomas Downman, K.C.H., an old and highly-distinguished officer. The cause of the resignation is ascribed to ill-health.

A NOVEL ORNAMENT FOR FLOWERS.—A novel ornament for flowers is to be seen at the Soho Bazaar, and which is worth notice at this season. It is called a cracowenne, and is made of pasteboard. It is beautifully ornamented, and forms a very handsome addition to a flower vase. The inventor, Mr. Henry, executes the drawings.

WILL OF THE LATE DOWAGER LADY HOLLAND. Probate of the will and four codicils of the late Right Honourable Elizabeth Vassall, Baroness Dowager Holland, was granted, on the 19th of March, to the Right Honourable Lord John Russell, Benjamin Currey, Esq. (Old Palace-yard), and W. A. Loch, Esq. (of Edinburgh), the executors. The personalty in England was sworn under £80,000. The will is dated the 31st of August, 1845, and the last codicil on the 20th of October—a month before her death. Her first bequest is to the Queen, if her Majesty will condescend to accept it, of the picture of his Royal Highness the Duke of York surrounded by the British residents and other English gentlemen when his Royal Highness was at Florence. To Lord John Russell, the portrait of his grandfather, John Duke of Bedford, by Sir Joshua Reynolds; and the vase of French china, with the portrait of Francis Duke of Bedford, painted upon it in Paris by her order: and bequeaths to his Lordship the net proceeds of the Kensington estate for life, and the residue of her property not specially disposed of. To the Speaker of the House of Commons, to complete his set of portraits, that of the Hon James Abercromby, now Lord Dunfermline. To the Earl of Carlisle, the portrait of the Duke of Devonshire. To the Earl of Aberdeen, certain specific bequests, in token of gratitude for his kindness towards her. Also bequests to the Duke of Devonshire, the Duchess of Sutherland, and many other of her personal friends. All her property, real and personal, in the Island of Jamaica, she leaves to her son, Lord Holland, her Britannic Majesty's Minister at the Court of Tuscany, for his use absolutely; also an annuity of £500, and should Lord Holland die in the lifetime of Lord John Russell, to continue the annuity to her dauter, Lady Lilford, to whom she has left some specific bequests. In her Ladyship's disposition of the Kennington estate in favour of Lord John Russell, she says she has expressed it as entirely emanating from her sincere affection for his Lordship, and that it was also an intention formerly entertained by the late Lord Holland, to make a similar disposition of the reversion of the Amphill estate in his favour, and hopes his Lordship will accept the gift as a token of affection from both. She has empowered his Lordship to charge the estate at Kennington with a sum of £7000, for the benefit of his children, Georgiana Adelaide, Victoria, and John, as his Lordship may direct, the estate, after his Lordship's death, to be held in trust for Lord Lilford, and, at his decease, for such three of eight persons named in the first codicil as may become entitled thereto, being six of the children of Lady Lilford, and the two daughters of Lord John Russell. To the British Museum she bequeaths a box given to her by Napoleon; the bequest forms the principal part of her second codicil, and is to the following effect:—"Amongst the things which I chiefly value, is the box bequeathed to me by the Emperor Napoleon, and a card originally enclosed in it, bearing, on one side, a memorandum, from which it appears that the cameo which forms the lid of the box was presented to Napoleon by Pope Pius VI., at Tolentino, in 1797, and on the other side are these words, in the Emperor's own handwriting, 'l'Empereur Napoleon à Lady Holland témoignage de satisfaction et d'estime.'"

GRAND MILITARY LEAMINGTON STEEPLE CHASES.

SADDLING AT THE BETTING GROUND

SCENES FROM THE GRAND MILITARY STEEPLE-CHASES AT LEAMINGTON.

Last week, the fashionable town and neighbourhood of Leamington was the scene of what is well termed, in the Royal Leamington Spa Courier, a "Sporting Carnival." Wednesday was the Warwick Spring Meeting, and, on Thursday and Friday, the 19th and 20th, took place the Grand Military Steeple Chases. Our Artist has sketched the animated scene of Saddling at the Betting-ground.

"In order to give the reader some faint idea of the interest created by this meeting" (says the journal already quoted), "among the members of the service, we may state that there were nearly four hundred officers congregated here from their different regiments stationed at the dépôts in London, Woolwich, Windsor, Nottingham, Exeter, Ipswich, Dublin, Glasgow, Brighton, Manchester, Nenagh, Newbridge, Hounslow, Birmingham, Coventry, Longford, Cahir, &c. &c."

The ground was about four miles in extent, contained twenty-five leaps, and was described by Lieut.-Col. Hankey (the Acting Steward), as far superior to any line which had previously been found at Northampton—no small fact in commendation of the fine steeple-chase country round Leamington.

The scene of our Artist's second sketch is from the first Race on Thursday. The honour of supremacy had been, according to the Courier, assigned to Capt. Powell (Old Peralta) in favour of Marengo. This brought the lot within one fence of the second brook, where Lord Glamis unfortunately went on the wrong side of a flag, and, in turning back to remedy the mistake, caused Capt. Wyndham's horse to fall at a gap, and thus to be shut out from all future chance; whilst to a similar cause was attributed the ill-success of "Knee"-plus-ultra. In crossing the brook Marengo and Cinderella were well up to each other; the former continuing to lead over the two succeeding fences, and topping in gallant style the first flight of hurdles placed at the entrance upon the course, whence there was a beautiful piece of straight running homewards. The mare then was skilfully called upon, and slightly passing Marengo, she cleared the last fence excellently, and opposite the Stand was evidently gaining more ground with much ease, and was declared the victor by half-a-length; Marengo being second. These were the only two telegraphed from the judge's chair; but we are inclined to place Brenda third; Regalia fourth; and Wiverton fifth. The race was by no means a fast one, and was commenced amidst a slight renewal of the fall of snow which gave so wintry an appearance to the day at its dawning.

The second Race, too, was run, from beginning to end, in a pitiless snow-storm, which rendered it impossible for any one to distinguish, beyond a trifling distance, either horses or riders, or the red flags that marked the ground.

We have prepared some striking Engravings of the past and present state of the Town of Leamington, considering the above as the fittest occasion for illustrating alike the humble village and the gay resort of high fashion. The arrival of very important intelligence from the Seat of War in India has, however, compelled us to defer the Leamington Views until next week, in order to give place to the Series of Eastern Sketches, by Mr. Vigne, Captain Thomas, and other Artists.

We have to acknowledge the receipt of Fourteen Designs in Outline, Illustrative of Campbell's "Gertrude of Wyoming," by G. E. Hicks, to be presented to the Subscribers to the Art-Union of London for the current year (1846), in addition to an impression of the Engraving of "Jephtha's Daughter."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 28, 1846.

A ROYAL COMMISSION is to issue, charged with the duty of inquiring into the merits and consequences of those Railroads which are proposed to be carried through and into the Metropolis. The Committee before which those schemes came in the ordinary course of business found the question too vast for it to deal with. We are not surprised at the reluctance to undertake so gigantic an inquiry by a body that had also numerous other schemes to dispose of. It is calculated that the property affected by these Metropolitan lines, or continuations of old lines farther into the Metropolis, amounts to fifteen millions. It is an inevitable stage in the development of the Railway system; the London termini of most of the great lines are in the suburbs, distant and comparatively difficult to reach; bringing them nearer the great centres will be a great public improvement, and will render necessary alterations in other respects that are obviously required. London is no longer a city, but an assemblage of cities, and those large ones; it is a nation of pavement and brickwork, and the old channels of communication that were wide enough for the traffic of our ancestors are fast becoming insufficient. The waters of a river turned into the channel of a brook would find as much chance of a free and unimpeded passage as the traffic of modern London compelled to flow through the Cheapside and Fleet-street as they were built after the Great Fire. The Corporation of that day was not blessed with absolute wisdom, and Whitehall was too careless of anything but the amusements of its Royal occupant, to do much to correct the errors of Guildhall; the Government had no money to spend usefully, and what the City had, it laid out on no plan or principle whatever. Wren had the eye of a prophet as well as that of the artist; his scheme for the rebuilding of London was a magnificent one, but was unhappily not appreciated; it was, perhaps, too perfect, too much like the metropolis of some visionary Utopia or Atlantis—for little men are easily frightened by the grand conceptions of superior minds; with sufficient means it would have been perfectly practicable; but had it been less comprehensive, more would probably have been effected. The main and leading points of it might at least have been followed out, but no attempt of the kind was made, and we are now paying the penalties of past ignorance and neglect. A new era, however, is opening, and we hope the opportunities it will afford, will be turned to good account. With lines of railway crossing the river and connecting the centre of the City with the most distant parts of the kingdom, and probably lines again connecting all the termini with each other, London will become a metropolis of marvels, with nothing like it on the face of the earth.

THE Corn-law Debate proceeds slowly, and excites less interest than could have been expected from so great a question. The Protectionists have full opportunity afforded them of making a stand; but they seem impressed with the assurance of defeat—a feeling that is always disheartening, and goes far to produce the defeat it anticipates. As the result approaches in the Commons, the public begin to speculate more actively on what may be the course of proceedings in the Peers. It is evident that the Protectionists will make that their battle field; Lord Stanley has already evinced an eagerness for the conflict; the gaudia certaminis is very strong in him, whatever the question may be in which he engages; the "Rupert of debate" will lead the force that, strong as it is, would be ruined by the zeal, without discretion, which has so often been displayed by a Richmond. On the other hand, various rumours are in circulation as to the probable tactics of the Government: one report affirms that Lord Ashley and Lord Lincoln are to be raised to the Peerage, to assist in passing the measure. Some counterpoise to Lord Stanley will be much wanted if he "means mischief." The Duke of Wellington may give all the weight of his character and position to the question; but he is no longer fit for the Guerilla warfare of debate.

IT would work a great improvement in the conduct of public works, and the management of railways, if the Directors were compelled by law to pay a compensation to the families of any person killed by their proved neglect or misconduct. A bodily injury can be estimated and assessed at a money value, and the amount recovered; but if the injury causes death, the widow or family, whose loss is irreparable, can claim nothing. The Scotch law, in this respect, is very much superior to our own; a case has just occurred, strikingly illustrative of the principle:—

The widow and children of a man named M'Cauly, a miner in Airdrie, who was precipitated down a coal-pit, and killed, in consequence of the insufficiency of the machinery used by the Company, have been awarded the sum of £400, as a compensation for their claims. They have sustained by the death of their natural protector.

Mine Proprietors and Railway Directors in England, in the same, or similar cases, would have certainly to pay a slight deodand, which would go to the Crown, and would, perhaps, also give some trifle to the family; but it would be a matter of favour, not a right, and would, in all probability, be withheld, as soon as public attention was withdrawn from the case. Unless it was a very fatal one, no attention would be paid to it at all, and the parties might do just as they pleased. A few cases like that of Airdrie would be very efficacious; trains would arrive and depart with exceeding regularity, and Companies would discover it to be to their interest to employ intelligent, careful, and well-trained officers, and to pay them liberally for their services. At present, dividends are increased at the cost of life and limb to the community.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Thursday Evening.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The birthday of his Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge was celebrated to-day with the usual rejoicings. The bells of St. George's Chapel were rung at intervals throughout the day, and a Royal salute was fired at twelve o'clock.

ARRIVAL OF THE PRINCE OF SAXE MEININGEN. His Serene Highness Prince George of Saxe Meiningen (the Prince Hereditary) arrived from Germany on Tuesday, on a visit to the Queen Dowager, and shortly afterwards went to pay Sir Robert Peel a visit. The Earl Howe accompanied the illustrious Prince, and had the honour to introduce his Serene Highness to the Premier. We understand his Serene Highness contemplates a sojourn of from six weeks to two months in this country. His Serene Highness is only son of his Serene Highness the Reigning Duke of Saxe Meiningen, and, consequently, nephew of the Queen Dowager and the Duchess Ida of Saxe Weimar, and is on the eve of completing his twentieth year.

THE QUEEN DOWAGER.—Her Majesty the Queen Dowager has returned from Witley Court, Worcestershire. On Sunday last, her Majesty the Queen Dowager and her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent attended divine service in the Chapel Royal, St. James's.

HER MAJESTY AND THE ROYAL FAMILY. The Queen, her Royal Consort, and the Royal Family remain at Buckingham Palace. On Tuesday afternoon, the Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal, went to Astley's Theatre. The Royal party left Buckingham Palace at ten minutes before four o'clock, and returned shortly before six o'clock.

DINNER OF THE LORD MAYOR TO THE CABINET MINISTERS.—Sir Robert Peel and the Cabinet Ministers have accepted an invitation to dine with the Lord Mayor at the Mansion House, on Wednesday, the 22nd of April. The guests are invited to bring their ladies.

DEATH OF THE HON. WILLIAM N. RIDLEY COLBORNE, M.P.—We regret to announce the death of the Hon. William Nicholas Ridley Colborne, M.P., who expired on Monday afternoon, at Lord Colborne's residence, in Hill-street, in the thirty-second year of his age. The hon. gentleman ruptured a blood-vessel on the previous Tuesday, and having subsequently caught cold, it terminated with inflammation on the chest. Dr. Chambers and Mr. Powell were in attendance on the hon. member, but all their medical skill was of no avail. The deceased was only son of Lord Colborne, and was born 24th July, 18.4. He was elected a member for Richmond at the last general election, which by his death becomes vacant.

DEATH OF MRS. JOHNSON.—We have to announce the death of Mrs. Johnson, the mother of the Lord Mayor. The deceased lady was in the 86th year of her age.

TWO LIVES LOST NEAR NOTTINGHAM BY LIGHTNING. On Thursday evening the village of Ratcliffe, 8 miles from Nottingham, was visited with a most awful storm of thunder and lightning, attended with a sacrifice of human life. The rain fell in torrents, and the lightning was extremely vivid, and the peals of thunder unusually heavy. At half past three o'clock Mr. Edward Brewster was in his father's field, adjoining the Trent, in the parish of Ratcliffe, where he left two men at work, who had on their waterboots, clearing a drain. It is supposed during the storm, which came on in an hour afterwards, the two men sheltered themselves in a barn in the field, and that, while there, the electric fluid caught them both, and they fell lifeless to the ground. No injury was done to the barn, and no person being near, their situation was not discovered till ten o'clock, when, as they did not return, and no tidings of them could be heard in the village, search was made, and Mr. Brewster found dead in the barn. A cow on the Radcliffe side of the Trent was also struck and killed, belonging to Mr. Brewster; the two men were in the field on the other side of the Trent. There were several other beasts in the fields, but they sustained no injury. The storm extended for miles, and passed off in an easterly direction, and at Tuxhby set fire to a barn.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE. We have received the Paris papers of Thursday. They are unimportant as far as politics are concerned. The Orleans an. Tours Railway was opened on Thursday; and a very large party assembled at Tours to witness the ceremony.

THE INSURRECTION IN POLAND.—The Warsaw Courier has the following:—"The undermentioned is the result of the investigation set on foot owing to the events at Sedice, and the arrests of various persons: 1. That a conspiracy took place with ramifications in the Polish provinces. 2. That at the head of the conspiracy, Bronislas Dombrowski, sent from Posen, was chosen leader of the conspiracy on the right bank of the Vistula. 3. That the principal abettors were Pantaleon Potocki, Stanislas Kosikowski, Jadislas Zarski, Adolph Mirecki, Michel Mirecki, and Anthony Deskiewicz. The agents and accomplices of Dombrowski were Stanislas Dobrisch and Charles Ruprecht. All these individuals, brought before a council of war, have been found guilty of rebellion and sedition. According to the powers intrusted by his Majesty the Emperor, the Prince Governor, after sentence of death was pronounced, has ordered Potocki, Kosicsakwski, and Zarski to be hung, the first at Sedice, the other two at Warsaw. As regards Dobrisch and Ruprecht, their sentence is to be commuted on the scaffold to banishment to Siberia, a loss of all their rights. Mirecki and Deskiz are deprived of all their and share the same fate as Dobrisch and Ruprecht. Lyniecki, who showed a true repentance, is equally banished to Siberia, with the loss of all his rights, after receiving 500 stripes. The law to enter into full force, as regards the confiscation of their property, according to Art. 71, book 1st, of the Military Criminal Code. As regards any property falling to them by inheritance, it will be adjudged according to Polish law. This sentence was fulfilled the following day, at ten o'clock, a.m., in front of the Citadel, with the exception of Potocki."

THE UNITED STATES.—We have received New York papers to the 5th instant, by the Hermann, but they contain nothing of importance. The debate upon the notice of giving notice relative to Oregon was not concluded. We do not notice any more violent speeches or manifestations, but the military and naval preparations appear to be continued. By this arrival we learn that the screw steamer, Great Britain, reached New York safely on the 4th instant, having been forty-two days at sea, and during the whole of this time could use her screw propeller only on two or three days. The following is an extract of a letter dated Montreal, February 23rd: Great excitement has been created in the commercial circles here by the recent news from England of the contemplated withdrawal and diminution of the protective duties Well informed persons here, however, do not contemplate any serious or lasting injury to colonial interests, as the proposed measures will necessitate the introduction of improvements which, otherwise, would not have been thought of.—The death of Mr Pessants, one of the parties engaged in the late duel, has excited a great sensation at Washington The snow-storms had stopped several of the mails.—Commercial reports from New York were favourable.

FIRE IN CRAWFORD-STREET.—FOUR PERSONS BURNED TO DEATH.

On Monday morning, shortly before one o'clock, a fire, attended with fatal consequences to four persons (Mr. Butters and his three children), and serious results to several other parties, broke out upon the premises belonging to Mr. Tompson, chemist, situate at No. 71, Crawford-street. The house occupied by the first floor. Upon the ground floor there was also sleeping a youth named Thomas Hughes, an assistant to Mr Tompson, a surgeon and accoucheur. The last named party did not sleep upon the premises, but he ran up to the house, and informed the inmates there that the place was on fire. He then made an attempt to return back to his room, to get his clothes, but he had not descended more than three or four stairs, when he was met by a large volume of smoke, which prevented him. He, however, succeeded in escaping by the balcony of the next house. His example was quickly followed by the four persons in the room. Mr. and Mrs. Hoskings were both severely injured by the descent, but no other two escaped uninjured.

At this time the fire had got complete possession of the staircase, and any attempt made by the parties in the second floor to descend by that means could not be accomplished with the least success.

In the space of three or four minutes the inhabitants were alarmed at hearing violent shrieks proceeding from the top floor front, and shortly afterwards Mr. and Mrs. Butters were to be seen at the front attic window, wringing their hands, and beckoning to the crowd to render them assistance. Some of the people in the street went and procured a ladder, but that not being sufficiently high to reach the attic, it could not be made any use of.

All of a sudden, a cry of "the escape is coming" was raised, which, however, was hardly done when Mrs. Butters got upon the window-sill, and precipitated herself into the street. She was picked up insensible. Her husband still kept his position at the window, when the conductor, a young man named Henry Parker, mounted the same, and had just got hold of Mr. Butters's hand, to help him into the machine, when several of the bottles of tincture in the shop burst, and the spirits becoming ignited, a flame rushed into the machine, and such violence as to resemble an explosion of gunpowder. The vapour arising from the ignition of the spirits ascended, and nearly suffocated the conductor of the escape, who, to save his own life, jumped into the machine, but the former became burnt by the fire rushing out of the shop, he fell through. For some time it was feared that he would lose his life, but strong hopes are now entertained of his recovery.

The engines of the brigade, parish and county stations, were all upon the spot very soon; but before the fire was extinguished, Mr. Butters and his three children were suffocated. Their names were as follows:—Robert Butters, the father, aged 37; his son Robert, aged six years and a half, and William, aged one year and a half, and his daughter Jane, aged four years and a half. The whole four deceased parties were got out by the firemen, and were taken to Mr. Baienam's surgery opposite. Several other persons received injuries by the falling of the plate of the machine, and by catching some of the inmates; but, happily, they were not seriously hurt. In order to guard against a similar casualty, it is intended to have the canvass of the escape, covered with wire gauze, which will render them fireproof.

Mrs. Butters, who has lost her husband and three children, has communicated the following:—She says that she retired to bed on Sunday night between ten and eleven o'clock. Her husband, at the time, was from home. Shortly before twelve o'clock she was awakened by the return of her husband, who immediately undressed himself and retired to bed. They had not been in bed many minutes when they were aroused by a loud knocking at the street-door. Her husband got out of bed, and, on opening the window, heard a cry of "Fire!" raised. So positive was he that the cry was, that the fire had not occurred in his premises, that he called out to the men in the street that all was right. He then went down stairs, and opened one of the shop-doors that leads into the passage, when flames burst forth with such violence as quite overcame him down. He then returned to try to save her and the children. He got a small ladder, which he placed under the trap-door on the roof, but he was unable to get the bolts drawn back. Finding no other means of escaping, that the fire was no escape there, they all returned to the front room, in the hope of being rescued by the escape, which they knew was kept at Baker-street. Whilst standing at the window, the mob in the street set up a shouting, and the fire that she could not tell, on account of her children screaming so dreadfully. The smoke entering the room at last in such dense bodies, she jumped out of the window, and she expected that her husband would have dropped the children out, and then have come himself. She could not form any idea as to how the fire originated.

On Tuesday, Mr. Wakley, M.P., and a Jury of 14 inhabitants of the district of St. Mary, Mary-lebone, assembled at the workhouse of that parish, for the purpose of commencing an inquiry as to the origin of the fire. After the bodies had been identified, evidence was given confirmatory of the above statement, and the proceedings were adjourned until Monday next.

INDIA.

ANOTHER VICTORY OVER THE SIKHS.

On Thursday, the Government received official despatches from India, announcing another victory obtained over the Sikhs by the British troops at Aliwal. This engagement took place on the 28th of January, when a complete victory was gained by the troops under the immediate command of Major-General Sir Harry Smith, K.C.B., over the Sikh forces commanded by the Sirdar Runjoor Singh Majeethea.

The first despatch consists of a General Order by the Governor-General, dated Camp Ferozepore, Feb. 2, in which he announces the fact of the victory and the signal defeat of the enemy, who was driven across the river with great loss, his camp being captured, and fifty-two pieces of artillery remaining in the hands of the victors. The despatch adds:

"These trophies, in addition to those taken at Ferozeshah and Moodkee, complete the number of 143 pieces of artillery taken in the field from the enemy since the British army moved from its cantonments to repel a most unprovoked aggression on its territories."

The despatch concludes with a strong eulogy upon the troops engaged, and says

"The Government of India, ever desirous to mark its grateful sense of the services of the army, will cause a medal to be presented to every officer and soldier of the East India Company's Service engaged in the Battle of Aliwal; and it requests, through his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, that a nominal roll may be furnished for that purpose."

These despatches were not brought by the regular Overland Mail, but by the Oriental steamer. The Mail was to have come by the Virago steamer, but it was delayed, and some apprehensions at first existed upon the subject; but our latest accounts from Paris state that the Indian Mail had arrived there, and, consequently, the Virago was safe at Malta.

EXTRACT FROM A DESPATCH FROM HIS EXCELLENCY THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF TO THE RIGHT HON. THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL, DATED FEBRUARY 1, 1846.

The Upper Sutlej has become the scene of very interesting operations.

It is a strange feature of this war, that the enemy pressed for supplies on his own bank, has been striving to draw them from his Jagheer states on this side of the river. In the town and fort of Dhurrumkote, which were filled with grain, he had in the second week in January a small garrison of mercenaries Rohillas, Kussufzies, and Afghans. Major General Sir Harry Smith was on the 16th sent against this place with a single brigade of his division and a light field battery. He easily effected its reduction, the troops within it surrendering at discretion after a few cannon shots. But whilst he was yet in march I received information of a more serious character. There remained little cause to doubt that Runjoor Singh Majeethea had crossed from Philour, at the head of a numerous force of all arms, and established himself in position at Baran Hara, between the old and the new courses of the Sutlej, not only threatening the city of Loodianah with plunder and devastation, but indicating a determination to intersect the line of our communications at Russian and Reeköe.

The wealth of the rich and populous town of Loodiana had been, in some measure, provided for by the presence of three battalions of Native Infantry, under Brigadier Godby, and the gradual advance of our reinforcements, amongst which was another her Majesty's 53rd Regiment, and the position of the Shekawattee Brigade, near Russian, gave breathing time to us in that direction.

But on the receipt of intelligence which could be relied on, of the movements of Runjoor Singh and his apparent views, Major General Sir Harry Smith, with the Brigade at Dhurrumkote, and Brigadier Cureton's cavalry, was directed to advance by Jugraon towards Loodiana, and his 2nd Brigade, under Brigadier Wheeler, moved on to support him.

Then commenced a series of very delicate combinations, the momentous character of which can only be comprehended by reflecting on the task which had devolved on this army of guarding the frontier from Roopur down to Mundote.

The Major-General, breaking up from Jugraon, moved towards Loodiana, when the Sirdar, relying on the vast superiority of his forces, assumed the initiative, and endeavored to intercept his progress by marching in a line parallel to him, and opening upon his troops a furious cannonade. The Major-General continued coolly to manœuvre, and when the Sikh Sirdar, bending round the wing of his army, enveloped his flank, he extricated himself by retiring wit. the steadiness of a field-day by echelon of battalions, and effected his communication with Loodiana, but not without severe loss.

Reinforced by Brigadier Godby, he felt himself to be strong, but his manœuvres had thrown him out of communication with Brigadier Wheeler, and a portion of his baggage had fallen into the hands of the enemy. The Sikh Sirdar took up an entrenched position at Buddiwal, supporting himself on his left to fort, but, threatened on either flank by General Smith and Brigadier Wheeler, finally decamped and moved down to the Sutlej. The British troops made good their position, and occupied the abandoned position of Buddiwal; the Shekawattee Brigade and her Majesty's 53rd Regiment also added to the strength of the Major-General, and he prepared to attack the Sikh Sirdar on his new ground. But, on the 20th, Runjoor Singh was reinforced from the right bank with 4000 regular troops, twelve pieces of artillery, and a large force of cavalry.

Emboldened by this accession of strength, he ventured on the measure of advancing towards Jugraon, apparently with the view of intercepting our communications by that route.

It is my gratifying duty to announce that this presumption has been rebuked by a signal victory obtained over him. He has not only been repulsed by the Major-General, but his camp at Aliwal carried by storm, the whole of his cannons and munitions of war captured, and his army driven headlong across the river even on the bridge of boats which he found no refuge from the fire of our artillery

I have the honour now to forward the Major-General's report, which has just reached me. It is so ample and luminous that I might, perhaps, have spared some of the duties now before admiration of the Major-General's conduct, and of the brave army confided to him, in these operations, has led me.

It only now remains for me to congratulate you, Right Honourable Sir, and the Government of India, on the brilliant success which, under Divine Providence, the Major-General has achieved, and to record my opinion, that, throughout these arduous and important operations, he has displayed all the qualities of the able commander. Most strongly and most earnestly at the same time, I beg to bring to your notice, and to that of his Grace the Duke of Wellington, and the Hon. the Court of Directors, the officers and corps on whom he has so justly bestowed his commendations.

TO THE ADJUTANT GENERAL OF THE ARMY

Camp, Field of the Battle of Aliwal, Jan. 30, 1846.

Sir—My despatch to his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief of the 23rd inst will have put his Excellency in possession of the position of the force under my command after having formed a junction with the troops of Loodiana, hemmed in by a formidable body of the Sikh army under Runjoor Singh and the Sajah of Lahore. The enemy strongly entrenched himself around the little fort of Buddiwal by brustworks and "abattis," which he precipitately abandoned on the night of the 22nd instant (retiring, as it were, upon the fort of Tulwun), having crossed all the boats which were opposite Philour to that Gnat. This movement he effected during the night, and, by making a considerable détour, placed himself at a distance of 10 miles, and consequently out of my reach. I could, therefore, only push forward my cavalry as soon as I had ascertained he had marched during the night, and I accepted immediately his vacated position. It appeared subsequently he had no intention of recrossing the Sutlej, but moved down to the Ghat of Tulwun (being cut off from that of Philour by the position my force occupied after its relief of Loodiana), for the purpose of protecting the passage of a very considerable reinforcement of 18 guns and 4000 of the Regular or Avein Troops, called Avitable's Battalion, entrenching himself strongly in a semicircle, his flanks resting on the river, his position covered with from 40 to 50 guns (generally of large calibre), howitzers and mortars. The reinforcement crossed during the night of the 27th instant, and encamped to the right of the main army

Meanwhile his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, with that foresight and judgment which mark the able general, had reinforced me by a considerable additional to my cavalry, some guns, and the 2nd Brigade of my own division under Brigadier Wheeler, C.B. This reinforcement reached me on the 28th, and I had intended the next morning to move upon the enemy in his entrenchments, but the troops required one day's rest after the long marches Brigadier Wheeler had made.

I have now the honour to lay before you the operations of my united forces on the morning of the eventful 28th January, for his Excellency's information. The body of troops under my command having been increased, it became necessary to organise and bring them so to render them manageable in action. The cavalry under the command of Brigadier Cureton, and horse artillery under Major Lawrenson, were put into two brigades; the one under Brigadier Mac Dowal, C.B., and the other under Brigadier Stedman. The 1st Division, as it stood, two brigades; her Majesty's 53rd and 30th Native Infantry, under Brigadier Wilson, of the lester corps; the 36th Native Infantry and Nusseree Battalion, Wilson, of the lester corps; the 36th Native Infantry and Nusseree Battalion, under Brigadier Godby; and the Shekawattee Brigade, under Major Forster. The Sirmoor Battalion I attached to Brigadier Wheeler's Brigade of the 1st Division, the 42nd Native Infantry having been left at head-quarters.

At daylight on the 28th, my order of advance was—the cavalry in front, in contiguous columns of squadrons; two troops of Horse Artillery in the centre of the cavalry; the infantry in contiguous columns of brigades, at an interval of brigades; artillery in the intervals, followed by two eight inch howitzers on travelling carriages, brought into the field from the fort of Loodiana, by the indefatigable exertions of Lieutenant-Colonel Lane, Army Commissariat Department, and the Shekawattee Brigade, which I had marched out from Loodiana the previous evening, on the right, the Shekawattee Infantry on the left, the 4th Irregular Cavalry and the Shekawattee Cavalry in reserve in the right, for the purpose of sweeping the banks of the river rendah on my right, and preventing any of the enemy's horse attempting an inroad towards Loodiana, or any attempt upon the baggage assembled round the fort of Buddiwal.

In this order the troops moved forward towards the enemy, a distance of [illegible] miles, the advance conducted by Captain Waugh, 16th Lancers, the Deputy Assistant Quarter-Master of Cavalry; Major Bradford, of the 1st Cavalry, my populous; containing about 100,000 inhabitants, consisting of Mohammedans, Hindoos, and Sikhs, the former most numerous. The houses are in general brick, and five stories high; but many are in a very crazy condition. It is surrounded by a strong brick wall and ditch, which may be flooded from the river.

The Bazaar follows the direction of the city wall, and is not far distant from it. The street is narrow; and this inconvenience is aggravated by platforms in front of the shops, in which the goods are displayed, under projecting pent-houses of straw, to protect them from the sun and rain. Through the centre of the remaining contracted space runs a deep and dirty drain, the smell from which is very offensive. There is no public building of any size or magnificence, except the Mosque of the Nawab Wazir Khan.

There are twelve gates to the city, and as many semicircular outworks. Lahore could oppose no effectual resistance to European assailants.

FERRY OVER THE SUTLEJ AT LODIANAH.

Phulloor or Filor—a town on the right bank of the Sutlej, in which one division of the Sikh troops entrenched themselves subsequent to their defeat at Ferozeshah on the 22nd December last; it lays on the direct route from Amritsin to Loodianah, and is about six miles from the latter place. It is defended by a fort, built on the high steep rising from the river. The fort, constructed in 1809, is small, accommodating only 150 men, but it is rendered conspicuous by its large barbican.

The Sutlej, in inundation, forms extensive sheets of water round the town, and these remain after the river has retired to the confines of its usual channel. Baron Hugel states that the Maharajah Runjeet Singh was highly delighted when Mr. Vigne's sketch—of which the above is a copy—was shown to him, immediately recognising the Fort of Phulloor on the one side, and Loodianah on the other.

LOODIANAH.

This Engraving is from a sketch by Captain G. P. Thomas. It shows part of the Cantonment of Loodianah, with the Fort, and a portion of the City. The foreground is the parade, with the huts of the Sepoys' lines; the depositaries of the arms of companies, called "Bells of Arms." In the left distance are shown two officers' bungalows, or thatched houses; next, a terrace-roofed house, with portico, verandah, &c.; the Fort of Phulloor, on the Punjaub side of the Sutlej. The large house on the opposite side was successively tenanted by Shah Shoojah, Dost Mohammed, and Shoojahoolmoolk; it has a beautiful garden of cypresses and fruit trees. To the right is the Fort of Loodianah; it has a drawbridge to the gate, and a glacis and ditch surround it: the range of barracks rising above the rest, has bomb-proof roofs. The hills on the opposite bank of the Sutlej are between 60 and 70 miles distant; and, on a very clear day, beyond them are seen the snowy peaks of the higher Himalayas.

SIKH SOLDIERS.

The group of Sikh Soldiers upon the same page with the last described Engraving, is from a sketch by Lieut. G. F. Atkinson, of the Bengal Engineers.

The dress of the Sikh soldiers is composed of a chupkun, or coat, made of various stuffs, and of any colour, well quilted, so as to resist sword cuts; and many have often withstood the point of a lance. The pyjamas or pantaloons are almost always yellow, loose about the hips, and from the knee downwards, perfectly tight; the head dress is either a turban or steel helmet, fitting close to the head, with chains, &c. The arms of each are a matchlock, spear, dagger, pistols, sword and shield. The regiments under the instruction of French officers have been drilled in every respect like our own.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

Each time we hear "Nina," is the observation forced upon us, how much such music as this grows upon the ear, till it finishes by taking a strong hold upon the imagination. Besides the gratification of the sense of hearing, there is an intellectual pleasure in observing the construction of fine concerted pieces, and in investigating the development of combinations of the voices or instruments. On the other hand, if our minds are not disposed for such esthetical scrutiny, we have only to give the reins to our imagination, and the effect produced is marvellous. The pieces in this opera which more than any others illustrate these remarks, are the terzettino "Io l'amava," and the magnificent finale of the first act. These morceaux are invariably encored, and almost invariably produce a stronger effect upon the repetition than at first.

The changes of melody and rhythm in the finale are constant. The passages introduced for Ingadi (Mdlle. Sanchioli) bear a totally different character to the strains kept up by the other singers; they have a force and decision which bespeak the spirit of the part, and are altogether peculiar in their construction, while the full, powerful voice of the prima donna, gives to them the most admirable effect. The finale must cause great exertion to the voice, but yet that of Mdlle. Sanchioli never loses its due predominance; it is heard above all the others, and she gives forth sometimes a burst of sound which is quite thrilling in effect. In this and in the famous duet, Sanchioli is truly admirable. We do not like her performance of the terzettino so well; there is, we think, an exaggerated use of the tremolo now so much in fashion with Italian artists, but which appears to us, except in very remarkable situations, to impair rather than increase the effect. In this last-mentioned morceau, La Corbari gave out a few notes which surprised us. This young artist certainly improves as she gains more confidence: her voice is so fresh and sweet, and there is so much nouveté, youthfulness, and natural taste in her style of singing, that it enlists all the sympathies of her hearers, and allays the severity of the most critical. We shall be glad, however, when we see symptoms of that improvement in motion and gesture which a greater habit of the stage will not fail to bestow. We cannot praise Formasari too much for the part he takes in this opera. We scarcely see this gifted artist in any character in which he does not represents violence of passion or comic humour, that, if we had not witnessed his performance in "Belisario" and in this opera, we should have had no idea of the theme pathos of which he was capable. In the duet, "Donna che sei," he modulates his voice to the utmost sweetness and tenderness, and it is difficult to imagine that the proud Assur, or the mercurial Figaro, can be identical with the suffering old man before us. His gestures are worthy of much attention: they are always appropriate, expressive, graceful, and never exaggerated as those of actors of an inferior order of merit are often apt to be. With them there is always the extreme of coldness and indifference, or an abuse of gesticulation which equally serve to destroy the illusion. Formasari always steers clear of these two extremes, and this alone is an unmistakable mark of genius.

The lively brilliancy of "Caterina" presents an admirable contrast to the tragical character of the opera which has just preceded it. There is something exhilarating in the music itself of this ballet, and, when combined with the sight of so many bright-coloured forms, flying backwards and forwards in constant motion, the sensation produced is full of gaiety and charm.

The Opera Season is now beginning to resume its full splendour. The first extra night at her Majesty's Theatre will take place next Thursday, when for an extra night, the performances will be brilliant beyond measure. "Belisario," the opera in which that great actor and pathetic singer, Formasari, first earned his laurels here, will be revived on that night. Our new favourite, Sanchioli, and our charming prima donna of last season, Castel-an, will fill the parts of Antonina and Irene. After the opera Lucile Grahn and Louise Taglioni will enact the Grand Monarque and Mdlle. de la Vallière, in the charming divertissement "Un Bal sous Louis XIV." Then will follow the last scene of the "Somnambula," in which our ears will be again charmed by Castellan, not her ghost, under which form some report had led us to suppose that her re-appearance amongst us, but her living self, much improved; and, to conclude the whole, that most poetical of ballets, "Esline," with the new beautiful corps de ballet of this year impersonating the Dryads.

PRINCESS'.

A piece of trifling merit, called "The Dreamer," evidently translated from the French, was produced here on Saturday evening, and achieved a calm success, unmarred by any great exertion and unpuffed by any great praise. Lord George Lormer (Mr. C. Mathews) is in love with Lady Clara Bolton (Mrs Stirling), and he has a rival in the person of the Count de Florville (Mr. James Vining). They wish a wager as to which of the two shall gain her. Lord George is the most ardent man in the world. Lady Clara is, somehow or another, carried to Florville's house, and the waking "dreamer," of Lord George, takes it for his own. Upon this circumstance the whole of the piece hangs, which plays under three quarters of an hour, and is, therefore, worthy of some commendation

It is to be regretted that some plays of greater calibre are not produced during the engagement of Madame Vestris and Mr. Charles Mathews than many vaudevilles, some of which have been worn out many seasons ago. The theatre has been moderately well attended.

Mr. Bunn is in Paris, endeavouring, as we hear, to conclude an engagement with Carlotta Grisi. He will return with Madame Thillon, who appears in the Crown Diamonds." The Easter piece, at DRURY LANE, will be a revival of the ballet-pantomime, "La Perouse." A new drama is also in rehearsal.

Peter Williams will form the subject of the burlesque, by Messrs. Lemon and Bleckett, at the ADELPHI. It has been some time in hand. A new drama is also about to be produced.

In consequence of a disagreement between the management of the LYCEUM and Messrs. Smith and Taylor, the burlesque of "Esmeralda" will not be produced.

ROYAL VISIT TO ASTLEY'S.—On Tuesday, pursuant to "Royal Command," a grand equestrian performance took place at Astley's Amphitheatre, which was honoured by the presence of Her Majesty the Queen, His Royal Highness Prince Albert, His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and the Princess Royal. Mr. W. Batty, the lessee, had superbly fitted up for the Royal party a box in the centre of the dress-circle, and the theatre was tastefully decorated. The visit was strictly private. Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and their illustrious children, and attendants, arrived soon after four o'clock, and were immediately ushered into the Royal box by Mr Batty, and Mr. Thompson, the stage manager, to whom, at the close of the entertainments, the Queen and Prince Albert expressed their entire approval of the general arrangements. Her Majesty left the house soon after six o'clock, after which the doors were opened to the public, and the rush was terrific. The box and other decorations will remain for some time, and will, doubtless, be very attractive. We shall, next week, present to our readers a fine Engraving of this interesting Royal Visit, with additional details. We should add here, that the Programme of the Entertainments was very tastefully printed by Messrs. Miller and Field, of Westminster Bridge-road.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE POLISH CAUSE.

On Wednesday evening a numerously-attended meeting of the friends of Poland was held at the Crown and Anchor Tavern.

The chair was taken at eight o'clock, by Mr. Philip M Grath, a working-man.

Mr. Harney, the secretary, then read letters from the following gentlemen, who were severally requested to take the chair: General Evans, M.P.; Dr Bowring, M.P.; Joseph Hume, M.P.; and Lord Dudley Stuart, declining on the ground of previous engagements, and expressing a belief that any demonstration in favour of the Poles at this moment would not benefit their cause.

Mr. Clarke moved the first resolution, denouncing the partitions of Poland and the acts of the Congress of Vienna, relative to that country, as crimes of the blackest dye, justifying the present insurrection, and invoking the sympathy and support of the British people.

Mr. Wheeler seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. George Julian Harney then moved, "That this meeting, being convinced that a state of society which recognises privileged and unprivileged classes—the former enjoying the advantages of the social state, and the latter suffering its burthens is the great cause of the calamities afflicting the mass of mankind—while demanding the complete restoration of the nationality and independent sovereignty of Poland, regards the present democratic reformation of Polish society to be indispensable for the freedom and happiness of the Polish people. And as the Cracow manifesto of the 23rd of February, 1846, proclaiming the abolition of all class distinctions and the commencement of the equal political and social brotherhood of all the Poles, embodies our views of political and social justice, this meeting recognises the said manifesto as the basis of Polish action, and entitled to the support of the people of all nations.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. Ridley then proposed—"That a petition be addressed to the British Parliament, requesting the immediate interference of the British Government in support of the restoration of Polish nationality and freedom."

This resolution was also adopted unanimously.

Mr. Haines then moved—"That this meeting, recognising the brotherhood of the human race, express their grateful thanks to the people of France and Germany for the noble sympathy shown by them in behalf of the Polish people. And this meeting appeals to their fellow men of the entire civilised world to give their generous aid to the cause of Poland's regeneration."

Mr. Cuffey seconded the resolution, and it was cordially agreed to. It was then resolved, "That a committee be now formed, to be entitled 'Poland's Regeneration Committee,' for the purpose of guarding the interests of the Polish cause, and promoting, by every available means, the restoration of Poland."

FANCY FAIR IN THE THAMES TUNNEL.—A Fancy Fair has been held during the week in the Tunnel under the Thames. Both arches were illuminated with variegated lamps, and decorated with flags and evergreens. Each recess between the eastern and western arches of the "great hall" was occupied by a stall for the sale of fancy goods. On Monday no less than 12,994 persons visited the fair, being 5000 more than on the first day of last year's fair. The booths and other attractions exhibit nearly the same as on the part of the tunnel.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS IN THE METROPOLIS.—During the week which ended on the 21st March, there were registered in the metropolis 880 deaths; being 66 less than the average of the corresponding weeks of the last five years. The mean temperature of the week was 38 2 m.n., the lowest for the year, except that of the week which ended on the 14th February, and which was only two degrees less. Indeed, the cold was, for the time of year, remarkably intense, being more so than has been known for a quarter of a century. It appears to have had no effect on the mortality, as the deaths in the above week were fewer by 22 than those of the week preceding. The births registered during the week ending 21st March were 1,349, being an excess over the deaths of 469.

MUSIC.

CONCERT OF ANCIENT MUSIC.

The second Concert, under the direction of the Duke of Wellington, Sir H. R. Bishop Conductor, given on Wednesday night, at the Hanover-square Rooms, was honoured by the presence of H. R. H. Prince Albert, the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, the Duchess of Gloucester, Prince George of Cambridge, the Duke of Wellington, the Marquis and Marchioness of Worcester, the Marquis and Marchioness of Donro, the Earl and Countess Howe, the Ear. of Cawdor, Viscount and Viscountess Maidon, the Earl of Wilton, Viscount and Viscountess Currie, Lord Courtenay, Lord C. Wellesley, Lady E. Falk, Lady E. Marsham, Lady Heathcote, the Speaker and Family, Sir T. Acland, Sir W. Curtis, Sir J. Campbell, Lady E. Repton, Lady Webster, Lady Johnstone, Mr. Palmer, M.P., &c.

There was but one novelty in the scheme—a Glee, "Blow on, ye winds," by the Earl of Mornington (father of the Field Marshal), a graceful piece of harmony, smoothly sung by Messrs. Hawkins, Bennett, Peck, and Bradbury, who, with the addition of Mrs Sunderland, gave also Webbe's queen of Glees, "When winds breathe soft." The programme opened with Handel's Anthem, "The King shall rejoice," which was sung at the Chapel Royal on the news of the Dettingen victory, but must not be confounded with the "Te Deum" executed at St. Paul's for the same event. Of Handel's Choruses there were also "The Lord shall reign" and the "Hallelujah," from the "Israel in Egypt;" the "Gird on thy sword," from "Saul." The singers did not shout quite so much as at the first Concert, but still require to be softened down. Cherubini's magnificent Overture in "Les Deux Journées," and Graetrex's Movement from Handel's Ode, introducing the "Harmonious Blacksmith," were the instrumental pieces. Madame Caradori Allan sang the lovely melody of "Charmante Gabrielle," ceremonially accredited to "sister Dan," most effectively. She gave this romance without accompaniment. Her singing of Zingarelli's "Vengo a voi," from the "Gerusalemme Liberata," was remarkable for refinement and expression. If Mrs. Sunderland's style were at all equal to the beauty of her voice, she would, indeed, be a great singer; but she has yet much to learn. She gave Handel's air, "What though I trace," and Haydn's "On Mighty pens." Miss Birch's prizes were severally taxed in Handel's "Sing ye to the Lord," the air "Sweet Bird," with Blagrove's effective violin obligato, and in Beethoven's great scena from the "Mount of Olives." Her intonation is at times at fault, and downrights pain for physical effect; one glissando of intellectual reading is worth a myriad of roulades. Mrs. Shaw has been badly advised to re-appear, until her voice has been re-established. It gave infinite pain to the audience to witness her failure in Handel's air "Oh! had I Jubal's lyre" of Gluck most perseveringly and distressingly out of tune. Signor F. Lablache sang Handel's bass song, "O, rol dell' Erebo," in superb style. There were some fine gleamings from Sir Henry Bishop's "Idomeneo," and items by Paisiello, Nasolin., and Avison, of no great moment.

The third Concert will be on the 22nd of April, under the direction of Prince Albert, when her Majesty is expected to be present.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The first Concert of the pupils, last Saturday morning, took place just after the extraordinary change in the weather, and the students were all labouring more or less from colds; but, despite of every drawback, the scheme was most creditably executed, opening with Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," the solo by Miss A. Romer, Miss Ransford, Miss Chapman, Mr. Garsia, and Mr. Kingsbury. After Hummel's Military Septett, well executed by Messrs. H. Wylde (Piano), Watson (Violin), H. Chipp (Violoncello), Howell (Double Bass), Wells (Flute), J. Wilson (Clarionet), and Mr. Harper (Trumpet), a miscellaneous selection was given for the second part from Spohr's "Last Judgment," the "Benedictus," the "Gloria," from one of Haydn's "Masses," Handel, Cherubini, Hummell, and Paisiello. Mr Wilkinson performed the Adagio and Rondo from Beethoven's Concerto in E flat very effectively. Of the voices we have no turn out very readily to enumerate those of Miss A. Romer, Miss Ransford, Miss Graham, Miss Stewart, and Miss Salmon. But it is not merely necessary to have fine organs—style, intonation, and expression must be assiduously cultivated. The instrumentalists displayed some excellent qualities. The chief defect in the programme was, that the masters had over-taxed the powers of their pupils with compositions impossible for them to execute in such an early period of their studies.

The Academy has given to the world, honourable and distinguished artists, and is entitled to better support than it receives from merely private liberality. The Earl of Westmoreland, Sir George Clerk, Sir W. Curtis, Sir J. Campbell, &c., are unceasing in their exertions on behalf of this truly national institution. Mr. Lucas is an admirable Conductor, and M. Salston's accession, as First Violin, has been of infinite advantage. We are told that the Rev. Mr. Hamilton, the Chaplain to the Academy, is unbefriended in his duties to uphold and promote the interests of the pupils. What is much required is the introduction of clever and experienced lecturers, and of national conversazioni.

The Bishop of London, the Earl of Falmouth, Sir G. Clerk, Sir W. Curtis, Sir J. Campbell, the Marchioness of Westminster, the Ladies Murray, &c., were present.

MR. G. MANGOLD'S CONCERT.

A Morning Concert was given on Monday last at the Princess' Room, in Castle-street, one of the prettiest and best adapted for sound in London, by Mr. Mangold, who, if not a first-rate pianist, possesses considerable ability. He deserves the highest praise for the selection of his pieces, and for the taste of his entire entertainment. He was assisted by M Sainton, violin; Herr Viereck, violoncello; Mr. Baumann, bassoon; Mr. Lazarus, clarionet; Mr Clinton, flute; Mr. Jarrett, horn; and Mr Harper, trumpet. Mr. H. J. Wylde, the Director of the Concert, was the accompanyist; and the vocalists were Miss Birch, Miss Lincoln, Miss S. Flower, Mdlle. Goldberg, and Herr Goldberg. Mdlle. Goldberg made her first appearance in this country as a singer of the bravura school, known in Italy. It is a pity that the new-comer has been prematurely taken from her noviciate, for she has a magnificent voice, both in compass and quality. From the dramatic feeling she evinced, we judge she is peculiarly destined for the stage, but she must learn to control her power and refine her style. Her brother, Herr Goodberg, has fire also, but he is terribly rough and uncultivated. Miss S. Flower came after these German artists, and sang Verdi's Duo from "Nabucco," and achieved a great triumph. She has improved beyond measure by her sojourn in Italy. She has acquired delicacy and style, and, as she has a superb contralto, the effect that she produced in Verdi's "Non gli di dorri" was immense. Miss Lincoln is a charming singer, without the slightest pretension; it was delightful to listen to her warbling of "Bid the faithful Arial fly," of Linley. Miss Birch gave Beethoven's ballads from the "Canadians," "I am thine, only thine," and "The gifted ring." The instrumental gleanings were from Beethoven, Spohr, Onslow, and Mendelssohn.

AMPHONIC SOCIETY.

This excellent society of artisans, who cultivate the science of "sweet sounds" in preference to pothouse scurrilities, met on Monday evening at the Music Hall, in Store-street, and, under Mr Jacob Mainzer's direction, sang, in very creditable style, choral works of Handel, Beethoven, Mozart, Weber, &c. A symphony and fugue on the organ between the parts, and some solo, duets, &c., were included in the programme.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

Much gratification has been expressed at the announcement that her Majesty has commanded the second Concert for Monday next. The programme is in three acts: in the first, Beethoven's overture to "Prometheus," a duet by Madame Caradori Allan, and Beethoven's Pastorale Symphony; in the second, Mozart's overture to "Zauberflöte," a duet by Madame Caradori and Mr. Joseph Calkan, and Weber's "Oberon;" and in the third part, Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony solely. The selection reflects the highest credit on the taste of the Royal amateurs.

MELODISTS.

This club, which was established in 1825, for the encouragement of melody and ballad composition, dined on Thursday evening at the Freemasons' Tavern, when several songs and glees were sung by a host of vocalists, and solos on the pianoforte and concertina, by Mr. W. H. Holmes and Signor Regondi.

The Earl of Westmorland having offered a prize of ten pounds for the best serenade, and H. W. Smith, Esq., five guineas for the second best, five candidates appeared on the list, whose compositions were sung by Mr. Hobbs, accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Horn. The first prize was awarded to Mr. Parry, the Hon. Secretary; and the second to Mr Blewitt. The Duke of Cambridge will give a prize for a Pastoral Ballad, which will be awarded on the 7th of May, when his Royal Highness will dine with the Club.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

Vieuxtemps, the violinist, has met with great success in Berlin. He is engaged for the Musical Union, and will be here next month. Jenny Lind has injured her foot—an accident, although slight, that threw the amateurs in the Prussian capital into consternation, and assured that her absence from the stage would be but short. Spohr's "Faust" had been played at the Berlin Opera. The Duchess Amily had performed with success in Berlin. Cerito, the danseuse, was engaged at the Berlin Grand Opera. The Paris letters state that Madame Oury, the pianiste, had been received with enthusiasm at the Court of St. Petersburgh. The Duchess Hall had been giving pianoforte matinées. Mario's benefit, at the Italian Opera House had been quite a bumper: he appeared in "Otello." Russell's "Szabat Mater" was played on Tuesday, by Mr. Hill, Grisi, Ronzolla, Mario, and Lablache. The latter was not re-engaged for the season 1846-7; but Coletti, Rovconi, Labiache, Mario, Grisi, and Persiani, were included in the company. Duprez, in "Lucia," and Carlotta Grisi, in the "Diable à Quatre," were still the stars of the Academie Royale. The Siècle intimates that David's new work, "Moise au Sinai," was a failure. Adèle Dumilâtre had returned to Paris, and was to appear in a new ballet. Advices from Gotha announce the continued success of the Duke of Coburg's new opera of "Zaire." The finale of the second and third acts were mightily encored, and the two cavatinas of Zaire, the duo between Zaire and Fatima, and the air of Orosmane, were equally appreciated by the connoisseurs.

CHIT-CHAT.

The Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Montrose papers, contain notices of Mr. Wilson's brilliant successes. He will be in town, and open his season at the Music Hall, on the 27th of April. The veteran Dragonetti, the patriarch of the double bass, is severely indisposed. Mrs. Tolmiin, better known as Miss Fanny Woodham, was about to resume her musical career. The musical engagements for next week are numerous: on Monday, the Lindley Serenaders give their second Morning Concert, at the St. James's Theatre; in the evening, the second Philharmonic Concert, Mr. Lavenu's Monster Concert at Covent Garden, and Mr. Russell's Entertainment Miss Kelly's Theatre. On Tuesday morning, First Meeting of the "Musical Union;" in the evening, Mr. May's Concert, and Mrs. Philips's Irish Minstrelsy. On Wednesday night, "Joshua," at Exeter Hall; the Hutchinson Family, at the Eastern Institution; and Mr M Litchfield's second Pianoforte Soirée. On Thursday, Benedict's benefit, at Drury Lane Theatre; and the Irish Choral Meeting, at Exeter Hall. On Friday, the Hutchinson Family, at the Hanover-square Rooms. The Ethiopian Serenaders, on the off nights of the French Plays. On Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, Her Majesty's Theatre; and Opera at Drury Lane every night. Here is variety enough, in all conscience, for one week.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.—Benedict's opera of "The Crusaders" increases nightly in attraction; and at an early hour last evening the theatre was crowded in every part to witness the twenty-fourth representation of this highly popular production. The "Crown Diamonds" is in rehearsal for Madame Anna Thillon.

ADELPHI-HALL.—Mr. HENNESSEY.—Mr. H. Lawrent, the pianist, gave a concert last Monday evening, assisted by Mr. Ribas (flute); Mr. G Cooke, oboe. Mr. Laurent, jun., cornet-à-piston; and the Misses Williams, Miss Rafter, Messrs. G. Cooke, Bodda, and Rafter, as vocalists. Mr. Louis Emanuel acted as conductor. Mr. H. Laurent performed on the new invented geometrical piano-forte.

GOSSIP OF THE WEEK.

The Parliamentary talk goes on as per last. We cannot find in our heart to joke about it. Matters are too critical. Starvation and fever in Ireland, partial stagnation of trade in England. Yet nothing can be done till the county members have got their say.

We really should have something analagous to a sumptuary law for Parliamentary speakers—a statute of limitations for the orators of St. Stephen's.

However, we must pass from this topic, and on to others more important and less serious.

What of the theatres? Mr. Webster has vindicated his title to the Conservatism of English comedy, by the production of the "Beggar on Horseback." This is really and truly a comedy—possessing, if not a peculiar finish in the dialogue, real merit and force in the conception of its characters. Just now, thanks to the panic, most of the beggars whom the stagging system had mounted, have toppled down in their gallop, or already reached their proverbial destination; but there are enough left to profit by the lesson of the Haymarket comedy. To all purse-proud "snobs" we recommend it.

The civil war in the City has ended; but, by way of compensation, a fearful and bloody one has broken out in that peaceful community which vegetates on the banks of Cam. What was the spark which kindled the train of rivalry and ill-feeling between town and gown we do not know, but there seems to have been an internecine war of undergraduates, inhabitants, and police, which literally raged for some days. The staves of the police made acquaintance, more close than pleasant, with the heads of the gownsmen. A trial at the assizes, which came on just after the war, in which Freestone, a policeman, was found guilty of assault and battery, and imprisoned for a week in consequence, gives a vivid picture of the horrors of town-and-gown warfare, which we have ventured to versify, after the style of Campbell's "Battle of the Baltic."

THE BATTLE OF THE CANTABS.

Of Freestone and the Force,
Sing the glorious renown,
When in battle went to "dorse"
Many a flower of town and gown!
Vain the voice both of Proctor and of Don,
When the gownsmen's gallant band,
With a bludgeon in each hand,
Laugh'd at Freestone's stern command
To "move on."

In glazed hats and coats of blue,
Stood the Peelers in a line,
Headed by their sergeant true,
Ready to kick up a row!
It was just gone two by St. Mary's chim
As they ranged along the path—
Thro' the silence, deep as death,
Freestone said, beneath his breath,
"Now's your time!"

The shindy, no doubt, crushed
Much sooner might have been,
If the Peelers had not rushed
The townsmen and the gown between.
"Keep the peace!" Mr. Proctor cried; scarce he'd done,
When his staff forth Freestone whips,
And a rap the Proctor tips
So heavy, down he slips
In a stun!

To it they went amain,
Staves and bludgeons, whack, whack, whack!
Heads are broke, tho' none are slain,
And the gown at last gave back!
For a mill in such a crowd they had'nt room;
So tho' loath in fight to quail,
The gownsmen must turn tail,
Ergo, the town prevail,
I presume!

Out spake the Proctor then
To the Inspector, mighty grave,
"I've been bored, Sir, by your men,
While the town I tried to save
From a row, which about you helped to bring;
With your deserts you'll meet,
For this indecent feat,
A Proctor, Sir, to beat
An't the thing!"

Now, joy, O Cambridge! raise
For the finish of the fight!
And thy faithful Peelers praise,
For they're always in the right!
Now the gown have got a verdict—all the more—
On Freetone's head they seek
Their vengeance fierce to wreak,
He's imprisoned for a week,
What a bore!

Brave Blues! 'gainst gownsmen's pride
To the town so staunch and true!
Tho' Freestone may be tried,
Yea, tried and sentenced too—
Still 'tis in a good cause! there's comfort for the brave,
So let townsmen all condole
With Freestone, gallant soul!
As I do: and that's the whole
Of my stave.

THE PEERS AND FREE TRADE.—A meeting of Peers, very numerously attended, took place on Wednesday, at the Clarendon Hotel, at which it was unanimously resolved to oppose, by every constitutional means, the progress of the Government Free-Trade measures in the House of Lords.

THE PROTECTMENT OF RAILWAY PROPERTY.—A public meeting has been held in Glasgow for the purpose of adopting such resolutions as might be considered expedient to obtain the postponement or withdrawal of the great mass of railway projects now seeking the sanction of Parliament. The feeling of this meeting was unanimous. The persons who spoke on the occasion admitted to the fullest extent the advantage of railways to the country, and the impropriety, in most cases, of restricting the spirit of enterprise; but they also declared that the diversion of capital it to this one channel would seriously endanger the commercial and agricultural interest of the country, and that the call for so many additional millions as the projected railways would require could not be made without causing serious embarrassment. The resolutions, which were passed without a dissentient voice, were to the effect that the Government should be addressed on the subject. The meeting was most respectably attended.

COUNTRY NEWS.

EXECUTION AT READING.—On Friday (last week), William Spicer was hanged at Reading, for the murder of his wife.—The evening before his execution, Spicer went to bed, and rose at the usual time, and ate a hearty breakfast. With a firm step Spicer mounted the scaffold. The executioner adjusted the cord, and Spicer at that moment moved towards the governor, and said, looking very pale indeed, "I should like to shake hands with you, sir." Lieut. Hackett of course assented, and the poor culprit then observed, "Give my love to your family, sir," and then, with the same imperturbable calmness as before, took his place on the drop, Calcraft pulling the rope round his neck. These were his last words, and everything being arranged, the bolt was withdrawn. The crowd in the meadow opposite consisted of from five to six thousand persons, many of whom came from a long distance to witness the execution. The Berkshire Chronicle says—"It will probably be shortly in our power to lay before the public the full and complete confession which we know that Spicer has made. Unless we are misinformed, it will contain the particulars of one of the most atrocious and deliberate murders it was possible to perpetrate. It is worthy of remark that at a meeting held some time ago, in Reading, in favour of the abolition of capital punishment, Spicer, who attended it, subsequently told a person that he did not agree with what he had heard there, for he thought that murder ought to be punished with death. He was well known to be a very clever and ingenious workman, and sent to the Queen a hundred baskets, which went under a thimble. He was employed, on the basket-maker at Sonning, and, we believe, was a native of Gloucestershire"

COLLISION ON THE BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY.—On Saturday evening the up mixed train, which left Birmingham at forty-five minutes past five, met with an accident of a formidable nature, but which did not, fortunately, cause loss of life or limb to any one. Everything went on well until the train had passed the Cuddington station, but, on entering a deep cutting about two miles from Tring, the train came in violent collision with three luggage waggons, which were most unaccountably left standing on the rails. Most of the passengers were thrown off their seats, and, as soon as they recovered from the shock, some of them came out of the basket-maker at Sonning, and, we believe, was a native of Gloucestershire"

COLLISION ON THE BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY.—On Saturday evening the up mixed train, which left Birmingham at forty-five minutes past five, met with an accident of a formidable nature, but which did not, fortunately, cause loss of life or limb to any one. Everything went on well until the train had passed the Cuddington station, but, on entering a deep cutting about two miles from Tring, the train came in violent collision with three luggage waggons, which were most unaccountably left standing on the rails. Most of the passengers were thrown off their seats, and, as soon as they recovered from the shock, some of them came out of the carriages, and scrambled up the cutting, as there was great fear of the express train coming up and dashing the other train to pieces. The guards, however, immediately despatched men both up and down the line with signals to stop it, and in this they fortunately succeeded. The three waggons were turned off the rails, the first one completely thrown over, and all of them much damaged by the collision. They were in such a position that it was found impossible to get them clear; and, after two hours' delay, the train was taken back as far as Cheddington (three miles), and, after the mail down train had safely passed, was transferred to the other line, and arrived in London about a quarter past one, three hours after the regular time.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—Although the week's arrivals of English wheat have been on a very limited scale, and the stands to-day were scarcely filled with samples, the demand for the article was in a very sluggish state and a clearance was not effected, without giving way [illegible] price. There was very little demand for foreign wheat, free or bonded, for [illegible] tions were pretty generally supported. The supply of barley was small, [illegible] the sale for it was steady, at full currencies. In malt a fair average amount of business was done, and [illegible] well supported. Oats were very scarce, and good dry qualities produced a [illegible] y. Beans, peas, and flour as last advised

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 2190; barley, 1990, oats, 2150. Irish: wheat, ——; barley, ——; oats, ——. Foreign: wheat, 5090; barley, ——; oats, ——. Flour, 580 sacks and [illegible] quarters.

FLOUR.—Privately, only a limited business is doing in this article, and prices are with difficulty supported. The stock is now considerably larger than at the corresponding period in 1845 Several vessels have been sold on passage.

Sugar.—The show of West India sugar being small, only a moderate business has been doing in it, at late rates. All other kinds of raw sugar have sold at very full prices. Refined goods are selling at higher figures

Coffee.—At the supply of coffee is fully adequate to the wants of the trade, the demand, privately, is in a sluggish state, yet prices are generally supported

Tea.—The article is very dull, on somewhat lower terms

Provisions.—Fair average supplies of Irish butter have come to hand this week. The [illegible] qualities have been in good request, and prices have ruled [illegible] for Friesland: the [illegible] 104s for inferior to 108s per cwt. Foreign has been in moderate request, at 98s to 104s for Belgian and Friesland, and 74s to 84s for Carlow, Cork, and Waterford. English continues in good request, and prices have [illegible] per firkin. Carlow Bacon [illegible] and 44s to 46s per cwt. The arrivals of bacon being large the quotations have fallen to [illegible] per cwt. Prime sizeable Waterford, due to 60s landed for forward delivery. Town Bacon, at 42s per cwt. Hams are in fair request, [illegible] dale sell at 48s to 60s per cwt. The former, and 44s to 54s for the latter. Hams and all other kinds of provisions dull.

Tallow. This market is steady, at 43s 3d [illegible] 6d for prime Y. C. on the spot, and 41s 9d to 42s 3d for forward delivery. Town Tallow 39s, at 4—8d to 40s per cwt., net cash [illegible] and very steady, and prices are somewhat higher. In other oils a steady business is doing.

MONEY, HARBERT.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

There appeared some promise at the opening of the market on Monday, that an improved tone, arising from the success of the army in India, would animate business, and enhance prices. Consols quoted 95¾ for Money, and 96⅛ ⅜ for Account. The position of the Oregon question, and the certainty that the Indian war must yet exist for an indefinite period, soon, however, brought down Consols to the prices of the previous week. A belief exists that the despatches daily anticipated from America will not be so pacific as many contingent, consequently large sales of Stock continue to be made for the fall. These sales, and the purchases on behalf of the Savings' Banks, and National Debt, have constituted the principal business of the market during the week. The price of Consols since Monday has been 95¾ to 96 for Money, and 96 to ⅛ for Account, with the exception of a slight depression on Tuesday. A rally towards the close, however, again restored prices, and the closing quotations are 95⅞ to 96 for money, and 96⅛ to ⅜ for Account. Exchequer Bills have been heavy during the week, quoting on Monday only 22 24 pm. They close a point better, viz., 24 28 25 pm. Bank Stock is 210 for the Opening, and Terminable Annuities, 10¼. The other Stock open for transfer early in April.

[illegible] incident that occurred to relieve the dulness of the Foreign Market during the week was the Spanish Coup d'Etat. As it became known but a short time before the close of business, the effect on the Market was of course very slight. Some anticipations of speculation were, however, indulged in for the following day, but no such result followed. The public seem to care very little what becomes the Misery of Spain. Each Finance Minister has his pet stock, and the only interest excited is to procure early information upon that particular point, and await the development of his financial proposition to secure the profit. The Stock on Monday quoted 26 for the Five per Cents., receded to 25¾ on Tuesday, and has since gradually fallen to 25⅜, at which it closes. The Three per Cents. on Monday were 97, and close at 96⅞ to ⅞; Reduces at 96⅝. Mexican has ranged between 29 and 30, Portuguese Four per Cents. are steady at 57¾. Dutch have scarcely varied, closing at 59¾ to ⅞ for the Two-and-a-Half per Cents.; Four per Cents, 99¾ to 99⅝. Grenada Bonds are 22, and Russian at 106.

The Share Market continues in a most depressed condition, and registered lines of the highest character are gradually receding to a discount. Of this class, Jodoin can quote ½ to ¾ discount; Chester and Holyhead, 3 to 2 discount; Leeds and York Shares have also receded to ¾ ⅛ discount, and Direct Northern, ¾ discount. The dealers are, in many instances, sellers, and a feeling that the Government should interfere to prevent any new bills from passing this session, is growing daily. A reference to the subjoined list will display the extent of depression:—Ambergate, Nottingham, Boston, and Eastern Junction, 1½; Birmingham and Gloucester, 12½; Bristol and Exeter, New, 9½; Bucking hamshire, 6 dis.; Caledonian, 7½; Ditto, Half Shares, 1½; Ditto, Extension, 1½; Chester and Holyhead, 1½; Direct Manchester (Rastrick's), 3½; Direct Northern, 1½; Dublin and Belfast Junction, 5½; Dublin and Galway, 1½; Eastern Counties, 1½; Ditto, New, 5½ pm.; Ditto, York Extension, 1½; Ditto, Lincolnshire, ½; East and West of England, ½; Edinburgh and Glasgow 7½; Ditto Half Shares, 12; Ditto Quarter Shares, 18; East and Suffolk, ½; Goole, Don, and Sheffi, &c., 5½; Grand Union (Nottingham and Lynn), ½; Great Eastern and Western, —; Great South, and West, (Ireland) 16½; Ditto, Extension; Great North of England, 21½; New, —; Great Western, 14½; Ditto, Half Shares, —; Ditto, Quarter Shares, 14; Ditto Fifths, —; Hull and Selby, 99; Ditto, Half Shares, 24; Ditto, Quarter Shares, 20; Ipswich, Norwich, and Yarmouth, —; Irish North Midland, [illegible] Ditto New, 6; Leicester and Bedford, [illegible] Ditto, Leicester, Nottingham, Boston, &c., ½; Liverpool and Leeds Direct, 1½; Liverpool, Manchester, and Newcastle Junction, ½; London and Birmingham, 216; Ditto Thirds, 49½; Ditto Quarters, 26; Ditto Fifths, 20½; London and Blackwall, 7½; Ditto New, 3½; London and Brighton, 61; Ditto ditto, Fifths, 20½; London and Croydon, 19½; Ditto, Guaranteed Five per Cent., —; London and Greenwich, 9½; London and South-Western, 7½; London and York, 4½; London, Warwick, and Kidderminster, 1½; Manchester and Leeds Fifths, 10½; Manchester and Birmingham, 75; Ditto Quarter Shares (A), 11; Ditto ditto (B), 8½; Manchester and Southampton, 1½; Midland, 14½; Ditto, New, 27; Ditto, Birmingham and Derby, 112; Newcastle and Berwick, 16; North British, 23; Ditto, Half Shares, 7; Ditto, Carlisle Extension, 1½; North East and Direct Dover, 1½; North Staffordshire, 1½ pm.; Norwich and Brandon, 2½; Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, 9½; Perth and Inverness, 1½; Portsmouth Direct, 2½; Rugby and Huntingdon, ½; Scottish Central, 13; Shrewsbury and Birmingham, 1½; South Midland, ½ discount; South Staffordshire, ½ pm.; South Wales, 1½; South Eastern and Dover, 9½; Do. AGRICULTURAL PICTURES.—LAMBING.

AGRICULTURAL SCENES.—LAMBING.

This interesting scene has been chosen by our Artist as illustrative of the Agricultural business of the month of March. The care of newly-dropped lambs should call forth the best feelings of the shepherd. "If any of the lambs," says the Rev. W. L. Rham, in his valuable Dictionary of the Farm, "are weak, or scarcely able to stand, he must give them a little of the milk, which at these times he should carry about him, or he must place them in some sheltered warm place; in the course of a little while, the young one will, probably, be able to join its dam. The lambing field often presents, at this period, a strange spectacle. Some of the younger ewes, in the pain and confusion and fright of their first parturition, abandon their lambs. Many of them, when the udder begins to fill, will search out their offspring with unerring precision; others will search in vain for it in every part of the field, with incessant and piteous bleating; others, again, will hang over their dead offspring, from which nothing can separate them; while a few, strangely forgetting that they are mothers, will graze unconcernedly with the rest of the stock!"

Bloomfield, the Poet of the Farm, sings:—

> Say, ye that know, ye who have felt and seen,
> Spring's morning smiles, and soul-enlivening green,
> Say, did you the thrilling transport way?
> Did your eye brighten, when young lambs at play
> Lead'd o'er your path with animated pride,
> Or gaz'd in merry clusters by your side?
> * * * * *
> A few begin the short but vigorous race,
> And Indolence shash'd soon flies the place;
> Thus challeng'd forth, see thither, one by one,
> From ev'ry side assembling playmates run;
> A thousand wily antics mark their stay,
> A starting crowd, impatient of delay.
> Away they scour, impetuous, ardent, strong,
> The green turf trembling as they bound a ong
> Adown the slope, then up the hillock climb,
> Where every hillock is a bed of thyme.
> There panting stop; yet scarcely can refra n
> A bird, a leaf, will set them off again
> Or, if a gale with strength unusual blow,
> Scatt'ring the wild-briar roses into snow,
> Their little limbs increasing efforts try,
> Like the torn flower, the fair assemblage fly.

Thomson, too, sings of the shepherd, who

> Around him feeds his many-bleating flock
> Of various cadence; and his sportive lambs,
> This way, and that, convolv'd in frisk'ful glee,
> Their little frolics play. And now the race
> Invites them forth; when swift, the signal given,
> They start away, and sweep the mazy mound
> That runs around the hill

Lastly:—

> Ay! 'tis a sweet and blessed sight,
> Ye types of innocence, when spring
> Beholds you in your wild delight
> And all your playful gambolling.
> Now racing gaily with each other,
> Unmindful of your bleating mother;
> And now in mimic fight, with brow
> High raised to deal the harmless blow;
> Then wheeling, skipping high in air—
> Oh! no! no sight is half so fair.

ANGLING NOTES FOR THE MONTH.

As the Angling season may be considered to have fairly commenced, we propose to give, from time to time during its course, a series of Notes and Reminiscences of "the Gentle Art" in all its branches—from the lowest depth of bottom-fishing for eels to the sublimity of fly-fishing for salmon.

ANGLING!—there is magic in the very word. It is a spell that calls up visions of past pleasures, and that cheers "without intoxicating" the imagination with hopes of future sport. Its practice is delightful, and the remembrance of it scarcely less pleasing; and we may say of it what Goethe says of love—

> Erinnerung der Liebe ist wie Liebe, Glück
> The pleasures of Angling contain no alloy;
> Like Angling itself is its memory—a joy

The love of Angling appears to be innate: the boy seems to take to the rod and line as naturally as the girl does to her doll. By the time that he is breeched, or even before, he finds his way to the stream, if there be one within a mile of his home; and there, with a pack-thread, and a pin-hook, baited with a worm, he stands, the type and "father of the man: scheming himself in the exercise of patience, and encouraged to persevere by the hope of catching a minnow. A year or two after—when he has cast his pin-a-fore, and has become the owner of a knife—he applies his more ample means and more developed faculties to the improvement of his tackle. He makes for himself a rod proper, of no less than three pieces, the top being of real whalebone; by means of his hat and a crooked pin he spins a hair line, taking special care not to make it too thin; and, after a great deal of paring and burning, he converts a large cork into a float, which, notwithstanding all his pains to give it a handsome form, is more like a miniature cone in than a dwarf pear. His baits now are more varied and select, he scours his fish-worms before using them; collects grubs and brandlings, worms in old dung hills, and for cod-bait in the sandy bottoms of shallow streams; and, to the great annoyance of the whole family, he "breeds his own crew."

THE TROUT.

Thus he goes on from year to year, his love of the art increasing as his skill in its practice improves; till, having passed through all the intermediate degrees of sniggling, bobbing, daping, whipping, trolling, &c., &c., he goes to the river with an eighteen feet rod, and fishes fly for salmon. Having fairly killed and landed, "off his own hook," without any aid, a vigorous twelve-pounder, he feels that he is justly entitled to the degree of M.A.—a Master in the Art of Angling and, in consequence, accordingly, he tries, the next Sunday morning, the edge of his father's razor on the down of his upper lip; and imagines that at church the eyes of all the congregation will be fixed on him because he has killed a salmon and tried his hand at shaving himself. Having attended the Angler thus far in his progress, we shall, for the present, leave him, and look after the fish.

The cut of a Trout appended to the present article is an indication that this fish is one of the most likely to afford sport to the Angler for the month to come. The season, however, in which trout rise most freely and are in the best condition, is from about the first week in May to the middle of June. It may be observed, as a general rule, that trout fishing is at the best while the lilac is in flower, and that after the elder has come into flower it begins to decline: this holds good in all latitudes where the trout is to be found, and where the lilac and elder bloom. But of this more anon, in its due season.

During the month of April, trout may be angled for at all times of the day, from sunrise to sunset, with nearly the same chances of success; but, as the season advances, and the heat and brightness of the sun's rays become more intense, while the water gradually becomes smaller and clearer, the best time is from dawn till about nine in the morning, and from four in the afternoon till sunset. He who is wishful to catch large trout, and does not mind being called a "poacher," will be most likely to succeed by continuing to angle for an hour after sunset.

By far the most pleasant mode of angling for trout is with the fly; and we may here observe that the fly which will tempt trout to rise in April loses none of its seductive properties as the season advances. That there may be a proper fly for every month, and even for every particular stream, we shall not here deny; but shall content ourselves with observing, that since we first commenced fly-fishing, "a long time ago," we have taken trout in many different streams and in different months with the same kind of fly, to wit, with a fly of a dun colour when viewed in the pocket-book or lying on the hand, but displaying no positive colour when seen in the water. Even when quite new and the gloss still on its wings, it would puzzle an entomologist to declare the species which had formed its original type; and, after it has been drawn a dozen times through a rippling stream, it is about as like "a flying thing of life" as a scarecrow is like "a gallant hussar" in his new uniform.

Most anglers have some favourite fly, which, they tell you—and tell you truly—that they kill most with, though not for the reason which they frequently assign, namely, that there is something peculiarly attractive in the shape and colour of the fly, but merely because it is in reality an "indifferent good" fly, and because they fish most with it. A different kind of fly is preferred by others, and, as they use it most frequently, they find it killing too. Two friends, equally skilful in the management of the rod and line, go out to the water in a morning, and both fish for the same time, and with the same kind of fly, without success; one of them changes his fly once, twice, thrice, and at length he hooks a fish, and then another, and another; and thus he goes on filling his pannier, and ascribing his success to the lucky qualities of his fly. The other, however, who has not changed his fly, finds the fish begin to take it about the same time; and concludes that his want of success, in the first instance, was not owing to any defect in his fly, but to the indisposition of the fish to feed. At present, we shall not enter into any detail respecting the different kinds of flies; but shall merely observe that, in Angling for large trout in still water, we consider it best to use only one; and that, when we use two or three for small trout in streamy places, we are very indifferent about having them of different kinds or colours, seeing that the stretcher, or fly at the end of the line, whatever be its colour, is more frequently taken than either of the droppers. Towards evening, it is advisable to use a rather large and light coloured fly.

It is generally observed that trout do not take the fly freely either in gloomy weather, or when the sun shines bright. April weather—an alternation of sunshine and cloud, with a moderate south-west breeze gently rippling the surface of the stream—is the most favourable for the Fly-fisher "at all seasons of the year." In April, and in early spring generally, trouts are more disposed to rise at the fly about mid-day, than when the season is more advanced. At the latter period, they are more inclined to take the worm about mid-day, more especially in streamy places, just above the head of a pool, when the water is clearing after a fall of rain.

A PRESENT TO HER MAJESTY. Some time after the passengers of the unfortunate steamer, the Great Liverpool, had been safely landed, it occurred to the late Captain M'Leod that it was possible to save from the wreck a box which had been specially consigned to his care, containing a present to Her Majesty from a wealthy native merchant of Bombay. Captain M'Leod, accompanied by the chief officer, Mr. Lauchlan, and two of the crew, got on board the steamer, and cut through the deck to the place where the box was deposited, and with great danger and difficulty got it to shore, and from thence it was conveyed with the usual boxes to Cornhill, and delivered to the care of the Consul, who, fearing it might have been damaged by being so long under water, unpacked the box in the presence of the captain and officers. Although it was indeed in many cases, the water had penetrated through them to the morocco case, which was richly ornamented with the Royal Arms of England. The present consisted of a large sized and richly-wrought gold box, an exquisite specimen of Eastern workmanship, worthy of Benvenuto Cellini; the box was supported by four stands in the form of snakes, and it contained several dresses of the most elegant and costly fabric, worked by the needle, and of cobweb texture, but the salt water had penetrated, and the Consul's wife and them carefully washed and repacked, and they were transmitted with the mails to Southampton. Just before Captain M'Leod committed suicide, he gave into the charge of the Consul a handkerchief containing gold, with which he had been intrusted, to deliver to a merchant in London, with a special recommendation that it should be forwarded to its destination.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

PONTEFRACT CASTLE

This fine specimen of the Norman Keep is a relic of the massive structure, built by Ilbert de Lacy, at Pontefract, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, in the tenth year after the Conquest. Ilbert was a great favourite with William, and received from him a grant of the place; and soon after his vast possessions had been confirmed to him, he began to build this Castle, which partook of the features of castle, fortress, and palace. It was placed on an elevated rock, and had a most extensive and picturesque view of the surrounding country. It was not commanded by any particular hill, and could only be taken by blockade. The wall of the Castle was high, and flanked by seven towers. A deep moat was cut on the western side, where also were the barbican and draw-bridge; there were other gates which might be used as watch-towers, and some of them were protected by draw-bridges. The dungeons were frightfully deep and gloomy. The area covered and inclosed by this immense building was about seven acres.

In the times when it was erected, it served as a protection to the retainers of the family of the Lacies, as well as to other persons who came to settle here from a less protected district, and thus gradually would rise the village, town, church, and market. The town was named from the Castle, which Ilbert called Pontifract, from, some fancied, to a place so called in Normandy, where he was born.

The Castle remained in the Lacy family until 1310, when Henry de Lacy, having no male children, left his estates to his daughter Alice, who was married to Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, uncle to Edward II. In the quarrels between that weak-minded Prince and his Nobles, the Earl of Lancaster acted a conspicuous part. He was taken prisoner with many other Barons, and brought to Pontefract Castle, which had fallen into the hands of the Royal army. Here he was imprisoned, condemned without being heard in his defence, and executed.

Pontefract Castle was afterwards the scene of imprisonment and death:—

> I have been studying how I may compare
> This prison, where I live, unto the world.
> SHAKSPEARE'S Richard II, Act V. Sc. V.

Here, too, the Duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III., shed the blood of several victims, in order to make more easy his accession to the throne. In the reign of Henry VIII., the fortress surrendered to the famous Robert Aske, Captain-general of the Pilgrims of Grace; and during the Civil Wars, between Charles I. and the Parliamentarians, the Castle was frequently besieged and defended by both parties. It was subsequently dismantled by order of Parliament, after being, for 600 years, the ornament and terror of the surrounding country.

RUINS OF PONTEFRACT CASTLE.

At the present day, but few of its ruins remain; and the area is chiefly occupied by gardens and a quarry of filtering-stones, which are in great request in all parts of the Kingdom.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.

"A Beggar on Horseback" is the significant name of a comedy produced at this house, with complete success, last Saturday evening. It is written by Mr Sullivan, a gentleman not altogether unknown in literary and dramatic circles. He has contributed to the Annuals and works of a similar class for some time; and a few years ago he wrote a drama for this theatre called "The Philosophers of Berlin." He also produced the five-act play of "The King's Friend," at Sadler's Wells, last April, of which we wrote a notice in the number of the Illustrated London News for May 2nd. The comedy, however, is his greatest achievement.

This is the plot: Cyprian Foxall (Mr. Webster) is a low, cunning vagabond, the nephew of a rich old money-lender, who has died intestate. Previous to his death he had discarded his nephew; but Cyprian, with an eye to the future, had recommended to his uncle a confidential servant, Morecraft (Mr. W. Farren), and had also contrived to possess himself of the affections of Emmeline (Mrs. Seymour). But finding himself unexpectedly heir to a large property on the death of the old man, he determines to marry some lady highly connected, to give him a position; and to advance these projects he turns Emmeline out of his house. Sir John Coverdale (Mr Tilbury), an old Baronet much embarrassed, is deeply indebted to Cyprian's estate. He has a proud, beautiful daughter, Selina (Miss Julia Bennett); and Cyprian informs Sir John and Lady Coverdale (Mrs. Glover) that he will forego the mortgage, provided he marries the daughter. The Baronet agrees very readily to the proposal, and Cyprian is left to press his suit with Selina. But the young lady is already in love with her cousin Horace (Mr. Hudson); and, in this dilemma, they determine to apply to her brother Ernest (Mr. H. Holl), for his advice. Meanwhile, Emmeline, who has been turned out of Cyprian's house, wanders to the park, where she encounters Ernest, who has, for some time, paid her attentions, arising from a chance meeting when she was walking in that locality, attended by her servant. There is a love scene between Ernest and Emmeline, in which she refuses his hand, and they are about to part, when Horace and Selina arrive. The four combine to assist each other. Cyprian is seen approaching, on which the ladies retire, and the upstart is soundly "badgered" by Ernest and Horace. He puts down their taunts, however, by alluding to the mortgage. Selina returns, and tells Cyprian his own story, which she has just learned from Emmeline. He is immediately discarded, and goes away vowing vengeance upon all of them. Morecraft, who has been seeking Emmeline, now appears, and somewhat comforts the quartette by telling them that, as soon as their troubles are at their height, he will assist them, having been turned away by Cyprian.

We next find the parties re-assembled at Cyprian's lawyer's, to arrange the marriage contracts. Ernest and Horace attend to see everything fairly arranged; Selina is very nearly sacrificed, when Morecraft arrives, and proves that old Foxall did not die intestate, but left certain papers by which Emmeline comes into possession of all his property. This entirely alters the position of the parties. Cyprian hastens back to Emmeline to renew his suit; it is rejected with utter contempt. His bullies, threatens, and abuses, but is met at every point by Morecraft and Emmeline now gives her hand to Horace. She makes Sir John a present of his mortgage, portions Selina, and amply provides for Morecraft, whilst Cyprian Foxall is alone saved from prison by her generosity.

Excellent as this comedy certainly is, we do not altogether accord to it the unqualified praise awarded by some of our contemporaries. But we must be understood as not wishing to detract from its merits in any way; merely to put them in their proper light. Believing the true aim of comedy to be a delineation of the motives and manners of the day, "A Beggar on Horseback" does not appear "London Assurance," in our opinion, the very best modern comedy: we mean no exception. The dialogue is, at times, very smart, but never brilliant; there more upon the interest of situation than the sparkle of epigram, and the points in it spring from the progress of the action rather than the sharpness of its wit. This proves, however, that the piece is admirably constructed, and, indeed, through out the five acts, the interest never flags. Mr. Sullivan's dramatic tact is evidently of no ordinary kind.

It was admirably performed down to the most insignificant characters. Cyprian Foxall was the part of the piece, and we never saw Mr. Webster to greater advantage. His "make up" was very clever: and his acting of the first order His overbearing, vulgar assurance, at the commencement of the piece, and his low, brutal rage and fawning servility at the end, when renewing his suit to Emmeline, were powerful delineations. Mr. Farren's Morecraft was played with more nerve than we have lately been accustomed to look for in the gentleman's impersonations; at the same time it was quiet, although intensely significant. He made every one of his replies tell. Mr. Tilbury played Sir John Coverdale with care and judgment; and Mrs. Glover, as his lady, was delicious: but the part was not one of great importance. Messrs. Hudson and H. Holl had little more to do than support the characters of two superior walking gentlemen, and this they did effectively. Miss Julia Bennett was an interesting Selina; and Mrs. Seymour, towards the end of the piece, acted with much earnestness: we were less pleased with her in the earlier scenes, but the manner in which she gave her heart to Ernest elicited a round of applause. Of the minor parts, Mr. J. Bland's German tailor and Messrs. Brindall and Carle's livery servants were capitally sustained.

The applause throughout the comedy was very great, and at the end enthusiastic. All the principal performers re-appeared upon the stage, and Mr. Sullivan, in acknowledging a loud call for the author, bowed from his private box. We prophesy a long ride for the "Beggar on Horseback," who did not, on this occasion, reach his proverbial destination.

SCENE FROM THE NEW COMEDY OF "A BEGGAR ON HORSEBACK," AT THE HAYMARKET THEATRE.

THE LATE JOHN LISTON, ESQ.

Death, with his ever-restless hand, has seized upon the prompter's bell, and, by his deadly touch, changed its light and tinkling sound into the sad and heavy tolling of a funeral knell; the sable curtain of the life's drama has fallen, and shut out for ever from mortal view, one of the brightest stars that ever shone upon the British stage. Liston, the incomparable Liston, is no more. For how many years have we not been accustomed to smile even at his name! Alas, poor Yorick, where be your gibes now? The death of Liston cannot fail to cause a heavy sigh to all who have felt the slightest love for the drama; he was "himself alone," unlike all before him, and we "never shall look up on his like again." One of the greatest proofs of his thorough originality may be pointed out in the fact that, whilst there have been your twenties and fifties who could mimic the action and the voice of a Kemble or a Kean, and of every other actor they attempted, there has never been one successful imitation given of Liston.

John Liston was born 1776, and was, consequently, at his decease, seventy years of age.

His father lived in Norris-street, Haymarket, and young John Liston, having received a superior education at Dr. Barrow's, Soho School, became, in 1793, Second Master at the Grammar, or Library School, Castle-street, Leicester-square, under Archdeacon Tennyson. The turn for study and extensive reading he imbibed at this period never again forsook him: there have been few persons greater readers than Liston.

It appears, that thus early, Fame, in a theatric form, had waved her seductive banner before his mind's eye; for we find young Liston actually being turned out of the school for acting plays with the big boys. He was, after this, for some time in the office of the father to the present Sir George Carroll. It has been stated that Mr. Liston and Mr. Mathews both acted, in early days, at the Sans Pareil. This we must beg to doubt. Elliston, Lovegrove, and some others, whose names afterwards became well known, did act there, but only in private, in the first floor, or Bins Room. The Sans Pareil, at that time, was the property and residence of Mr. John Scott, of blue-dye notoriety, and father to Miss Scott, a well-known actress and authoress, to show off whose talents Mr Scott had his premises converted into a temple of Thespis, which, in 1819, was purchased by Rodwell and Jones, and then opened as the Adelphi Theatre.

THE LATE MR. LISTON.

¶The really first time Mr. Liston performed in London is known but to few. It was at the Haymarket, not during the regular season, but at one of the benefit which frequently took place there, by permission of the Lord Chamberlain; the benefit was for Mr. Charles Kemble, and the character supported by Mr. Liston was Bombelio in the "Iron Chest."

Mr. Liston now began to think seriously of the drama as a profession, for, feeling, with Lord Chesterfield, that "a well-conducted stage is an ornament to society," he could not comprehend how any one could object to his becoming a member of a stage so conducted; he, therefore, made application to two of his relations for pecuniary assistance to enable him to prosecute his fondly-cherished design, but was refused. His application in another quarter meeting more successful, he obtained forty pounds, which he spent in theatrical properties. He had an engagement for a very short period in Lee's company, at Taunton; he then went to Manager Hughes at Exeter; and, afterwards, to the theatre at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, then under the management of Mr. Stephen Kemble, the celebrated Falstaff. He went by sea, for cheapness, but was beaten about by adverse winds for a fortnight. Provisions at last so short that Liston was reduced to his last luck of dry cheese.

We may imagine Mr. Liston's look of horror and despair, when, one morning, opening the scene, what should he see but a large raw animal being cut through a hole in his berth, bearing away the last hoarded morsel of his provisions. Fortunately, on that morning, they made the port, and he hurried at once to the theatre. When he arrived there, he found Stephen Kemble sitting in full state in the centre of the stage, directing a rehearsal. Mr. Kemble eyed him several times before he spoke; at last he growled out, "Well, young man, you are come." Mr Liston bowed. "Then now you may go back again!—you have spoken your engagement by being too late." "It's very easy to say go back," replied Liston, with one of his peculiar looks, "but here I am, and here I must stay, for I have not a farthing left in the world." Whether it was Master's originality of manner in saying this, or whether a little pity touching Stephen Kemble caused him to forget his ill-humour very quickly, we know not, but certain it is, Mr. Liston remained at Newcastle until he came for good to London.

RESIDENCE OF THE LATE MR. LISTON, AT KNIGHTSBRIDGE.

The first comic part Mr. Liston ever performed, was the very subordinate one of Diggory, in "She Stoops to Conquer." He took a great fancy to the character, and kept his intentions as to the manner he meant to play it in, and the style of dress he should wear, a profound secret until the last moment. When he made his appearance, so original was his whole conception of the thing, that not an actor on the stage could speak a word for laughing: thus, in such a trifle as Diggory, commenced the vein of comic humour which, at last, rendered him one of the greatest comic actors that has ever trodden the boards. When he came off the stage, Mr. Kemble said, "Young man, it strikes me you have mistaken your forte; there's something comic about you." "I've not mistaken my forte," replied Mr Liston; "there never before allowed me to play it: I don't think, myself, I was made for the heavy Barons!" Liston was, in after years, a prodigious favourite in Newcastle. He lodged in a narrow lane turning out of Pilgrim-street, in a house, now no more, bearing the sign of the "Black Bull." It was a very humble abode; but for many years after he became the great Liston, he always went to the same house to lodge, when visiting Newcastle.

On the 10th of June, 1805, Mr. Liston made his first acknowledged appearance in London. It was at the Haymarket Theatre—the following was the bill of that night:

"THEATRE ROYAL HAYMARKET.—This Evening, THE MOUTAINEERS, Octavian, Mr. Elliston; Baltazin Muley, Mr. Cambell (his first appearance on this stage); Agnes, Miss Tyrer (her first appearance these three years). After which, THE VILLAGE LAWYER. Sampson, Mr. Liston (from the Theatre Royal, Newcastle, being his first appearance on this stage)."

It is curious to remark that the young lady announced as making "her first appearance these three years," on the same night that Mr. Liston made his first appearance, was the pretty little Miss Tyrer, soon destined to become his household idol—the solace of his declining life—the honour and the comfort of his home for nearly forty years. Mr. Liston did not make any great sensation on his first night, for we do not even find him repeating the character for some time. His second part in London was Zekiel Homespun, Friday, June 14. When he first came to London, he generally wore a pea-green coat, and was everywhere accompanied by an ugly little pug-dog. This dog, like his master, soon made him himself a favourite, go where he would, and seemed exceedingly proud that he could make almost as many laugh as the comic man. This pug-dog acted as Mr. Liston's second courier, always trotting on before, to announce his friend and master. The frequenters of the Orange Coffee House, Cockspur-street, where Liston resided, always began laughing as they said "Oh, Liston, will be here in a moment, for here's his beautiful pug."

On the 15th of October, 1805, Mr. Liston made his first appearance at Covent-Garden Theatre, as Jacob Gawky, in "The Chapter of Accidents;" in this he was highly successful: he also made a great stand in a new character, called Gaby Grim, in "We Fly by Night." But the earliest epoch of his great success may be looked upon as the night on which he first performed Lord Grizzle, in "Tom Thumb," Saturday, June 20th, 1807; he then introduced the dancing-song, in which his elegant and symmetrical form was shewn off to great advantage: this song he generally sung three times. Upon this occasion there was another person, closely connected with him, who made a sensation scarcely less powerful than his own; this was the late Miss Tyrer, now Mrs Liston—she was the inimitable Dame Dollalolla; they had been married on the 22nd of March, at St. Martin's Church. Their mutual friend Charles Taylor, the celebrated Rosalind in "Tom Thumb," with his amiable wife, gave them their wedding-breakfast at Mrs. Liston's present residence, Fife House, No. 1, Knightsbridge, at the time a box, who entered the army in 1839, and is now Senior Captain of the 8th King's Own—and a daughter, who married Rodwell, the well-known composer and author.

That Mr. Liston did really imagine he could be a tragic actor, is partly borne out by his actually having attempted Octavian, in "The Mountaineers," on the 17th of May 1809. Now, although he could not sustain a whole tragic character, there were touches of pathos in his acting at times that seldom failed to draw tears from the feeling heart—witness, his Domestic Sampson, when he is told he must leave his benefactor's child, Lucy Sterman. And, for fine sterling acting, what could surpass his Adam Brook, in Plan-le's charming drama of "Charles the Twelfth," produced at Drury-lane, Nov. 11th, 1828?

At the time, Mr. Abbot had an English company in Paris. Mr. Liston performed there for one or two nights, but he made no great impression upon the Parisians. At this we cannot wonder, for they discovered that Mr. Chapman was a better Richard the Third, the great Kean, and, in their eyes, Miss Smithson was the beau ideal of a fine actress.

In 1823, January 28th, Mr. Liston commenced an engagement, at £50 per week, at Drury-Lane, in the character of Tony Lumpkin, in "She Stoops to Conquer." In the following year, Friday, May 21st, 1824, King George the Fourth honoured him in a signal manner by commanding the "Hypocrite," and with his own hands encircling him in Moneyed mock sermon. This sermon was always encored afterwards. The next year, 1825, was to be the climax of Mr. Liston's popularity. On the 13th September, in this year, Mr. Poole's celebrated comedy of "Paul Pry" was produced; the character of Paul Pry, Mr. Liston. The furor for this piece was immense. Mr. Liston was now to be seen mimicked in all conceivable materials—plaster, clay, china, butter; he gave signs to public-houses and pauses to coaches; even in the centre of pocket-handkerchiefs then was Liston to be found as Paul Pry: he was everywhere.

The next marked portion of his theatrical career may be looked upon as the first step into the seventh age of his histrionic life: it was his joining Madame Vestris, at the Olympic, in 1831. He appeared on the first night of the season as Dominique, in Mr. Charles Dance's piece of "Talk of the Devil." At this theatre he received £60 per week, and continued to perform there with unabated attraction until the end of the season 1837. He never took a formal farewell of the stage, and the last night he ever performed was for the benefit of Mr. James Vining, at the Lyceum, in Mr Planché's admired drama, "A Peculiar Position," the character of Monsieur Champignon, Mr. Liston

Thus ended the theatrical existence of one of the drama's most brilliant stars.

Were we asked what made Liston the great actor he was, we should answer, the three qualities, without which no actor can be great—NATURE, TRUTHFULNESS, and STUDY. Nature, in her comic mood, had certainly lavished her gifts upon him; his upper lip, which was very deep, possessed a most extraordinary power of expression. He was always of the superior class. For some years past, he half grew old in society but little. His attention to religion was always marked by no ostentation, but by a devout sincerity; his knowledge of the Scriptures was very extensive.

The illness, which ultimately ended in death, first attacked him about four years since, in the form of apoplexy, from such attacks he was relieved from time to time by the usual means. The last took place, without the slightest warning, on the after dinner, on Monday, March 16, from which time he never spoke again. His usual medical attendant, Dr. Cumming, of Lowndes-street, Belgrave-square, assisted by Dr. Mackintyre and Mr. R bert Liston, the eminent surgeon, did all that science could do, to save his life, but in vain. On Sunday morning last, March 22nd, at a quarter to eleven, he breathed his last in the arms of Mrs. Liston; who, for many years of the most happy, 39 years before, had sworn to love and cherish him till death, and thus, to the latter, she fulfilled her vow.

The mortal remains of this great actor will be interred very early on Monday morning, in the grounds of the Cemetery, at Kensal-green.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

MORE RAILWAY LITIGATION.—At the Assizes at Liverpool, on Tuesday, a case was tried, Marsden v. Newmarsh and others, involving an important point respecting the sale of Railway shares. The plaintiff, Mr. Marsden, sued Mr. Thomas Marsden, against Francis Newmarsh and John H. Waddington, the defendants, for the recove ry of certain losses which the plaintiff had sustained by reason of the defendants having agreed, according to order, certain shares in various lines of railway. The defendants denied the contract, and put the plaintiff to prove the averments in the declaration. Witnesses having been called on the part of the defendants, and the plaintiff and his Lordship summed up. The Jury, after a brief consultation, returned a verdict for the defendant as to the issues on the Leeds and Thirsk, and for the plaintiff on the Shrewsbury and Herefordshire, for the difference between the price of the shares on the 7th October and to-day £100, with liberty to the Court to reduce damages by altering dates and referring to share-lists.

LIABILITIES OF RAILWAY ALLOTTEES.—At the Exeter Assizes, on Friday (last week) an action was tried in which the Committee of Management of the defunct "Direct Exeter and Plymouth Railway Company" sought to recover from Mr. Toby, an attorney, of Exeter, the sum of £105, being the amount of deposits on 40 shares which had been allotted to him on his application. The shares were not allotted till a ter the panic; and it appeared that very few of the allottees had paid any deposits, as of 1 aid let the Committee of Management to order certain shares in the survey", &c. Sergeant Kinglake, for the defendant, contended that there had been a change in the provisional directors after the application and before the allotment had been made, and that therefore there could be no contract between the defendant and them. The Committee of Management itself was changed, and that the defendant was only bound to take shares in the Company as it was when he applied. Sergeant Kinglake further contended there had been no allotment of shares, as shares could only exist after the Act of Parliament had been obtained, whereas this must be treated as an abandoned scheme, in which the projectors could not recover at all. He contended that if the law should be of opinion the allotment was properly made to the defendant, the damages should be £3, the proportion of 3s. per share for the expenses, and not £105. The Judge said he would reserve the point for Sergeant Kinglake to argue in banc on a case to be set in the Court above. The Jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs for the full amount claimed.

A MAN CONVICTED OF THE MURDER OF HIS WIFE. At Leicester, on Monday, William Hubbard was tried for the murder of his wife, Hannah Hubbard, in that town, on the 11th of August last. The circumstances were stated at the time. A quarrel had arisen between the prisoner and his wife, and the former had struck her such violent blows with a bellows, as to cause her death. Mr Macaulay, on behalf of the prisoner, contended that the act was one of manslaughter, and not murder, inasmuch as it was evident, from the evidence, that no malice of any kind existed. It was, according to the evidence, the result of sudden passion, occasioned by great provocation. The Jury having found the prisoner G. ., Mr. Justice Coltman sentenced him to death, without hope of mercy.

THE MURDER OF THE POLICE CONSTABLE AT DEPTFORD.—On Monday, the adjourned inquest on the body of Mr. Jeffery, Police-constable, who was murdered on the morning of Saturday, the 21st ult., in Tinder-box alley, Deptford, was resumed before Mr. Payne, at Guy's Hospital, and the Jury returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder" against Sullivan, Brown, alias O'Keefe, Collins, and M'Carthy.

MURDER AND SUICIDE.—On Thursday (last week), a man, named John Elmor, residing in a small house at Cotmer Farm, Derbyshire, murdered his daughter ten years of age, while in bed, and then hung himself. He had long been in a state of semi-derangement, and used to say, that if he were to die and leave his daughter behind him, she might be exposed to want and misery.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Duke of Nassau opened the session of the States of the Duchy, on the 14th, at Wiesbaden. In his opening speech, the Duke announced that the extraordinary grants made in consequence of the bad state of the last harvest, have been taken from the excess of the receipts of 1845, and will not, therefore, prevent a reduction of the taxes for 1846.

The Semaphore de Marseilles of the 17th inst., publishes a letter from Toulon of the 15th, announcing that the Grand Duke Constantine would positively arrive in that harbour in the beginning of April, with the small Russian squadron which was then at Civita Vecchia, awaiting the return of the Prince from Rome. Orders had been forwarded from Paris to give him a brilliant reception, and the Prince de Joinville, it was said, would meet him at Toulon.

A lady, named Myddleton Bowers, receives a pension of £218 4s. from the city of London, on the ground that she is a lineal descendant of Sir Hugh Myddleton.

Advices have been received from Cape Town to the 24th January inclusive. They contain accounts of continued depredations by the Kaffirs, on the frontier, and a communication from Colesberg mentions four more murders. One of the victims is an Irishman named James Bourke, a deserter from the army of St. Petersburgh, who had settled in Graaf Reinet. Dutch, and not English, is the language of the Boers. Hereditary Grand Duke will not leave the capital, but during the absence of the Emperor will have the direction of the internal affairs of the empire.

The Studien Journal announces, that in consequence of the massacres in Gallicia 150 estates are without proprietors. The majority of the land stewards were murdered. The distress is so great in Gallicia that the Government will be obliged to afford assistance.

The Frankfort Journal quotes a letter from Berlin, which would seem to indicate that the question of a constitution for Prussia was not abandoned. It appears, on the contrary, that the special committee charged with preparing the draught of that constitution has coincided in a portion of its task, and prepared a memorial on the subject to the King. It is the general belief in Berlin, that in the month of January, 1847, the period fixed for the meeting of the provincial states, a Royal decree will appear, convoking the body proposed.

The Journal des Débats publishes letters from Macao of the 29th of December. The French mission to China had returned to Macao on the 6th of December, after having visited the four northern ports. The Alcmene was to have sailed on the 8th of January from Macao, to bring back the commercial delegates to France. All the persons attached to the mission were to have quitted China in a few days after the departure of the Alcmene. The Emperor intimated an intention of going next week to Moscow, and that he will not return until the time when it shall be necessary for him to go into Italy to accompany the Empress back. It is said that the Hereditary Grand Duke will not leave the capital, but during the absence of the Emperor will have the direction of the internal affairs of the empire.

Brazilian papers to the 7th of February state that a treaty offensive and defensive was concluded on the 11th of November, between the Governments of Paraguay and Corrientes, in which they mutually pledge themselves not to lay down their arms until they have secured freedom for the navigation of the rivers the Parana, and rendered themselves entirely independent of the Government of Buenos Ayres. They express friendly and respectful feelings for the Argentine Confederation, but a settled determination to resist to the utmost the usurpations of General Rosas.

According to accounts from Stockholm, the coronation of the King and Queen of Sweden and Norway will take place in the cathedral church at Frondheim (Norway), if the alterations and repairs now in progress in the Frondheim Cathedral can be completed within that period. Their Majesties purpose leaving the greater part of the ensuing winter in the Peninsula. The navigation makes frequent excursions to see his two sons, who are at the Upsala University. His Excellency the Swedish Minister of Justice, Baron Von Nordenfalk, died on the 10th inst. in his forty-ninth year.

At a general meeting of the members of Lloyd's, held on Wednesday, a vote of £20 towards its testimonial to Lieut. Waghorn, R.N., to record the sense entertained by the subscribers of the important services rendered to the mercantile interest by the regular and early receipt of the shipping intelligence from India, effected by the energetic and persevering exertions of Mr. Waghorn, in originating and establishing the overland communication with that extensive portion of the British empire, was unanimously carried.

The funeral of General Balmaseda, one of the most firm adherents of Don Carlos, took place in the Roman Catholic Church at St. Petersburgh, at the beginning of this month. The General had taken up his residence in the Russian capital during the last seven or eight years.

According to late accounts from Italy, disturbances have taken place at Imola, but of a local nature. At Spoleto the prisoners attempted to revolt, and seven of them were killed and many wounded. Great indignation was felt at Rome on hearing that the name of the Pope had been abused in the late insurrection at Poland, saying that his Holiness had excited the insurrection against the Governments; whilst, on the contrary, the Holy Father had issued a brief to the Bishops of Prussian Poland, Posen, and Cracow, enjoining them to exhort the clergy of their respective dioceses to abstain from taking any part whatsoever in the insurrection.

A Vienna correspondent of the Augsburgh Gazette writes, on the 14th, that the reports of the contract of a new loan are not confirmed, the Government not having need of such means of raising money, notwithstanding the expenses occasioned by the disturbances in Poland. It is added, the National Bank is in a flourishing state, having in hand 93,000,000 florins in specie, and 39,500,000 florins in bills. The amount of its advances upon security is 42,000,000 florins.

A letter from Berlin, dated March 18, says—"It is generally believed here that the Emperor and Empress of Russia will pay a visit to this court in May or June, at which time her Majesty will return from Italy."

The Moniteur contains a notice of the Ministry of Commerce, announcing, on the authority of a despatch, dated Tangier, the 26th ult., that the emperor of Morocco has abolished the monopoly of steel, and subjected that article to an entrance duty of eight piastres per quintal (or £3 10s. 8d. per 200lb.), with a reduction of one-fourth on payment in ready money.

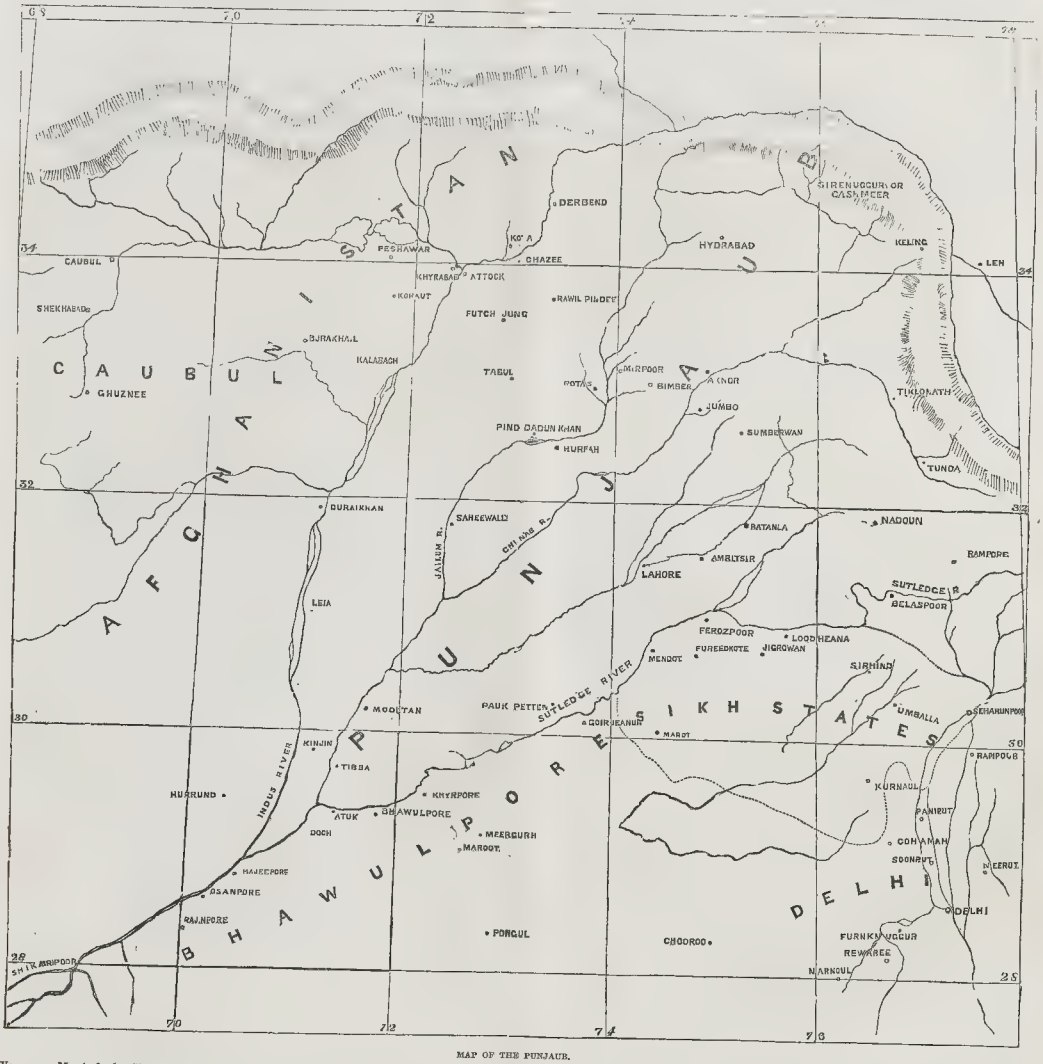
SEAT OF THE WAR IN INDIA.



MAP OF THE PUNJAUB.

We annex a Map in further illustration of the recent important events on the Sutlej river. It shows the great theatre of the war; the Sikh states, and the Punjaub; the outline of the extreme territory of the latter being almost completely formed by the course of the Indus, and that of the Sutlej and its prolongation. Mr. E. Thornton, in his valuable Gazetteer, gives a minute survey of this territory; but, better adapted to our present purpose, is the following précis, which we quote from Lieut-Colonel Steinbach's recently published volume, entitled, "The Punjaub; being a brief account of the Country of the Sikhs, &c."

The extensive country in the north-west of India, known by the name of the Punjaub, derives its appellation from two Persian words—panj, five, and aub, water, from the five rivers which flow through the territory. These rivers are, the Indus or Attock, the Jylum, the Chenab, the Ravee, and the Sutlej, the first and last forming the geographical boundaries of a space extending from latitude 29 degrees 15 minutes to 34 degrees north, longitude 70 degrees 46 minutes to 76 degrees east. The political limits of the country, however, extend somewhat beyond the banks of the two principal rivers, and may be reckoned, including Peshawur and the countries west of the Indus, Iskardoh, Ladakh, and other hill states north, at 600 miles in length from east to west, and 350 miles in breadth from north to south. In the immediate north and north-east of the territory lie the chains of mountains known as the Hindoo Koosh and the Himalayan range, the latter divided from the former by the extensive valley of the Indus.

The plain of the Punjaub, to use the words of Thornton, the Gazetteer, "is divided by its rivers into five extensive natural sections, described by the native term doab, signifying a great tongue of land lying in the bifurcation above the confluence of two rivers." The rivers are all, in a great measure, navigable, not less than 1960 miles of the five principal streams, with their four tributaries, the Punjund, Trinab, Bess, and Epara, being available for purposes of inland traffic. Irrigation, to an almost unparalleled extent, is likewise carried on, without much assistance from artificial means, the great plain being extremely level, or sloping so gradually from north-east to south-west, that the highest elevation above the level of the sea does not exceed 1600 feet, descending to about 200. In fact, the exceeding smoothness of the country has the effect of causing the rivers to frequently change their courses, not one of them runs within several miles of the great towns whose walls they washed twenty years ago. Scattered over the territory, but chiefly near the rivers, are numerous towns, fortresses, and villages. The principal towns are Lahore (the capital and seat of Government), Umritzur, Moultan, Vuzeerabad, Muzaffernhud, Kashmir or Sirinuggur, and Peshawur. The fortresses are Umritzur, formerly the depositary of the Royal treasury, a place of no particular strength; Rotas, on the high-road from Lahore to Peshawur, strikingly situated upon an eminence, but now suffered to fall into decay; and the castle on the banks of the Attock, which commands the passage of the river. Most of the towns, however, are surrounded by a mud or brick wall of frail quality: Lahore itself is so defended, with the addition of a dry moat, which, on emergency, could be filled with water from the neighbouring Ravee. But the mud walls would afford no protection against artillery.

Lahore, the capital, is a town of considerable dimensions; the circuit of fortification exceeds seven miles. Originally occupied by the Mussulman invaders, it contains many remnants of spacious and handsome mosques, serais, and monuments.

Umritzur, situated between the rivers Beas and Ravee, is of somewhat larger extent than Lahore, and from having been the capital when Runjeet Singh exercised dominion over the Punjaub, is now a place of great commercial importance.

But the most striking edifice, upreared by Runjeet Singh, is the lofty fortress of Govindgur, which formerly held all the wealth of the Government for the time being.

Moultan, the third town in order of importance, stands upon a mound three miles east of the river Chenab. In form it is an irregular sexagon, with its longest side, which measures six hundred yards to the north-west. Its modern consequence arises from the great extent of commerce of which it is the seat, the banking transactions particularly giving it a pre-eminence over all other towns in Western India. Although within its own walls, which are forty feet in height, seen from without, but few buildings of any importance are contained, the neighbourhood is crowded with the débris of mosques, tombs, serais, &c., attesting the ancient grandeur of the place.

Vuzeerabad likewise stands to the east of the Chenab, but two or three hundred miles higher up than the town previously mentioned. In point of architecture, Vuzeerabad may take precedence of any other town in the Punjaub. This is owing to the exertions of General Avitabile, an European officer, lately in the service of the Sikh Government, who spent much of his accumulated wealth in decorating and improving the locality of his residence. The streets are broad, and the bazaars exceedingly commodious.

Muzaffarabad, at the confluence of the Jeylum and the Kishengunga, has nothing to recommend it beyond its position. It commands the entrance of the Barramala Pass into Kashmir.

Kashmir, or Cashmere—better known to English readers under the latter orthography—is beyond the geographical limits of the Punjaub, properly so called, but has been included in the territory by conquest since 1819.

Peshawur, like Kashmir, is a conquest from the Affghans; it fell to the arms of Runjeet Singh about twenty years since, and is now annexed to the dominions of the Punjaub. Separated from Affghanistan Proper by the far-famed Khyber Pass, a tolerable fortification has enabled the Sikhs to retain it; but, excepting these defences, there is nothing in the town to distinguish it from the shapeless masses of decayed brickwork which are found in and about all the other towns in the Punjaub.

Ladakh, or Middle Thibet, and Iskardoh, completes, in the north, the possessions of the Sikhs, as Mittun Khote may be said to terminate them in the south. The former are situated respectively in 32 deg. and 35 deg. of north latitude, longitude 79 deg. and 76 deg., in the mountain regions which close in the east and north of the Punjaub.

This Map will be interesting in connexion with the recent events in the Sikh country, as well as the contemplated conquest of the Punjaub by the British. Upon this topic we find the following observations, concluding a well-timed paper in "Bentley's Miscellany" for April, entitled "The Seat of War:—The Punjaub and its Inhabitants:" a contribution distinguished by the full acquaintance of the author with his subject, and his power of rendering it acceptable to the largest class of readers:

Since the death of Heera Singh, there has not been a vestige of stable government in the Punjaub. The Queen Regent has displayed an excess of profligacy such as surpasses the fabulous extravagances of Semiramis; the pusillanimous Maharajah displays symptoms of hopeless incapacity; and the multitudinous Ministers who "come like shadows, so depart," have rendered confusion worse confounded.

But the Sikh soldiery have got for their dominant notion that which constituted the strength and the weakness of the Mahrattas, that they are predestined to be the conquerors of India; and a multitude of false prophets, most of them Akalees, has sprung up in the Punjaub, preaching the duties of a holy war, and confidently predicting success.

It is the general opinion that the Punjaub must be annexed to the British territories because there are not materials for constructing a permanent native Government. This was strongly felt and expressed by the gallant and lamented Sir R. Sale, who has prematurely fallen in the first conflict. Had he survived, the conquest of the Punjaub might have been facilitated by the respect which the Sikhs universally had for his valour, and the confidence they reposed in his integrity. The task now will be one of some difficulty and danger, nor will security be immediately obtained on the completion of the conquest. Too large a proportion of the population has been trained to arms for quiet to be the result of victory, and the Akalees will raise insurrections whenever they are beyond the musket-range of sentries.

If the Punjaub were placed under the immediate dominion of the British Crown, and its administration confided to persons unfettered by the cumbrous routine of Leadenhall-street, it might become a most valuable acquisition. It possesses great mineral wealth; its agricultural produce might be almost indefinitely multiplied by a judicious system of irrigation, and the transit trade on the five rivers, if subjected to moderate tolls, would furnish a revenue nearly adequate to the ordinary expenses of the government. The climate in many districts—as, for instance, in the valley of Kashmir, and other spots at the foot of the mountains—is the finest in the world; and, when viewed in connection with the productiveness of the soil, offers many advantages to settlers. Chance, or rather Providence, has placed in our power an opportunity of making our country the civiliser of Asia, and we may be permitted to hope that in this enlightened age the crimes and blunders perpetrated on the banks of the Ganges will not be repeated on the banks of the Indus.

To such of our readers as wish to consult a topographical illustration of this country more in detail, we specially recommend the small, but very full map of the Punjaub, recently published by Mr. Wyld, of Charing-Cross.

RELIGION OF THE SIKHS. The Sikh religion does not boast of a very high antiquity. Previous to the close of the fifteenth century, the whole of the people inhabiting the Punjaub were either the followers of Hindoeism, devoutly believing in the mythology which, to the present moment, is held in reverence by the millions spread over British India, or disciples of Mahomed, from conviction, or the proselyting influence of Persian and Affghan conquerors. But in the early part of the sixteenth century arose a religious teacher, Nanach Shah, the son of a salt merchant, who, becoming a fakir, practised great austerity, and parted with all his property to the poor. The result was a very extensive conversion of his countrymen from the Brahminical and Mahomedan religions to a belief in pure Deism. The new disciples of Nanach called themselves Sikz—a term derived from the Sanscrit, and applicable to the followers of any particular teacher. It has remained with the people to this moment.

MINISTERIAL DIFFICULTIES.

The proceedings of Parliament are somewhat inexplicable; the whole of Monday evening was spent in debating a point of etiquette and precedence, namely, whether the Coercion Bill for Ireland should be proceeded with, or whether the Corn Bill should be taken first. Much was said of the value of time, and much of the precious article spent in the discussion upon it, the debate being closed, at last, by a decision that decided nothing, as it was farther adjourned. On Tuesday, so much having been said of the value of time, it might naturally be supposed that the debate would have been resumed; but, to the astonishment of everybody, no House was made, and the important discussion on a measure that suspends the Constitution, was necessarily postponed for a day or two; the point of etiquette and precedence between the Corn Bill and the Curfew Act—between food and force—remaining unsettled, a vote of thanks to the Indian Army, and an incidental discussion of the Irish Poor-law, filling up the interval.

As it is well known the Government can always make a House when it wishes, though it cannot so well prevent one being made if its opponents are determined there shall be one, this omission, interpreted as a wilful avoiding of a disagreeable debate, has given rise to various reports as to the stability of the Ministry, which have not been without their effect on the funds, though this is by no means a proof that such reports are well founded. A certain degree of credit is, however, lent to them; there is a general impression that difficulties are gathering round the Government, which it must possess more than ordinary vitality to outlive,—of course, in the official meaning of the phrase. The speech of Sir Robert Peel on Friday last, though it preceded a triumphant division, was by no means confident in its tone; he spoke of "falling" more than once, and of how and why he should descend from the high position he holds: it was not such an oration as might be expected from a Minister with a majority of a hundred supporting him. The mere contemplation of "falling" as a possibility, suggests the idea that the occurrence is not far off. Sir Robert's peroration was, in some degree, the gathering round him of his Legislator's robe, that the last act might be performed with decorum.

Then, there have been heard and seen other symptoms of weakness and uncertainty. Sir James Graham says, "It would be in vain for me to attempt to dissemble, and, at all events, I shall not attempt to dissemble, the extreme difficulties of the Government at this particular moment." On all sides, there is little but despondency; the victories in India are almost the only events which throw a gleam of brightness on Ministerial prospects, and they will not aid the Government out of what has been, still is, and will long remain the "great difficulty."

The stumbling-block of all English Ministries is Ireland and its condition; the Whigs could suggest nothing but a Coercion Bill, and admitting a few Catholics to legal offices; the first measure irritated the people; the second did not do what was most wanted —feed them. All Ministries seem to think they can succeed by working from the highest classes downwards; the Whigs admitted wealthy Catholics, or those who had legal talent and political influence, to office and patronage; but, for the bulk of the nation, the immense mass of pauperism and discontent, there was nothing but Coercion Bills. When the Conservatives, under Sir Robert Peel, took the helm, they dispensed theological and academical education; in itself, the policy was commendable enough, but, again only the higher, or, at least, the comfortably-circumstanced classes, are affected by it.

The millions of potatoe-fed Irishmen do not send their sons to Maynooth; and giving the means of obtaining an academical education to the children of the merchants and rich traders and farmers, does not lessen or remove one of the physical evils that Ireland labours under. The millions want food and occupation—wages, and some degree of security; but the Government gives the hundreds Latin and Greek, and thinks it has done something for the pacification of Ireland. Everything seems to be tried, but the real, plain, common-sense remedy: that is avoided, as if there were some strange reluctance to grapple with the real facts of the case. In the meantime, the people, left to sink from bad to worse—abandoned to the arbitrary will of those whom the law protects even in the most cruel exercise of the rights of property—blind, ignorant, and revengeful—rush into crimes that justly render Ireland the reproach of our rule throughout the world.

As if to prove what Landowners in Ireland dare do, while the country is on the brink of famine, the people revenging destitution by murder, the Government embarrassed between the necessity of feeding and fettering them, of establishing corn-sales and courts-martial, we read of a whole village being razed to the ground, and sixty or seventy families turned out to starve and die on the highway, at the mere caprice of one individual, and that one, we are sorry to say it, a woman! Such a thing occurring at such a crisis must compel the Legislature to act: Englishmen cannot see such barbarities practised at the very moment they are paying enormous sums out of the taxes to support those whom the Landowners thus plunge into destitution. Let any one imagine a peaceful English village of three hundred inhabitants destroyed under the superintendence—we blush while we write it—of an English Lieutenant, officer, and a guard of English soldiers, the people having no resources whatever but robbery or death by famine! Such a deed would be impossible in England: the landowner would be restrained by this simple fact—that every being so turned adrift would be able to demand support out of the Poor-rate; if the landlord makes paupers, he must also maintain them, and this acts as a restraint on the exercise of a strictly legal power. Why, in the name of justice, humanity, and common sense, cannot an equal protection be extended to the destitute in Ireland? We have introduced a Poor-law into that country; it appears to be a benefit; if it was the English Poor-law it would be; but that dark, malignant influence which has always marred the fair and honest intentions of the mass of the English people towards their Irish fellow-subjects has been at work here also. The Irish Poor-law is a mere mockery. It strictly prohibits all out-door relief; yet, in Ireland, if any relief is to be given at all, it must be in the nature of out-door relief; no other is possible; the bulk of the population can never be driven into the Union houses. The Poor-law in Ireland is utterly inefficient; it has been spoiled, as most other Irish measures are spoiled, by an unwise deference to the landed interest of that country. In England it is a protection to the destitute; it assures him that, at least, he shall not starve: in Ireland, men may and do starve; and the people, feeling that the law gives them neither protection nor security, combine against it in a dreadful spirit of revenge. The deeds of blood are horrible to read of; but can any one imagine what would take place in England, if the people were driven to such extremities? It would not be single murders, but one general rebellion, that would shake society to its foundations.

Mr. Scrope, on Wednesday, ably pointed out the defects of the Irish Poor-law, and suggested the remedies—suggestions both wise and practical. They would amply make the Irish Poor-law what it pretends to be. But Sir James Graham is actually kindled into rage by the mere proposal of what is evidently just; he will not hear of the two people being put on the same footing; Ireland may be united to England, but governed like England it must not be; those who have local knowledge "are of a contrary opinion" to Mr. Scrope. Of course they are, and will be to the end of time; the remedy touches their pockets; the land is theirs; the land is the only thing that can be made to pay in Ireland, and payment they will resist to the death. But how long, we ask, will England permit this, and go on paying an army, and constabulary, as a body-guard of rate-repudiating landlordism, and as helpers when a village is to be uprooted, with every now and then a famine-subsidy into the bargain, and allow those who hold the wealth of the kingdom to exact more, and pay less, and work a degree of oppression that no man dares name in England—oppression that, by driving the people into secret associations and inhuman violence, compels us to retrograde to the legislation of the Conqueror, and sullies our name in all other lands with disgrace and infamy?

Let us have a Coercion Bill for the land, and compel some of the enormous sums that leave Ireland in the shape of rents to remain behind in the form of Poor-rates; give every man a clear security against death on the highway; and then we shall see that those who must be supported will be employed; villages will be built instead of being pulled down, and there will be a chance of Ireland ceasing to be an exception to every other nation of the earth. We have great faith in the effect of just measures, and great doubts of the success of coercive ones; to try the last without the first is mere legislative insanity. The temporary measures of the Government to meet the famine and its consequences are good, and are working well. Can they not do more? Let us grapple with this and thus try and lessen the "great difficulty," which seems likely to bear down every Ministry, save that one which, at a future day, will grapple with it boldly and thoroughly.

THE ROYAL VISIT TO ASTLEY'S.

IN our Journal of last week, we briefly chronicled the event of a grand hippo-dramatic entertainment at Astley's Amphitheatre, on Tuesday week, "by Royal Command." The performance was honoured by the presence of her Majesty, the Queen, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and the Princess Royal, accompanied by a brilliant suite.

Mr. William Batty, the spirited lessee of the Theatre, appreciating the honour of the Royal visit, had tastefully decorated the theatre for the occasion; the passages and lobbies were covered with crimson cloth; and the box for the Royal visitors, in the centre of the first circle, was fitted up with silk tabaret, the prevailing colour being crimson and the general fittings of the box (from Gunter's) were superbly emblazoned the Royal Arms. The auditory of the theatre was likewise gorgeously embellished.

The Foot Guards lined the passages of the theatre, sentries were placed at the private-door, and detachments in the stable-yard and at the principal entrance in the Westminster-road. The visit was strictly private. Shortly after four o'clock her Majesty and Prince Albert, and their illustrious children and attendants, arrived in three close carriages, and were immediately ushered into the Royal box by Mr. Batty and Mr. T. Thompson, the stage-manager.

The performances then commenced. They are termed in the Programme, "A Grand Equestrian Day Representation;" the Riding-Masters being Mr. R. Smith and Mr. Widdicombe. There were a variety of graceful feats by Mons. Mdlle. Dumas, Miss Isabella M. Hime, and the Brothers Cardeno; besides, a Lilliputian Equestrian Scene of 1754. Mr. R. Smith introduced the spotted steeds, Beauty and Selim; and Mr. Batty led out his admired steed Beda. The whole terminated with a grand tableau from "The Rajah of Nagpore," and the performances of the celebrated Elephants.

At the conclusion, Her Majesty and Prince Albert expressed to Mr. Batty and Mr. Thompson their entire approval of the arrangements. The whole of the performances evidently gave high satisfaction to the Royal party, whom our Artist has sketched with excellent effect upon the preceding page.

AN OLD LADY BURNED TO DEATH.—Between nine and ten o'clock on Saturday night, smoke was seen to issue in large quantities from No. 33, Marshall-street, Golden-square, when the door was burst open, and it was ascertained that the back parlour, which was occupied by Mrs. Trenterburn, an elderly lady, was in flames. The engines commenced playing upon the fire, which was soon extinguished. On examining the room, Mrs. Trenterburn, who was left only a few minutes previously reading her Bible, was found lying on the floor greatly burned, and quite insensible. Dr. G. Johnson was immediately called in, and used every possible exertion to restore the unfortunate lady, but in vain, as she expired before he left the house. Mrs. Trenterburn had had two fits of apoplexy within the last six months, and the supposition is, that she was seized with another fit while reading, and that the candle ignited her dress.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS. MONDAY.

EVICTIONS OF TENANTRY IN IRELAND.—The Marquis of LONDONDERRY moved for a return of the ejectments actually carried into effect in Ireland on the tenants and occupiers of land, during the years 1841, 1842, 1843, 1844, 1845, specifying the numbers in each barony and county respectively, and showing the total number in each year. The noble Marquis entered into some particulars connected with the recent evictions of tenantry in Roscommon and Galway. [Our readers will find, under the head of Ireland, an excellent narrative upon the subject.] The noble Marquis proceeded to make a cursory allusion to the present condition of the Irish people consequent on the potato disease, and said he had much pleasure in informing their lordships that he had received authentic advices from Ireland, stating that, in the counties of Down and Cavan, no want, either of food or employment, had been experienced. The Earl of ST. GERMANS did not oppose the motion, but he must confess the difficulty of making up

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The news of the last great victory in India was known in Paris on Monday, and created a great sensation. The Paris papers, generally speaking, do justice to the prowess and firmness of England.

The provincial French papers state that in several parts of France riotous proceedings have occurred, ostensibly to express sympathy with the Poles, in some instances disgraced by cries of "Down with the King!" "Down with Guizot!"

M Garnier, a Conservative candidate, has been elected deputy at Avallon, in room of the late M. Philippe Dupin.

The papers contain long reports of the trial of M. Beauvallon, at Rouen, for killing M. Dujarrier, the director of the Presse, about a year ago. The proceedings commenced on Friday (last week), when several witnesses were called, and, amongst others, Alexandre Dumas, the celebrated novelist, employed for support or injury the atmosphere. Meanwhile, on the margin of the Sudej, on our left, two bri-
Siècle, Spectateur, Charivari, Pilote, Ere des Comercio and Universal (in fact, all the leading journals opposed to Narvaez), are to be prosecuted for having pronounced the late coup d'état of the Government "unconstitutional."

BELGIUM.

Our advices from Brussels inform us of the complete arrangement of the new Ministry, which is thus composed:—

M. Le Comte de Theux, Interior
M. Decbamps, Foreign Affairs
M. Malou, Finance.
M. Le Baron d'Anethan, Justice.
M. De Bavay, Public Works.
M. Le General Prince, War.

The important changes are the substitution of Count de Theux and M. De Bavay for M. Van de Weyer and M. D'Hoffschmidt.

THE POLISH INSURRECTION.

The latest accounts from Poland state that the executions which have taken place there have produced great consternation. At Posen great excitement prevails. The number of prisoners amount to 800. An officer in the Belgian service has been arrested. The persons who were arrested on the 14th have been sent to Solemburg, near Kustrin. Count Dzialynski has been set at liberty.

The following is a list of the persons of rank arrested at Posen:—The Counts Constantine and Ignatz Brunicki, Wadislas Lonski, Severin Malczynski, M. Ignatz Pruss Arnold, Alphouse de Beaukowsky, de Bulos Korski, Retired Lieutenant in the Prussian service; Stanislas de Biesekierski, formerly Colonel in the Polish service; Dobrowski, Alex. de Dembrowski, Arthur Beverwski, author (these two latter were arrested in Austria); Bronislas de Dombrowski, de Gonsiorowski (physician), Alex. de Gutrsy, the brothers Andreas Valesnin and Stanislas de Jelowicski; Jankowski, and Wladislas Kondrawski, Retired Lieutenant in the Prussian service. The ecclesiastics belonging to the Archi-Episcopal Seminary have been released.

In a letter from Warsaw, dated March 18, the following animated account is given of these executions

"The executions which took place on the 16th form a bloody wreath round the crown of Russia. This festival of the Russian Government took place at a late hour in the day; generally the condemned were executed at eight in the morning, at times even at four. Two Polish Nobles, two citizens, Stanislas Kosciszewsk. and Zarski, were erected at ten in the morning of the 16th. They died on the gallows. The sentence for civil criminals in Poland is decapitation; military criminals are shot. The ignominious death on the gallows strikes horror into the public mind. It is to cast this ignominy on the martyrs of the 16th, that they were ordered to be hung. They were mistaken. The gallows has been honoured by the death of Zarski and Kosciszewski. All the towns in Poland are to witness similar executions. The people of Warsaw showed themselves worthy of the trial on the 16th. 20,000 men were under arms.

"Before nine o'clock scarcely a soul was in the streets. Suddenly the streets of the noble city crowded by dense masses, proceeding solemnly towards the place of the execution. The space which separates the Citadel of Warsaw from Marimont and Belany is an immense barren field. This place was filled by an immense multitude, who came to bid a last farewell to the martyrs of their country, and whisper hope to them in their dying hour. At the execution of Konarski, at Wilna, the Russian soldiers wept. This was a scandal in the eyes of the Government. To prevent the renewal of shedding tears, instead of having them shot like Konski, the conspirators were ordered to be hung. The regiments on duty in the streets, and on the place of execution, were terror-struck at the aspect of the population of Warsaw. The traces of recent tears were on the faces of thousands, but at the solemn moment not a tear was shed—they denied such a gratification to their enemies.

"At the hour of ten struck, an extraordinary movement was visible in the assembled multitude; and, when the fatal noose was passed round the necks of the noble victims, the men uncovered their heads, and the whole populace knelt as one man. The day had been overcast all the morning, but at the fatal moment the sun burst forth in its glory, and then vanished behind the darkening clouds. At the execution of Zarski and Kosciszewski, the sentence of Litynski followed immediately. The latter was a man of property at Warsaw, and for him suffering degradation under the gallows with his fellow-prisoners, likewise condemned to liberty, received his stripes by passing through two files of soldiers His fellow-sufferers are nobleman; and, in Russia, noblemen may not receive the stripes. The generous-minded and patriotic Litynski is of humble extraction; he was, therefore, flagellated. When a soldier is sentenced to receive any number of stripes, a non-commissioned officer takes the building a bayonet against his breast, so that he may not advance too quickly, and thus avoid a few stripes. The Russian Government, fearing lest Litynski should rush upon the bayonet, and thus put an end to his sufferings, ordered two non-commissioned officers to precede him with the butt-ends of their muskets turned against his noble breast.

"The penal code in Poland makes no distinction of class. Even in Russia this is solely a military punishment. The Government have made the distinction of class in the case of Litynski, and sentenced him to a military punishment."

INDIA.

TOTAL DEFEAT OF THE SIKHS, AND TERMINATION OF THE WAR.

The monthly Overland Mail has brought more than usually important news. On the 10th of February, the Commander-in-Chief, with a force of about 20,000 men, attacked the Sikhs on our side of the Sutlej, at a place called Sobraon, opposite to Hurreekee, and after a hard fought and bloody engagement totally defeated them at all points, and drove them across the river with the loss of sixty-seven pieces of artillery, and ten thousand men in killed and wounded.

Not only was this brilliant victory obtained, but the Sikhs have been compelled to submit, and to pay a million and a half sterling, to defray the expenses of the war.

The full particulars of this glorious achievement, and the results of it, will be found in the following

OFFICIAL DESPATCHES.

[This first official document is a Proclamation from Sir Henry Hardinge, in which he announces the total defeat of the Sikh army, and that the British army had entered the Sutlej and entered the Punjaub. It then states that no extension of territory was desired by the Government of India, and proceeds to describe the steps which will be taken to provide indemnity for the past and security for the future; but, as the exact terms of the arrangement are given in a subsequent despatch of the Governor-General, it is not necessary to recapitulate them now. Then follows a General Order from Sir Henry Hardinge, dated Camp, Kussoor, Feb 14, in which he announces the victory of Sobraon, and gives a minute description of the circumstances attending upon it, founding his narrative upon the despatch of Sir Hugh Gough, which we give below.]

DESPATCH FROM SIR HUGH GOUGH, ANNOUNCING THE DEFEAT OF THE SIKHS AT SOBRAON.

Head-quarters, Army of the Sutlej, Camp Kussoor, February 13, 1846.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA, &c.

Right Honourable Sir, It is the duty and the pleasure which I have had the honour of addressing to you since the opening of the campaign, by the Almighty God, whose hand I desire to acknowledge in all our successes, the occasion of my writing me to announce a fourth and most glorious and decisive victory

My last communication detailed the movements of the Sikhs, and our counteractions since the great day of Ferozeshah. Defeated on the Upper Sutlej, the enemy constituted his position on the left bank, and his formidable tête de pont and entrenchments on the left bank of the river, in front of the bridge of boats.

Major-General Sir Harry Smith's division having rejoined me on the evening of the 8th, and part of my siege train having come up with me, I resolved, on the morning of the 10th, to dispose our mortars and battering guns on the alluvial land within good range of the enemy's works. To enable us to do this, it was necessary first to drive in the enemy's pickets at the post of observation in front of Koderwalla, and at the little Sobraon. It was directed that this should be done during the night of the 9th, but the execution of this part of the plan was deferred, owing to misconceptions and casual circumstances, until near daybreak. The delay was of little importance, as the event showed that the Sikhs had followed our example in occupying the two posts in force by day only. Of both therefore possession was taken without opposition. The battering and disposed field artillery and the 9-pounder Brigade under Brigadier Wilkinson. In reserve was the 4th Brigade, under Brigadier the Hon. T. Ashburnham, which was to move forward from the entrenched village of Kodeswalla, leaving, if necessary, a regiment for its defence. In the centre Major-General Gilbert's division was deployed for support or injury its right resting on and in the village of the little Sobraon. Major-General Sir Harry Smith's division was formed near the village of Guttah, with its right thrown up towards the bend. Brigadier Curetons Cavalry threatened, by feigned attacks, the ford at Hurrekee and the enemy's horse, under Rajah Lall Singh Mirr, on the opposite bank. Brigadier Campbell, taking an intermediate position in the rear between Major-General Gilbert's right and Major-General Sir Harry Smith's left, protected both. Major-General Sir Joseph Thackwell, under whom was Brigadier Scott, held in reserve on our left, ready to act as circumstances might demand, the rest of the cavalry.

Our battery of 9-pounders, enlarged into twelves, opened near the little Sobraon, with a brigade of howitzers formed from the light field batteries, and troops of horse artillery, shortly after day-break. The effect of the cannonade before the wire of our artillery fire was developed It was most spirited and well directed. I cannot speak in terms too high of the judicious disposition of the guns, the admirable practice, or the severity with which the cannonade was sustained. But, notwithstanding the formidable calibre of our iron guns, mortars, and howitzers, and the admirable way in which they were served, and aided by a rocket battery, it would have been visionary to expect that they could, within any limited time, silence the fire of 70 pieces behind well-constructed batteries of earth, plank, and fascines, or dislodge troops covered either by redoubts or epaulments, or within a trebly line of trenches. The effect of the cannonade was felt by the enemy since proved by an inspection of the camp, most severely felt by the enemy; but it soon became evident that the issue of this struggle must be brought to the determinant of musketry and the bayonet.

At nine o'clock Brigadier Stacy's Brigade, supported on either flank by Captains Horseford's and Fordyce's batteries, and Lieutenant-Colonel Lane's troop of horse artillery, moved to the attack in admirable order. The infantry and guns vied each other correlatively. The former marched steadily on in line, which they halted only to correct when necessary. The latter took up successive positions at the gallop, until, at length, within 300 yards of the cannon's mouths, they unlimbered their guns, unlimbered numbercuks, kept up the fire of grape until it was found, for some moments, impossible that the entrenchments could be won under it; but soon persevering gallantry triumphed, and the whole army had the satisfaction to see the gallant Brigadier Stacy's soldiers driving the Sikhs in confusion before them, within the area of their encampment. The 10th Foot, under Lieutenant-Colonel Franks, now for the first time brought into serious contact with the enemy, greatly distinguished themselves. This regiment never fired a shot until it had got within the works of the enemy. The onset of her Majesty's 53rd Foot was as gallant and effective. The 63rd and 50th Native infantry, brigaded with them, sustained both in cool determination.

At the moment of this first success, I directed Brigadier the Hon. T. Ashburnham's brigade to move on in support; and Major-General Gilbert's and Sir Harry Smith's divisions to throw out their light troops to threaten the works aided by artillery. As these attacks of the centre and right commenced, the fire of our heavy guns had first to be directed to the right, and then gradually to cease; but at one time the destructive fire of our artillery caused the enemy to push in mighty combat through the valley of the Sutlej, and, as it was soon seen that the weight of the whole force within the Sikh camp was likely to be thrown upon the left, my brigades that had passed the trenches became necessary to convert into close and serious attacks the demonstrations with skirmishers and artillery of the centre and right; and the battle raged with unconquerable fury from right to left The Sikhs, even when all their entrenchments were mastered with the bayonet, strove to regain them by the fiercest conflict, even in their flight. Nor was it unto the cavalry of the left, under Major-General Sir Joseph Thackwell, that I could have looked for the opening in the entrenchments made by our Sappers, in single file, and reformed as they issued so that the 3rd Dragoons, when no obstacle usually held formidable by horse appears to have held, had on this day, as at Ferozeshah, gallop over and sabre down the obstinate defenders of batteries and field works, and until the full weight of the divisions of infantry, with every field artillery gun which could be sent to their aid, had been cast into the scale, their victory could not be decisive. The fire of the Sikhs first slackened and then nearly ceased, and the artillery fire was directed upon the enemy's reserves, which, in dense masses, were pressing them on every side, precipitated them in masses over their bridge and into the Sutlej, which a sudden rise in the river had rendered hardly fordable. In their efforts to reach the right bank through the deepened water, hundreds were drowned, while those artillery a terrible carnage. Hundreds fell under this cannonade; hundreds upon hundreds were seen attempting the perilous passage. Their awful slaughter, confusion, and dismay were such as would have excited compassion in the hearts of their generous conquerors, if the Khalsa troops had not, in the early part of the action, been guilty of the most unoffending and barbarously mangling every wounded soldier whom, in the vicissitudes of war, the fortune of war left at their mercy. I must pause in this narrative especially to express the confident hardihood and steady order with which the battalions of Ghoork...as, the Sirmoor and Nusseeree, met the Sikhs wherever they were opposed to them. Soldiers of small stature but indomitable spirit, they vied in valour courage in the charge with the Grenadiers of our own army, and, armed with the short weapon of their mountains, were a terror to the Sikhs throughout this great action.

Sixty-seven pieces of cannon, upwards of two hundred camel-swivels (zumboorahs), numerous standards, and vast munitions of war, captured by our troops, are the pledges and trophies of our victory. The battle was over by eleven in the morning, and, in the forenoon, I caused our engineers to construct a part and sink a part of the vaunted bridge of the Khalsa army, across which they had boastfully come once more to defy us, and to threaten India with ruin and devastation.

We have to deplore a loss severe in itself, but certainly not heavy when weighed in the balance against the obstacles overcome and the advantages obtained. I have especially to lament the fall of Major-General Sir Robert Dick, C.B., a gallant veteran of the Peninsula and Waterloo campaigns. He survived only until evening the dangerous grape shot wound which he received close to the Sikh entrenchments while personally animating, by his noble example, the soldiers of her Majesty's 80th Regiment, in their career of noble conquest. Major-General Gilbert, to whose gallantry and successful exertions I have been indebted, in every battle, whose services have been conspicuous throughout this eventful campaign, and Brigadier Stacy, the leader of the Brigade that bore and successfully engaged, both received contusions. They were such as would not cause many men to retire from the field, but they did attempt for a moment the efforts of these heroic officers. Brigadier M'Laren, so distinguished in the campaigns in Affghanistan, at Maharajpore, and now again in our conflicts with the Sikhs, has had two badly wounded horses killed under him. Brigadier Taylor, C.B., one of the most gallant and intelligent officers of the army, to whom I have felt deeply indebted on many occasions, fell in this fight at the head of his brigade of his encounter with the enemy, and was severely bruised by a round shot. Brigadier Pearly, of the Nusseeree Battalion, commanding the Second Brigade, has been wounded, but not, I trust, severely. I am deprived for the present of the valuable services of Lieutenant-Colonel Garden, Quartermaster-General of her Majesty's troops, whose aid I have so highly prized in all my campaigns in China and India. He has received a wound from a grape shot, which, by the inflammation now becoming general, will deprive the Adjutant-General of her Majesty's forces, whose superior merit as a staff officer I have before recorded, has suffered a compound fracture in the left arm by a ball. It is with the greatest satisfaction I can announce that Lieutenant-Colonel Pratt, of the 80th Foot, were both badly wounded with that gallant regiment. Captain John Fisher, Commandant of the Sirmoor Battalion, fell at the head of his valiant little corps, received two severe wounds, and is doing well.

I have now to make the attempt—difficult, may, impracticable as I deem it—of expressing, in adequate terms, my sense of obligation to those who especially aided me by their counsels and self-devotion in the hard-fought field of Sobraon

First, Right Honourable Sir, you must permit me to speak of

Before the action, I had the satisfaction of submitting to you my plan of attack, and I cannot describe the support which I derived from the circumstance of its having, in all its details, met your hearty approbation. When a soldier of high judgment and matured experience as your Excellency assured me that my projected operation deserved success, I could not permit myself to doubt that, with the blessing of Divine Providence, the victory would be ours.

Nor did your assistance stop here. Though suffering severely from the effects of a fall, and unable to mount on horseback without assistance, your uncontrollable desire to see this army once more triumphant, carried you into the heat of the fire, finding all who witnessed your exposure to such peril at once with admiration the intrepidity that prompted it, and anxiety for your personal safety, involving so deep a in itself the interests and happiness of British India. I must acknowledge also my obligation to you for having, whilst I was busied with the general operation and success, superintended all the arrangements that related to laying our bridge across the Sutlej, near Ferozepore.

Our prompt appearance on this bank of the river, after victory, and advance to the place, which has enabled us to surprise its fort, and encamp without opposition in one of the strongest positions in the country, is the result of the invaluable assistance

The Majors-General of Divisions engaged deserve far more commendation than I am able, within the limits of a despatch, to bestow.

Major-General Sir Robert Dick, as I have already related, has fallen on a field of renown worthy of his military career and services, and the affectionate regret of his country will follow him to a soldier's grave.

In this attack on the enemy's left, Major General Sir Harry Smith displayed the same valour and judgment which gave him the victory of Aliwal. A more arduous task has seldom, if ever, been assigned to a division. Never has an attempt been more gloriously carried through.

I want words to express my gratitude to Major General Gilbert. Not only have I to record that in the great fight all was achieved by him, which, as Commander-in-Chief, I could desire to have executed; not only on this day was his distinguished enabled, by his skill and courageous example, to triumph over obstacles from which a less ardent spirit would have recoiled as insurmountable, but since I came in which our leading divisions moved out of Ballahi, I found in Major General an officer who has not merely carried out all my orders to the letter, but whose zeal and tact have enabled him in a hundred instances to perform valuable services in exact accordance with my wishes. I feel implicitly to recommend him to your Excellency's especial notice as a divisional commander of the highest merit.

Major-General Sir Joseph Thackwell has established a claim on this day to the rare commendation of having achieved much with a cavalry force, where the duties to be done consisted entirely of an attack on field works usually supposed to be the particular province of infantry and artillery. His vigilance and activity throughout our operations, and the superior manner in which our out-post duties have been carried on under his superintendence, demand my warmest acknowledgments.

Brigadier Stacy, C.B., I must commend to your special protection and favour. In him devolved the arduous duty of leading the first column to the attack, turning the enemy's right, encountering his fire, before his numbers had been thinned, or his spirit broken, and, to use a phrase which a soldier like your Excellency will comprehend, taking off the rough edge of the Sikhs in the fight. How ably, how gallantly, how successfully this was done, I have before endeavoured to relate. I feel certain that Brigadier Stacy and his noble troops will hold the first place in your Excellency's estimation, and that his merits will meet with the reward.

Brigadier Orchard, C.B., in consequence of the only regiment under his command that was engaged in the action being with Brigadier Stacy's brigade, attached himself to it, and shared all its dangers, glories, and encomiums.

I beg as warmly and sincerely to praise the manner in which Brigadier Wilkinson supported Brigadier Stacy, and followed his lead into the enemy's works.

Brigadier the Hon. T. Ashburnham manœuvred with great coolness and success, as a reserve to the two last-mentioned brigade-

Brigadier Taylor, her Majesty's 80th, fell nobly, as has already been told, in the discharge of his duty. He is himself beyond the reach of earthly praise, but it my earnest desire that his memory may be honoured in his fall, and that his regiment, for many years with which he served, and his country, may know that no officer held a higher place in my poor estimation, for gallantry or skill, than Brigadier C. C. Taylor.

Brigadier M'Laren, C.B., in whom I have ever confided, as one of the ablest of the senior officers of the force, sustained in this day, as I have before intimated, his already enviable reputation: I trust he may not long be kept by his wound out of the sphere of active exertion, which is his natural element.

Brigadiers Penny and Hicks commanded the two brigades of Major-Gesers' Sir Harry Smith's division, and overcame at their head the most formidable opposition. I beg to bring both to the most earnest manner to your notice, trusting that Brigadier Penny's active services will soon become once more available, for distinguished exploits at the battle of Aliwal I have recently had the honour to bring to your notice.

Brigadier Scott, C.B., in command of the First Brigade of Cavalry, had the rare fortune of meeting and overcoming a powerful body of infantry in the rear of a line of formidable field works. I have to congratulate him on the success of the noble troops under him, and to thank him for his own meritorious exertions. I am quite certain that your Excellency will bear them in mind.

Brigadier Campbell's Brigade was less actively employed; but all that was required of it was most creditably performed. The demonstration on the enemy's left, by the 9th Lancers, towards the conclusion of the battle, was made in the best order, under a skilful commander.

Brigadier Gowan, C.B., deserves my best thanks for his able arrangements, the calms of which was so fully evinced in the first hour and half of this conflict, where it was almost exclusively an artillery fight. Brigadiers Biddulph, Brooke, and Dennys supported him in the ablest way throughout the day, and have given me the most effectual assistance under every circumstance of the campaign

The effective practice of our rockets on the wing, under Brigadier Brooke, elicited my particular admiration.

Brigadier Smith, C.B., had made all the dispositions in the engineer department, which were to the last degree judicious, and in every respect excellent. On the evening of the 9th inst., Brigadier Irvine, whose name is associated with one of the most brilliant events in our military history—the capture of Bourtpore arrived at my camp. The command, of course, have devolved on him, but with generosity of spirit which ever accompanies true valour and ability, he decided to assume it, in order that all the credit of the work which he had begun might attach to Brigadier Smith. Fully entitled himself, Brigadier Irvine sought the opportunity of sharing our perils in the field, and he personally accompanied me throughout the day. Brigadier Smith has earned a title to the highest praise which I can bestow.

To the General Staff I am in every way indebted. Nothing could surpass the activity and intelligence of Lieut.-Colonel Garden and Major Grant, who are the heads of the Quartermaster-General's and Adjutant-General's departments, ever so laborious, and during this campaign almost overwhelmed. Both yet suffer under the effects of wounds previously received. Lieut.-Colonel Drummond, C.B., Deputy Quartermaster-General, and Major Arthur Seymer, Deputy Assistant-Quartermaster-General, ably supported the former; and the exertions of Captains Anson and Tucker, Assistant Adjutants-General, have been most satisfactory to their chief, and to me.

Lieut.-Colonel Parsons, Deputy Commissary-General, has evinced the most successful perseverance in its important endeavours to supply the army. He has been ably assisted at head-quarters by Mr. Thompson, C.B., and Major Curtis, Sub-Assistant Commissary-General; all three of these officers were most active in conveying my orders in the battle of Sobraon in the face of every danger. I have, in the course of this campaign, had occasion to commend the intelligence and the same activity and bravery in the case of Lieut.-Colonel Birch, Judge-Advocate-General, both as regards departmental duties and active attendance on me in the field. I have already spoken of the loss which I have sustained in Lieut.-Colonels Gough and Barr being wounded. The exertions of both in animating our troops in moments of emergency were laudable beyond my power to praise. Lieut. Sandys, 45th Regiment Native Infantry, Postmaster of the Force, assisted in conveying my orders.

Superintending Surgeon B. Macleod, M.D., has been indefatigable in the fulfilment of every importunate and responsible situation. I cannot too highly, or too sincerely satisfied with his exertions and their results. I must bring to notice also the merits of Field Surgeon J. Steel, M.D., and Surgeon Graham, M.D., in charge of the depôt of sick.

I was accompanied during the action by the following officers of my personal staff:—Captain the Hon. C. R. Sackville West, her Majesty's 21st Foot, officiating secretary (Captain Hakes, for whom he acts, still being disabled by his severe wound); Lieut. Colonel H. Havelock, C.B., her Majesty's 80th Foot, Persian interpreter; Lieut. Bagot, 10th Native Infantry; Lieut. Edwards, 1st European, Light Infantry; and Cornet Lord James Browne, 9th Lancers, my aides-de-camp. And Assistant-Surgeon J. E. Stephens, M.D., my medical officer. All these officers assisted in conveying my orders to various points, in the thickest of the fight and the hottest of the fire, and to all of them I feel greatly indebted

I have to acknowledge the services of the staff of regimental troops, and batteries, or on select and particular duties in the engineer department, at the following officers, and to recommend them to your Excellency's special favour:—Major F. Abbott, who led the bridge by which the army crossed into the Punjaub, and who was present at Sobraon, and did excellent service; Captain Baker, and Lieut. John Becher, Engineers, who conducted Brigadier Stacy's column; both of these was wounded; Lieut.-Col. Wood, Artillery, commanding the mortar battery; Major Lawrenson, commanding the 18-pounder battery. Lieut.-Colonel Huthwaite, commanding the 8-inch howitzer battery; and Lieut.-Colonel Godfrey, commanding the rockets; Captain R. Waller, Horse Artillery; Capt. G. R. Swindley, Capt. E. F. Day, Captain J. Turton, Brevet Major F. Brind, Brevet Lieut.-Col. J. D. Lane, Brevet Major G. Campbell, Capt. J. Fordyce, Capt. H. Horsford, and Lieut. C. Collingwood, commanding troops and batteries; Major R. Reilly, commanding Sappers and Miners; Lieutenant Col. White, C.B., commanding 3d Light Dragoons; Captain Nash, 4th Light Cavalry; Major Smyth, 5th Light Cavalry; Captain Christie, 7th Irregular Cavalry; Lieut.-Col. Pulliarm, 9th Lancers; Captain Leeson, 2d Irregular Cavalry; Brevet Captain Becher, 8th Irregular Cavalry; Captain Pearson, 16th Lancers; Brevet Captain Gunn, Governor-General's Body Guard; Brevet-Major Angelo, 3d Light Cavalry; Lieutenant-Colonel Spence, 31st Foot; Captain Corfield, 47th Native Infantry; Brevet-Lieutenant-Colonel Ryan, and Brevet-Colonel Pett, and Captain Lond, 50th Foot; Major Powlets, 2d Regiment Native Infantry; Captain O'Brien and Lieut. Travers, Nusseeree battalion; Captain Stepney, 29th Foot; Major Sabald, 41st Regiment Native Infantry; Major Birrei and Brevet Captain beaten 1st European Light Infantry; Brevet-Major Graves, 16th Grenadiers; Lieut. Reed, Sirmoor battalion; Lieut.-Col. Davis, 9th Foot; Major Handscombe, 26th Regiment Light Infantry; Lieut.-Col. Bunbury, 80th Foot; Capt. Hogan, 1st Regiment Native Infantry; Captain Sanderson, 3d Regiment Native Infantry; Lieut.-Col. Franks, 10th Foot; Brigadier-Lieut.-Col. Nash, 43d Regiment Native Infantry; Major Col-Thompson, 98th Regiment Native Infantry; Lieut.-Colonel Philips, 53d Foot; Major Starr, 62d Foot; Brevet-Major Marshall, 56th Regiment Native Infantry, and Captain Short, 40th Regiment Native Infantry.

The following staff and engineer officers I have also to bring to your special notice, that their good services may be favourably remembered, and its survivors duly rewarded, viz

Captain R. Christie, deputy assistant adjutant-general, and Lieutenant Wood, deputy assistant quartermaster-general of artillery; Captain Pidcock, and Brevet-Captain W. K. Warner, commissaries of ordnance; Brevet Major Mackenzie, and Brevet-Captain C. G. Austen, and First-Lieutenant Artillery, majors of brigade; Captain R. Napier, major of brigade of Engineers; Captain Tritton, 3rd Light Dragoons, deputy assistant adjutant-general; Captain E. Roche, 3rd Dragoons, aide-de-camp to Major-General Sir J. Thackwell; and officiating deputy assistant quartermaster-general of cavalry, in the place of Captain Havelock, 9th Foot, who was present in the field, but unable, from the effects of a wound, to discharge the duties of his office; Captain E. Lugard, 50th Foot, deputy assistant adjutant-general; Lieutenant A. S. Galloway, 3rd Light Cavalry, deputy assistant quartermaster-general; Lieutenant E. A. Hodgson, 60th Foot, aide de-camp to Major-General Sir Harry Smith: Lieutenant McD. Gilbert, 2nd Grenadiers, acting aide-de-camp to Major-General Gilbert, Combe, 1st European Light Infantry, major of brigade, 2nd Brigade; Captain Gordon, 11th Native Infantry, major of brigade, 6th Brigade; Captain A. G. Warde, 68th N.I., major of brigade; and Lieut. P. Hay, major of brigade, killed.

Having ventured to speak of your Excellency's own part in this action, it would be most gratifying to me to go on to mention the brilliant share taken in it by Lieutenant-Colonel Wood and the officers of your personal staff, as well by the civil, political, and other military officers attached to you. But, as these were all under your own eye, I cannot doubt that you will yourself do justice to their exertions.

We were in the battle again honoured with the presence of Prince Waldemar of Prussia, and the two noblemen in his suite, Counts Orlola and Grenben. Here, as at Moodkee and Ferozeshah, these distinguished visitors did not content themselves with a distant view of the action, but throughout it were to be seen in front wherever danger most urgently pressed.

The loss of the enemy has been immense. an estimate of it must be formed with a due allowance for the spirit of exaggeration which pervades all statements of Asiatics where their interest leads them to magnify numbers; but our own observation on the river banks and in the enemy's camp, combined with the reports brought to our intelligence department, convince me that the Khalsa casualties were between 8000 and 10,000 men killed and wounded in action and drowned in the passage of the river. Amongst the slain are Sirdars Sham Singh, Attareewalla, Generals Gholab Singh Koopta, and Heera Singh Topee, Sirdar Kishen Singh, son of the late Jemadar Koohal Singh, Generals Mobarack Ally and Illahee Bokah, and Shah Newaz Khan, son of Futten-ood-deen Khan of Kussoor. The body of Sham Singh was sought for in the captured camp by his followers; and, respecting the gallantry with which he is reported to have devoted himself to death rather than accompany the army in its flight, I forbade his people being molested in their search, which was finally successful.

The consequences of this great action have yet to be fully developed. It has at least, in God's providence, once more expelled the Sikhs from our territory, and planted our standards in the soil of the Punjaub. After occupying their entrenched position for nearly a month, the Khalsa army had perhaps mistaken the caution which had induced us to wait for the necessary material, for timidity. But they must now deeply feel that the blow which has fallen on them from the British arm has only been the heavier for being long delayed.—I have, &c.,

PRINCE WALDEMAR OF PRUSSIA.

Prince Frederic Guillaume Waldemar of Prussia, who is now travelling in Asia, under the title of Count Ravensburgh, is the first cousin to the King of Prussia. The Prince was born Aug. 2, 1817; his father being Prince Frederic Guillaume Charles, the brother of the late King of Prussia; who married, in 1804, the Princess Amelie Marie Anne, daughter of the late Louis Guillaume, the Landgrave of Hesse Homburgh. The Prince's name has recently been brought into notice in this country by the painful details of the official despatches from India, in which he is honourably mentioned by the Governor-General for the gallantry he displayed in the severe engagements our troops sustained with the Sikhs.

PRINCE WALDEMAR OF PRUSSIA.

His Highness had been for some time travelling in the East, under the name of Count Ravensburg. He is a Colonel of Dragoons in the Prussian service; but, tired probably of the great parade-ground of Prussia, where all the nation is under drill, he wished to see some of the realities of soldiership, and therefore proceeded to our Indian empire, on the borders and frontiers of which peace is rarely a dweller. His wish has been fully, even terribly gratified; a fiercer field has not been fought since Prussian and English officers stood side by side on the plain of Waterloo.

In the second day's action, the Prince was requested to quit the field, the English Commander being unwilling to allow him to peril his life, when he had no duty to discharge. The caution was by no means unnecessary, for the Prince's medical attendant, Dr. Hoffmeister, was killed by his side; the occurrence is thus described by the Governor-General: "I have now to request your Excellency's notice to the conduct of an illustrious nobleman, Count Ravensburg, who, with the officers of his suite, Count Greuben and Count Orlola, accompanied me in the field. These Prussian officers nobly sustained the reputation of their countrymen. The Prince's surgeon was struck to the ground by a ball. I saw his Royal Highness instantly spring from his horse to his assistance. The Prince's humanity was unavailing; death had already closed the surgeon's career. I am aware of the respectful regard which your Excellency entertains for this illustrious nobleman and his companions, travellers in the East; and I know that this brief record of their actions will be gratifying to your Excellency." It is impossible to avoid pitying the poor physician, who, probably, did not sympathise with his master's enthusiasm in the art of war: the amusements of Princes are as dangerous to share as their secrets. The occurrence reminds us of a similar one narrated by Colonel Mitchell in his "Life of Wallenstein"—"Among those who fell at Lützen, was an Abbot of Fulda, who had come to witness the battle; in the request he presented to Wallenstein to be allowed to join the army, this very Christian prelate, who was killed, not in administering consolation to the dying, but in galloping about the field with a German Prince, says he is willing to put up 'with the fare of the humblest soldier;' and the levelling hand of war kept him to the very letter of his bargain."

In the despatch of the Governor-General, from the Camp at Kussoor, of February 14th, detailing the last signal defeat of the Sikh army, the Prince and his companions are thanked for their offers of service in the battle-field. Sir Henry Hardinge says the Prince has won the admiration of the whole army.

Our sketch is from a portrait of Prince Waldemar, just published by Messrs. Hering and Remington, Regent-street.

BENGAL SEPOYS.

The uniform of the Bengal Sepoys is almost exactly similar to that of the regiments of the line in her Majesty's service—the difference being in the shacos, which are edged with brass, and the shacos having brass buckles, in lieu of a leather stock a necklace of white beads is worn by the privates, and of gold by the native officers. The muskets have percussion locks. It is difficult at a short distance to distinguish a regiment of her Majesty's Foot from a native corps, the appointments being similar: and the natives equalling, and even, in some instances, excelling the Europeans in the steadiness of their manœuvres under arms. The Bengal Sepoys are a fine body of men—the Grenadier companies seldom having men under six feet high, and the Battalion companies have a higher average than the Europeans. On service, a white cover is worn on the shacos, as a protection from the sun.

Our Illustration is from a sketch by Lieutenant G. F. Atkinson, of the Bengal Engineers.

RAJAH GHOLAB SINGH.

This chief has occupied a distinguished position in the recent Despatches detailing "The Course of Events at Lahore," the capital of the Sikhs. Thus, on January 25, we find his arrival in the vicinity, with 20,000 men, and accompanied by Mesan Punnoea, Mesan Buttoo, and Mesan Juwaheer Singh, brother of the late Rajah Heera Singh, besides about twenty of his most confidential and trustworthy chiefs and kinsmen. On January 27, we find the Rajah ordered by the Ranee to send his men towards Phulloor, and to come unattended to Phulloor, where the house of the late Rajah Dhean Singh was prepared for his reception. On January 28, having quitted his camp, the Rajah proceeded, first, to visit the Samad of the late Maharajah Runjeet Singh, where he offered 51 gold mohurs. He then proceeded to the palace to pay his respects to the Ranee, but declined to stay at Lahore, and returned to his camp; it is said on account of his having discovered a plot by the Ranee and the Sirdars of the Durbar to murder him. The following from the last received Despatches is very characteristic:—

Orders were issued by the Ranee to fire a salute in honour of the arrival of Rajah Gholab Singh, but the Rajah sent word to the gunners that he did not wish any such compliment just now, and that when he did he would say so. The Rajah has issued orders for raising new troops, and engages only such men as present themselves from the country. No Sikhs are enlisted by him. He did not attend the Durbar this day. Seven hundred Sikhs have arrived as a deputation from the camp at Seepra, to wait on Rajah Gholab Singh, being one and two from each company. Their object is said to be to conduct the Rajah to the camp. Gholab Singh told them that so numerous a body, equal to a full battalion, ought not to have absented themselves from the camp at such a time; that he required no messengers to conduct him to the camp, that he was not like themselves, who called out they would fight in the name of Goroojee ka Khalsa, and when the time came, fled, eight men out of ten; but that he had declared his determination to conquer the enemy or die in the attempt. He concluded the conference by stating that as soon as the whole of his men were collected, many being still in the rear, he would march on Ferozepore. He gave 100 rupees to the Punches, and desired them to return to the camp; but they in their turn said they should not stir without him, and remained in his camp.

Next we find the Ranee appointing the Rajah Wuzeer. Purwannahs were at the same time sent off to all the Governors, Subahdars, Jagheerdars, Chiefs, and Eilkars, informing them that Rajah Gholab Singh has this day been appointed Wuzeer, with full power to conduct the affairs of the state, and desiring them to obey the Rajah accordingly, and to forward their respective Nuzzurs to him. Orders were sent to the Artillery to fire a salute on the occasion, and they continued firing for a long while.

We then find the Rajah getting very anxious to negotiate matters with the British, sending presents of elephants, restoring property to Europeans, &c. The Brahmins having predicted for many days that the British would rule in the Punjaub, and then the Khalsas again, it was suggested to-day by some people that the prophecy should be accomplished by placing one of these four Sahebs on the guddee for one day, proclaiming him Sovereign of all the land, and then the next day to expel him, and replace the Maharajah in all due form. The proposition made Rajah Gholab Singh smile, and say that, before this, the Sikhs had become so proud, that they had placed their Punt before God, but that their minds had now undergone such a change, that they heeded none but Brahmins and astrologers.

From the Delhi Gazette Extra, of Feb. 23:—

The Wuzeer, Rajah Gholab Singh, arrived at Kussoor, where the camp of the Governor-General has been pitched since the 14th, on the 16th, and was, in consequence of being four hours later than arranged, received as haughtily as he deserved. He brought Nuzzurs to a considerable amount, which were refused, and having commenced to discuss the business of his visit, was referred to Major Lawrence and Mr. Currie.

These gentlemen met the Rajah, and were engaged with him, as also with Dewan Deena Nath, and Fukeer Noorood-deen, till one o'clock at night. The outlines of a treaty were proposed, which embraced the voluntary cession of the territory specified by the Governor-General in his proclamation, the payment of an indemnity of one core and a half of rupees (50 lacs down, and the remainder in two years, by instalments of 50 lacs each), and other matters which will be known in due time.

On the 17th another lenghtened interview of ten hours took place, when, the preliminaries being finally settled, and the State Seal applied by Dewan Deena Nath, the Rajah agreed to bring the Maha Rajah Dulleep Singh to the camp. His Highness and the Ranee were received on the 18th.

Gholab Singh appears to have been a prime mover in the recent intrigues at Lahore; as well as in the negotiations with the British; and his subsequent position was, doubtless, a very critical one.

The authentic Portrait of the Rajah, at page 224 is from a drawing by a native artist.

THE SIKH PREACHER.

Gúrú Govind inculcated his tenets upon his followers by his preaching, his actions, and his works; among the latter is "Das'ama Pádsháh Ka Gurunth," or Book of the Tenth King, he being the tenth ruler from Nánac, the founder of the religion. This work, together with the "Adi-Gurunth" of Nánac—their only other sacred book—is held in great veneration by the Sikhs.

Sir John Malcolm, while in the Punjaub in 1805, succeeded in procuring a copy of the "Adi-Gurunth" from a Chief, who sent it to him at night, after having obtained a promise that he would treat the sacred volume with great respect. A Mr. Colebrook, with persevering assiduity, was also able to procure not only the "Adi-Gurunth," but the "Das'ama Pádsháh Ka Gurunth"—the two most sacred books of the Sikhs. The illustration represents one of the native Preachers.

THE CHIEF OF THE AKALIS.

The Akalis (immortals), or Sikh fanatic priests, though considerably reduced in number, are much respected by the people. Their residence is at Akaligurgh—which was built by them—a large town a little south of the route from Ramnuggur to Lahore: here they live in a state of desperate independence of the Sikh Government, but they are tolerated on account of their ferocious valour in foreign wars. Runjeet Singh tried, though unsuccessfully, to incorporate them with the Goracheras.

SIKH LANCERS.

The Sikhs possess several regiments of Lancers; in fact all the cavalry regiments, excepting the Heavy Dragoons—not even excepting the regiment with chain armour, than which nothing can be more formidable—carry, and are very expert with, the lance, a favourite game among them being, to drive a tent peg into the ground and ride at it with a spear at full gallop, often succeeding in striking it from the ground.

THE BATTLE OF SOBRAON.

We have been favoured by a Correspondent with the annexed Plan, accompanied by the following extract from a letter dated Feb. 1:—

In the meantime, the Governor-General at Ferozepore, is quietly waiting the arrival of the siege train, which will not reach him till the 4th inst., and without it he cannot attack the Sikh position, so strongly have they fortified themselves. I send you a sketch of the relative position of the two armies. It has been resolved to attack the Sikhs in front with a few troops; while the rest of our army crosses the river lower down, and surprises their rear; thus placing them between two fires, from which there is no possibility of escape. Take care of the little plan, which was drawn by an Engineer officer with the army, and is quite correct.

N.B.—This return was received by the Governor-General on the afternoon of the 18th.

Adjutant General's Office, Head-quarters, Camp, Kussoor, Feb. 18, 1846.

The Gazette Extraordinary of Wednesday night, contains the following interesting despatch from Sir Henry Hardinge, in which the gallant Governor-General details the particulars of the amicable arrangement with the Sikh Chiefs.

India Board, April 1.

The Secret Committee of the East India Company has this day received, from the Governor-General of India, a despatch, from which the following is an extract.—

THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA TO THE SECRET COMMITTEE.
Camp, Kanha Cuchwa, Feb. 19, 1846.

(EXTRACT.)

The immediate result of the victory of Aliwal was the evacuation by the Sikh garrisons of all the forts, hitherto occupied by detachments of Lahore soldiers, on this side of the river Sutlej, and the submission of the whole of the territory on the left bank of that river to the British Government.

The Sikh army remained in its entrenched position; and though on the first intelligence of the victory of Aliwal, and at the sight of the numerous bodies which floated from the battle field to the Bridge of Boats at Sobraon, they seemed much alarmed and disheartened, and though many were reported to have left them and gone to their homes, yet, after a few days, the Sikh troops seemed as confident as ever of being able to defy us in their entrenched position, and to prevent our passage of the river.

The Commander-in-Chief was not in a state to take advantage of the enemy's defeat at Aliwal, by an attack on his entrenched position at Sobraon, until the troops under Major General Sir H. Smith should have rejoined his Excellency's camp, and the siege train and ammunition should have arrived from Delhi. Therefore came the proclamation, a copy of which is inclosed, to be issued to the inhabitants of those cities, informing them of the result of my interview with the Maha Rajah, and assuring them of our protection, in person and property, if the Durbar acted in good faith, and no further hostile opposition was offered by the army.

On our arrival at this place (Kanha Cuchwa, about sixteen miles from the city of Lahore, and twelve from the cantonments), heavy firing for the best part of an hour was heard. This proved to be a salute of seven rounds from every gun in Lahore, in honour of the result of the Maha Rajah's meeting with me yesterday, and in joy at the prospect of the restoration of amicable relations.

LAUNCH OF THE IRON STEAM-SHIP "POTTINGER."

The launch of the splendid iron steam-ship Pottinger, of 1925 tons burden, belonging to the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, and built for the purpose of carrying the mails in the Indian and China seas, took place at the builders, Messrs. Fairbairn and Co.'s, Millwall, on Saturday. The interesting ceremony of christening was performed by Miss Shepherd, daughter of Captain Shepherd, in the absence of Lady Campbell, when the vessel glided beautifully off the stocks into her destined element, amidst the cheers of the spectators.

She is the largest iron steam-ship ever built on the Thames.

EXECUTION OF WICKS FOR THE MURDER OF HIS MASTER.

On Monday morning, at eight o'clock, the awful penalty of the law was carried into effect against James William Wicks, aged 20, for the wilful murder of James Bostock, his master, on the 16th of February. During the interval which has elapsed since the exertions were made in the culprit's behalf, Wicks was desired by the Sheriffs not to entertain a hope that they would be successful, and, in consequence of this, when informed that his fate was inevitable, early last week, he betrayed but slight emotion, and very shortly after that period, rallied, and maintained his firmness to the last. On Sunday the last day allowed for the unfortunate relatives to visit and take leave, his father and mother visited their unhappy child, and the final parting was most distressing, the wretched parents feeling acutely the misfortune that they were thus separated, as they had not seen each other for years. On Sunday the convict attended the chapel, but as the preaching of condemned sermons, as they were called, is done away with, the Rev. Ordinary, in the course of his discourse, but slightly alluded to the crime for which he was about to suffer, Wicks's demeanour was throughout firm but respectful, and, from the attention which he paid to the service, and to the previous instruction of the Rev. Ordinary in his mind had undergone a change, and while he admitted the justice of his case, he fully relied on the divine pardon.

Precisely as the hour of eight struck, the chapel bell was heard to toll, being the signal that the fatal and melancholy procession was approaching, and a rumbling and cries of "Hats off, hats off," ensued. In less than a minute the authorities approached, and took their station near the scaffold; the prisoner then mounted, preceded by the Rev. Mr. Lee, the chaplain, with a firm step, and wholly unassisted, taking up his position under the fatal beam. The prisoner's pale and youthful appearance, being under twenty years of age, excited the utmost commiseration, and was the signal for loud and continued yelling of execrations against the authorities, mingled with cries of "Shame, shame!" "Where's Johnson?" which continued during the whole time the fatal preparations were being made. In a very short time, the cap being drawn over, and the rope adjusted, the bolt was drawn, and in a few seconds the culprit ceased to exist. His struggles, although of a spare and light stature, did not appear to be great.

As a proof of the utter carelessness and apathy of the culprit, it may be mentioned that he wrote, during Sunday, on the frontispiece of one of the religious books supplied to him, the following words:—"Thomas Wicks hung." The date was not filled up, but the words quoted were written in a firm bold hand.

From all that can be ascertained, previous to the fatal day, Wicks appears to have been one of those hardened criminals ever confined within the walls of Newgate. It may be satisfactory to those persons who might conscientiously have desired to spare the wretched man's life, under the impression that he was not master of his own actions when he committed the murder of which he was found guilty, to know that, prior to his execution, he made a full confession of his guilt—not only of the actual murder, by shooting his master with a pistol, but also of having long premeditated the crime, and of having purchased, some weeks previously, a knife, for the express purpose of cutting his master's throat. His determination he subsequently changed to that of shooting him.

It has also transpired that, even a few days previous to his execution, he contemplated, and laid a deep scheme for carrying into effect, the murder of the young woman with whom he was intimate for some time past.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 4, 1846.

The controversies of English Journalists are generally bloodless; they fight for their parties, and in the conflict it is impossible but self-love and vanity must now and then be wounded; individual rancour and personal jealousies are as strong here, perhaps, as in other countries, but the almost perfect incognito of the writers diminishes the chance of those personal conflicts which are so frequent in France and America, that Editors of Newspapers may be called a fighting as well as a writing class. Objections have been frequently urged against the system which in England conceals the Conductors of the Press behind the "Anonymous:" in a few cases, of course, concealment is impossible, but, as a general rule, the genius of public opinion are guided by those who, as far as personal responsibility is concerned, might as well be myths or shadows. That many an able writer is thus defrauded of what might amount to fame is true, but, as a general system, we firmly believe it is the best. It is evidently a fallacy to suppose that when the writers are known their writings will be less personal; the contrary is the case.

In France, politics are entirely personal: M. A., of the Presse looks on a smart article from M. B., in the National, as a personal insult and pistols are the consequence. In America, though the literary talent of the Newspaper Press is far below that of France, the same causes produce the same results—duels between rival writers are of common occurrence; two Editors, the other day, cut each other to pieces with bowie knives; still more recently, we have read of a duel two other gentlemen fought at thirty paces with rifles, happily without bloodshed. We do not believe that political writers are less sincere in their opinions—less bold in expressing them, than where they are liable to this vulgar and common-place test of courage. Nor do we find that they abuse their incognito, and make it a shield for personal attacks, either on a "contemporary," or leading Statesman of the party they oppose. Here the objects of attack are arguments, not persons; against arguments bullets are useless, and the spilling of ink more efficacious than the shedding a more precious fluid.

When we see the miserable enmities and heartburnings that attend the "individual responsibility" forced upon journalists in other countries, we cannot wish success to the few who have advocated the introduction of the system here: the Press is a power not capable of being wielded by any one party, but acting with something of its effect. We know that it is conducted by individuals, as we do that the Law is administered by Judges, who are but men and lawyers; but it would be ruinous to subject the members of the Judicial Bench to defiance to mortal combat, or foster a state of things that would make Lord Denman's decisions liable to the check of a challenge from some injured plaintiff or defendant whom that decision may have aggrieved in goods or reputation. Powers that are essentially impersonal, are not to be reduced to individuality and all its accidents what is the value of a "moral influence," that can have its brain blown out? Yet there are countries where society makes the casualty very usual—for all the "influence" an individual may possess would vanish there, if he refused to convert himself, at the caprice or passion of a rival, into a human target.

To this idea of the personal responsibility of the Journalists, for his publicly expressed opinions, many valuable lives have been sacrificed, both in France and America. The death of Armand Carrel in his duél with Girardin was felt as a loss throughout Europe. More remote and more disgraceful to the age and nation, was the death of Courtier, who fell by the hand of an assassin, but from the same spirit; the effect of his public writings were revenged upon the man. That spirit still survives; within the present week has appeared the account of the trial in Paris, of M. Beauvallon for the murder of M. Dujarrier—both Journalists. Truly the life of a French Editor is "a warfare upon earth;" the laws of the Camp have there been imported into the Republic of Letters: it can be but a lower kind of civilization that is thus controlled, for after all the decision of weapons is a barbarous one.

The survivor in this case has been acquitted of murder; but the French law is, in one respect, superior to our own: it gives pecuniary damages to the family of the deceased, perhaps left destitute by the loss. The mother and nephew of the murdered Editor are awarded 20,000 francs; a wretched compensation for what is priceless—human life,—but something in the way of fine on the survivor. We might adopt this provision to advantage; but we have no wish to see our "anonymous" system of journalism exchanged for one that would let loose the vile and petty passions of men to mingle in the grander conflict of principles and opinions; we see how often these convert the field of argument into the field of death.

The success of the Anti-Corn-law League is too decided not to encourage imitations of it. The principle of co-operation is destined to be extended: every objectionable tax we are subjected to will be in turn attacked by a separate society. There will be a brotherhood leagued against every head of the Hydra. The agriculturists are setting the example of this development of the might that slumbers in a Committee, Chairman, and Treasurers. An Association for obtaining the total repeal of the Malt-tax has been formed—has, in fact, an Anti-Malt-tax League. If it has a fair share of the energy of its half-namesake, it is very probable it will succeed; it will find many sympathisers; the "cheap pot" seems almost a natural addition to the cheap loaf. Beer, Bread, and Beef, should be the motto of the Society: the last is liberated; bread is going through the process; is beer alone, the drink of Britons, to remain subjected to a heavy and an ignominious tax?

Even the heavy Bavarians rose as one man, when their Government intruded itself into vat and tankard; and shall Englishmen be less quickly moved than the phlegmatic Germans? Seriously, however, the Malt-tax is a direct and serious grievance; it is an Excise impost, and does injury beyond the mere amount of the revenue it raises from the enhanced price of a necessary of life. We believe that the exceeding productiveness of the tax, is the greatest obstacle in the way of its remission; in point of principle, it is difficult to defend it; we have no doubt it acts injuriously to the Farmer, by limiting the cultivation of barley. He has a fair right to claim relief from it; and we have no doubt that the movement against it will increase in strength, if the question is discreetly managed.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE EIGHT-OARED MATCH.

Yesterday (Friday), the second annual grand aquatic trial of strength between the two Universities was decided over the course lying between Putney and Mortlake, the rowing being, however, the reverse of last year, downwards. The crews were:—

OXFORD	CAMBRIDGE.
1. Mr. Pochampton, Pembroke	1. Mr. M'rdoch, St. John's
2. Burton, Christ Church	2. Horroyd, Trinity
3. Heygate, Merton	3. ——Cassell, ditto
4. Penfold, St. John's	4. Cloves, ditto
5. [illegible]	5. Wider, Magdalen
6. [illegible]	6. Harkness, St. John's
7. Stapylton, Merton	7. —Woolstanholme, Trinity
Midman, stroke, Christ Church	Hill, stroke, ditto
Soames, coxswain, St. John's	Lloyd, coxswain, St. John's

In the last match our readers may recollect the Cantabs were victorious; and, on the present occasion, they left nothing whatever undone to sustain the reputation they so justly acquired, while the Oxonians underwent some sharp practice with the view of retrieving their former losses, and, if possible, recovering their position in the aquatic world they have occupied for years. Every preparation suit able to the occasion was made at the Swan Stairs, Southwark, and the Union Jacks and flags, bearing various nautical emblems, contrasted most appropriately with the distinguishing colours of the two Universities—the Oxonians sporting a dark blue on purple, and the Cantabs a sky-blue. The boats were the subject of some examination that of the Cambridge University in particular. The ours were painted light blue, to correspond with the lining. Neither the Oxford boat nor its oars were painted—the latter, however, were neatly varnished.

The Cantabs were the favourites, at long odds, owing, no doubt, to the advantages which they possessed in point of size and muscular form over their opponents.

The start took place exactly at the appointed time, half-past eleven, the Oxonians having a slight advantage in the stand; both crews, however, were shortly together, amidst the cheers and exclamations of their respective friends; from whom, at every moment, and on every side, might be heard the enthusiastic cries of "Bravo, Oxford!" "Bravo Cambridge!" &c

The Cantabs, however, after a few strokes, took the first place, being about half a boat's length in advance, and on this they continued to improve, passing Fawsley Ait, where the Oxonians made a hard struggle, first! Technically speaking, the contest was a neck-and-neck one to the Vice-Chancellor's, where the Cantabs went to work apparently in right earnest; and, ere a few seconds elapsed, they had the race in their hands. The Oxonians, however, nothing daunted, continued the struggle, without, however, again coming near their opponents, who arrived at Putney Bridge about three lengths in advance, having accomplished the distance (about four miles and a half) in twenty-one minutes. The Cantabs were warmly congratulated on the victory, and were loudly cheered. A sympathising cheer was also given on the approach of the defeated crew, and to which the Cambridge gentlemen heartily responded.

Peers [illegible] on Sir Hugh Gough and Sir Henry Hardinge. It is the intention of the Government to raise Sir Henry Hardinge and Sir Hugh Gough to the Peerage.

The alleged Murder in Golden-lane.—Martin Jennings, the man accused of having murdered a woman named Mary Murray, in George-yard, Golden-lane, was tried yesterday at the Central Criminal Court, and found guilty of "Manslaughter." The Common Sergeant sentenced him to six months' hard labour.

Execution at Leicester.—William Hubbard, who was convicted at the Leicester Assizes for the murder of his wife, explained his offence in front of the County Bridewell, at Leicester, on Wednesday morning. He maintained the most sullen obstinacy to the last, refusing to have any communication with the Reverend Gentleman who frequently called upon him.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

The Paris papers of Thursday, announce that a collision had taken place at St. Etienne, between the workmen and the troops, in consequence of which several of the former had been killed. The intimation, which was conveyed by the [illegible] Spanish, gives no particulars.

The French Government has just received some rather important news from Algiers. It is contained in the following official despatch, dated Algiers, March [illegible]:—

"FROM M. LE MARSHAL DUKE D'ISLY, GOVERNOR GENERAL OF ALGIERS, TO THE MINISTER OF WAR.

"Algiers, March 23.

"Monsieur le Ministre, Since [illegible] events which have occurred, but the consequences of the battles of the 7th and [illegible] as well as the continuation of the defensive measures taken in the desert, are daily developing themselves.

"The Djebel Dira has submitted itself to Colonel Pelissier.

"Nearly all the tribes of Zeal, from the province of Medeah, have regained their territory. Those belonging to the desert are asking permission to do the same.

"Djedid and Ben Aouada, the two great chiefs of the desert of Mascara are [illegible] for pardon. They have adopted the Kabbah of Laghouat as their intermediator. Those who have remained faithful to us have made three razzias on our enemies, and have fired their cannon to celebrate our victories of the 7th and 11th.

"Travellers arriving from Bou-Sada say that the greatest calm is established in that quarter since Abd-el-Kader has been so vigorously pursued.

"Tranquillity is complete in the government of our Kalifah of Bon-Mahiddin. Relations with the Kabyles of the Jurgura have been re-established [illegible]

[illegible] province of Oran; but the rumours of the checks experienced by Abd-el-Kader cannot fail to have improved its situation, which was very good when the last courier left.

"His Royal Highness the Duke d'Aumale has left to command the troops which are assembled under Milianah

"Bou-Maza had an arm broken by a ball in the battle of the 7th, where he had produced a more considerable corps than was supposed. He had 400 horse, 800 infantry. He withdrew personally towards the low Cheiff, and his Lieutenant, Bou-Alem, took the command

"It is not until the month of May, that we can terminate this petty revolt.

"Confidence is restored everywhere in the province of Algiers. Commerce has resumed its former activity; and the markets are again frequented by the Arabs as heretofore.

(Signed) "Duc D'Isly."

COURT AND HAUT TON.

The Court.—The Queen had an evening party on Wednesday, at Buckingham Palace, when the reception of the company, her Majesty and her Royal Consort, accompanied by the Royal Family, and followed by the distinguished visitors, passed from the saloon into the ball-room, where a concert was performed. The Court is expected to remain at Buckingham Palace during the Easter recess, and it is stated in Court circles that there is no intention on the part of the Sovereign of delegating the holding of drawing-rooms during her Majesty's retirement to her illustrious relatives.

Windsor, Thursday Evening, (from our own Correspondent.)—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, who is expected to leave Clarence House, St. James's, for Frogmore, on Tuesday or Wednesday next, where the Duchess will remain during the Easter Holydays. No day has yet been fixed for the arrival of the Court at the Castle

Visit of Prince Albert to the Gallery of British Artists.—Prince Albert honoured this Institution with his presence on Tuesday

Lord Brougham, Lord Brougham, on Saturday, left town for Paris, where the noble and learned Lord will meet Lady Brougham, who has arrived there from the seat of his Lordship, as Cannes. We believe the noble Lord and Lady will return to town by the 20th of this month.

Aristocratic Marriage. A matrimonial alliance is to take place in June, between Viscount Fielding, eldest son of the Earl of Denbigh, and Miss Fermant, niece of the Earl of Cardigan, and heiress to the Downing estates and property in Flintshire. She will attain her eighteenth year in August next. Her income, real and personal, will exceed £10,000 per annum.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Cabinet Council.—A Cabinet Council, which was attended by all the Ministers, assembled at the Foreign Office on Monday. The Council sat for an hour and a half Funeral of Mr. Liston, the Comedian.—On Monday forenoon, between nine and ten o'clock, the remains of this gentleman were conveyed from his residence to Kensal-green. Three mourning coaches, containing the friends of the deceased, followed the body to its resting place, and a vast assemblage of persons were congregated together, and attended the remains of the deceased to the cemetery.

Strawberries at Covent Garden Market. In Covent Garden Market on Tuesday afternoon, strawberries were sold at 5s. 6d. the ounce

The Wellington Statue at the Royal Exchange.—Workmen are at present engaged in erecting iron railings round the statue of the Duke of Wellington in front of the Royal Exchange.

The Wooden Pavement in Newgate street.—The thoroughfare of Newgate-street is now closed, in order to remove the wooden pavement and pave with granite

The New Palace at Westminster.—The Report of the Select Committee of the House of Lords appointed to inquire into the progress of the building of the Houses of Parliament has appeared. It states that "the entire system of ventilation contemplated by Dr. Reid cannot be carried into effect for some years, as it is dependent upon the completion of the Central and Victoria Towers. The Committee are satisfied, from the evidence given before them, that the House of Lords may without difficulty be completed, with permanent fittings, for the opening of Parliament next year."

Improvements in the Tower.—In the course of a short time, upwards of 200 houses, at present the habitations of the wardens and artizans employed in the Ordnance department of the fortress, are to be demolished, to admit of the [illegible] improvements now going on within the Tower.

Mortality in the Metropolis.—The births registered in the metropolis during the week ending Saturday, 28th March, were 1,412; deaths, 1,065.

The Late Fire in Cowcross-street.—On Monday morning, pursuant to adjournment, the Jury re-assembled at Marylebone workhouse, to investigate the inquiry into the death of Robert Butters and his three children. Nothing material in addition to what came out on the first inquiry was elicited; and the evidence being concluded, Mr. Wakley said he believed the fire originated in the escape of gas, which ought always to be put out on persons going to bed; and those persons who neglect to do so should be subjected to a penalty. The following verdict was returned "That the deceased had died from suffocation, caused by fire; but how the fire originated there was no evidence to show."

EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.

It is at all times a disagreeable office to find fault. To the critic, especially, it is painful to condemn rather than to praise, and to the critic of pecuniary beyond all other critics. The practice of art is difficult; the knowledge of that practice hardly to be attained otherwise than practically. The connoisseur who presumes to criticize, lays himself open to the imputation of malevolence, aggravated by ignorance. The artist is dissatisfied, and no respect for the unfavourable opinion which he dissatisfaction.

But there are some degrees of badness in painting, irrespective of the object of the artist, his theory of art, his school of design, his crotchets and peculiarities, which forbid to the critic every thing except condemnation. The majority of pictures this year exhibited in Suffolk-street, reach, at least, if they do not sink below this point. We regret it sincerely, not only for our own sakes as critics, but for the sakes of the offenders themselves, and still more for that of the meritorious artists so unworthily associated, that the impression of their merits, instead of being deepened by the foil of their unhappy fellows, is completely swamped in the general deluge, not of mediocrity, bad as this may be, but of positive unredeemed worthlessness

With this preliminary and sweeping condemnation, which we feel it would be a shame to suppress and unfair to the artists themselves to soften down, we will pass on to a brief notice of the better pictures, saying no more about any single specimen of those fonts which mar the greater part of the pictures in this year's exhibition in Suffolk-street.

As a general rule, the landscapes are good, compared with the figure subjects. There are many of the former of real merit.

The most of the prominent exhibitors in Suffolk-street, are familiarly associated with the locality. Among them, in the first rank, stand Pyne, Holland, Cox, Boddington, Tennent, and the Allens, father and son. We have this year to mourn over the loss of Weehner to the list. This gentleman's landscapes, while they show much of the fancy which characterises his figure subjects, are free from that peacock-tail peculiarity of colour which reduces the latter to so many [illegible] effects.

In Portrait, besides Baxter, who sustains a rising reputation in several very pleasing and unobtrusive pictures, in which the likeness is the main thing, and [illegible] secondary, are vividly and skilfully subordinated, we have the name—T. F. Dickse—new to us, but soon to become known and popular, if he paint many such portraits as that marked 12 in the Catalogue.

Pyne sends two large and very striking landscapes, which occupy the places of honour in the Large Room. The great power and truth of his distance is shown most agreeably and effectively in both, though many may object to the lightness of the foreground as somewhat unsubordinated effect of his compositions—resembling rather the washings of a water-colour drawing than the solidity of oil. However, these are both very admirable works, and in point of aerial effect unrivalled by any pictures in this exhibition, and surpassed by few works of English painters. His sunshine may be deficient in warmth, but it informs the whole of the canvass.

The same artist has several very exquisite smaller canvasses, two especially [illegible] effects, a pair of round pictures, views in Bristol Harbour, struck us as truthful and exquisitely harmonious, though sketchy.

The richest bit of colour in the room—almost as vigorous as a Cuyp—is Holland's "Degree of Venice" (54), one of the best specimens we have seen of this powerful colourist and conscientious painter. His view of the "Lights of London," after a November fog, may be true, but we do not remember anything like it, and so cannot, in conscience, praise his fidelity, the only merit it can claim where singularity be one.

Tennent's "View off Folkestone," with a mid-day effect (30), is a still summer sea, with [illegible] striking from the top of the canvass, and a brig lying lazily on the stretch of water. It is full of truth and sentiment, and [illegible] [illegible] sun and again, from the marble smoothness of Mr. S. Stevens' [illegible] "Degree of Venice" (64 glad to see it marked "sold," a distinction which it shares with a very select few in the room.

Passing from landscape to figures, we will not pause on the waxy and meretricious smoothness of Mr. Stevens, or the odd drawing and odder colour of Mr. Hawkins, but pass to Mr. Woolmer's brilliant and showy female figures, which, dissent from his principle as we may, on the ground of utter unreality, are yet pleasing from the grace of their forms and the skilful disposition of lines. His "Wearing Lady" (31) is an illustration of what is most attractive in this eccentric artist's style. And his "Sisters of York" is equally skilful and more elaborate.

Mr. Herring has several of his admirable studies in horse-flesh. His "Cart-Horses" (318), his "Colt" (156), and his large picture of horses and sheep exhibit that knowledge of animal form and character, in which he stands second only to Landseer. Zeitter has a number of his slight and sketchy, but vigorously characteristic studies of Transylvanian character and manners. We have engraved his large picture of "Pilgrims in sight of the Shrine" (273), and subjoin the lines which accompany it in the catalogue:

[illegible] through many a day,
[illegible] were tried
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible] till
[illegible]
Where once a hermit's dwelling stood;
Its loosened stones all scattered lie,
And will a resting-place supply!

Then his thee on, a few steps more,—
The shrine, the bay, the distant shore,
All hail the sight

Mr. Hurlstone's besetting sin of dirtiness seems to be growing upon him, and mars the indisputable beauty of the faces which he produces in such numbers.

In conclusion, we must notice Mr. Anthony's pictures; the largest (324), "Sunday Morning in the Last Century," viewed from a little distance, is marvellous for its force and solidity. Great as the number of figures is, there is no confusion. It is as distinct as a stage tableau, and has many theatrical defects as well as this theatrical excellence. Viewed close, it is spotty and unfinished. The effect is attained by something like the arts of the scene painter, and we cannot think that this is a defensible practice in easel painting. Still, Mr. Anthony has great and real merit, and if he abandon the more disagreeable peculiarities of his unquestionably effective method, must rise to distinction.

...ING.—DRAWN BY WILLIAM HARVEY.

THE FIRST WHISPER OF SPRING.

"The snow-beam appears, though veil'd in a cloud;
And the pulse of reviving earth thaws her snow shroud.
The brave willow tow-es his plume to the breeze,
As the song of the zephyr thrills over the seas.
Oh! tell me, my father, the cause that can raise
This beautiful change?" "The First Whisper of Spring."

"See! the flowers round the fountain in beauty are dight,
And the rills from the mountain leap down in delight;
The violet's fond eye to the cloudlet is cast,
While the wild lark is singing, despite of the blast.
Oh! father, dear father, why does she sing?"
"He has heard, my dear child, the First Whisper of Spring."

Her Whisper is heard by the wandering wave,
'Tis heard by the slaves that o'er ocean is toil;
The ice-fetter'd mariner, also, hears the tide,
The Moslem's Vespers, and Christian's pride.
"Does then hear it, father?" That dear child sang
Of the spirit that whispers the comi..g of Spring?"

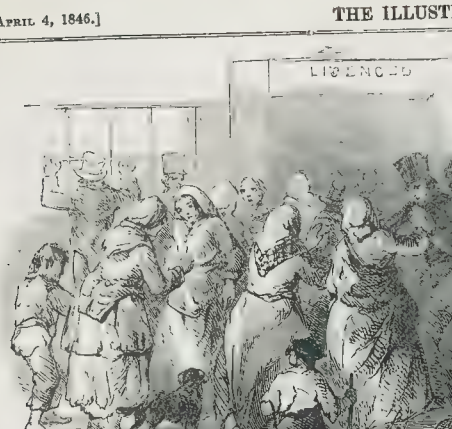
"I oft heard it, Harry, when I was like thee,
And another, too, heard it, and heard it with me.
And her face was the sweetest of nature's rare joy—
You now look on the fair I cannot but love.
"Oh! father, dear father, it tenderly sings
That words then, I mean, the First Whisper of Spring."

"No, boy, it was elped, for it breathes through the soul
Aspirations which make him truly control;
Ay, love of man with expanded view,
Filled now, then, with wish to succour here,
For the first of the woes for long spirit sung,
A balm of God's boon is the Whisper of Spring!

MUSIC.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The Second Concert, on Monday last, was honoured with the presence of Her Majesty, who arrived at the Hanover-square Rooms, accompanied by H.R.H. the Prince Consort and the Duchess of Kent. There were also present on this interesting occasion, the Duchess of Sutherland, the Duchess of Buccleuch, the Marchioness of Douro, Lady Cowper, Lady Hume Campbell, Lady Catherine Cavendish, Lady Lennard, Viscountess Jocelyn, Lady Caroline Cocks, Hon. Miss Devereux, Lady Augusta Bruce, the Earl of Liverpool, the Earl Delaware, Earl of Falmouth, Earl Cawdor, the Earl of Jersey, the Marquis of Abercorn, Lord Rivers, Lord Charles Wellesley, Sir George Cowper, Sir E. Bowater, the Bishop of Chester, Lord Hotham, Sir A. Barnard, Sir W. Curtis, Sir Giffin Wilson, Sir Isaac Goldsmid, Sir W. and Lady Medlicott, Colonel Bowles, Captain Seymour, Mr G. Anson, Mrs. Anson, Dr. Prætorius, Hon. F. Cadogan, &c. Her Majesty arrived at eight o'clock, and was received by the Directors in full dress. A band of honour had been placed at the doors. On the entrance of the Queen into the room, the band, conducted by Mr. Costa, whose position in the orchestra was much cheered, played the National Anthem. The programme commanded—as the Royal Amateurs was a splendid instrumental treat. It consisted of Mozart's [illegible] Mr. Moscheles's [illegible] Weber's "Oberon," and Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony. The latter was performed in a manner which elicited the warmest applause. Beethoven's [illegible]



GOVERNMENT SALE OF INDIAN CORN, AT CORK.—(FROM A SKETCH BY MR. MAHONY.)

INDIAN CORN IN CORK.

On Saturday last, the Government Sales of Indian Corn and Meal commenced in Cork. Immediately on the depôts being opened, the crowds of poor persons who gathered round them were so tumultuously inclined as to require the immediate interference of the police, who remained there throughout the day. Among the poor, who were of the humblest description, and needing charitable relief, the sales were but scanty. The occasion had become of necessity; for potatoes have risen to 11d. market price for 14lbs.; and, some of the leading commercial men in Cork have made a calculation, which shows that the Government can afford to sell the Indian Corn at a much cheaper rate. Our artist at Cork has sketched the crowd immediately on the opening of the sale.

We feel gratified to learn that a steamer has been despatched from Cork to Dublin, laden with two sacks of Indian meal.

One half, by the orders, is to be despatched by the Royal, and the other by the Grand Canal, to the interior. It must be acknowledged that her Majesty's Government are executing their duty promptly and with energy.

The Cork Examiner of Tuesday, contains the following account of the sale :—

"The bakers in Dublin are selling Indian meal bread in large quantities to the better classes, as well as to the poor, and all consider it more palatable than the ordinary wholemeal, or brown bread.

"The price fixed on it was one penny per pound. The result of the day's sale is sufficient to dissipate all further doubt, and to demand the most serious attention of the citizens of Cork.

"We understand that 11 sacks of the corn meal were sold on Saturday, at one penny per pound.

"The committee waited this morning on Mr. Hewitson, to grant them a further supply, they, of course, offering to pay the full price for it, but Mr. Hewitson was compelled to refuse the request, he having no orders from the Government to that effect.

"The people, supposing that the supply would be continue, assembled in hundreds round the depôts, but were informed of the fact of there being no more for sale. Consider ble ex. itement was occasioned by the announcement, and the Mayor, fearing that a disturbance might arise in consequence, published a public notice, stating that when the order, which was daily expected, should arrive, further supplies would be distributed."

EVICTION OF TENANTRY IN ROSCOMMON.

A writer in The Freeman's Journal in Dublin paper, gives an appalling account of the evictions of tenantry in the counties of Roscommon and Galway, from the estates of a lady named Gerrard. After giving some account of the property, the writer says :—"But let us proceed to the scene of ruin. Leaving Newtown Gerrard, you pass along to the left of the new mansion on the road to Mount-Bellew, and about a mile from that pretty little town, the first sight of the recent scene of desolation presents itself to view. The village of Ballingless, parish of Kilmacloe, and barony of Kilconnell, county of Galway, was situate here, and was built on the confines of a bog, which, in a great measure, had been reclaimed by the tenants, the land, particularly at the rear of where the houses once stood, presenting an appearance of high cultivation, which was produced by the patient and hard industry of the tenants, who were in a manner over the country, without a resting-place for their weary and toil-worn limbs, save that supplied by the broad canopy of Heaven, and the charity of a few poor people in the neighbourhood and in Mount Bellew. About a quarter of a mile from the main road, the houses were clustered together in groups of three or four, and so contiguous that short distances apart; they were in number 61. Not one of those habitations is now standing, save one; and you shall presently see the reason that this solitary dwelling is still permitted to remain. I went through, or I should rather say walked over, the ruins of all; and, from what I saw and heard, I concluded that they were all substantial cabins, neat, and neatly-kept habitations, with snug kitchen gardens either before or behind them. In each room of them, I have had the evidence of Mr. Mathew Donovan, at Ballygar, by whom I was accompanied, and who afforded me most important information on this subject, and who witnessed the scene which took place on Friday, March 13, 1846, describes it as the most appalling he had ever witnessed—women, young and old, running wildly to and fro with small portions of their property, in order to save it from the wreck; the screaming of the children, and wild wailings of the mothers driven from home and shelter; their peaceful homes, hallowed by a thousand fond recollections, all combined to form a picture of human misery such as the darkest imagination alone could realise. At an early hour on the morning of Friday, the 13th ult., the Sheriff, accompanied by a large force of the 49th Regiment, commanded by Captain Brown, and also by a heavy body of police, under the command of Mr. Cummings, proceeded to the place marked out for destruction. The people were then, according to the process of law, called on to render possession, and within the bailiff of Mrs Gerrard commenced the work of demolition. In the first instance the roofs and portions of the walls were thrown down; the former, in most instances, fell on the side of the road. It was not wait until the boy came out of the house, but I am happy to inform you that this is a mistake. The boy was certainly hurt, but not severely, and, it appears, he was sent to one of the bailiffs, not to a tenant, and that the transaction was purely accidental.

"Mr. Donovan and my self walked round the premises very close, and counted the number of houses about to be levelled with the ground. Upon my word I have been taken to demolish the houses, as I was told by the bailiffs, and I suspend my credit when I say, and when the inside turned up, good plaster and whitewash always appeared. Not content with throwing down the roofs and walls, the very foundations have been turned up; and here I must explain what, at present sight, I stated, namely, that only a portion of the walls were pulled down in the first instance. That is true; but, on the night of Friday, the wretched creatures pitched a few poles slantwise against the walls, covering them with the thatch, in order to procure shelter for the night; but when this was perceived next day, the bailiffs were despatched with orders to pull down all the walls, and root up the foundations, in order to prevent the 'wretches' (this, it appears, is a favourite term applied to these poor people) from daring to take shelter amid the ruins.

"When this last act had been perpetrated, the 'wretches' took to the ditches on the high road, where they slept in parties of from 10 to 15 each, huddled together before a fire, for the two succeeding nights. I saw the marks of the fires in the ditches; everybody can see them, and the temporary shelter which the 'wretches' endeavoured to raise around them. These, with the sticks rescued from their recent dwellings, the thatch and the dung, remain there as evidence from their recent dwellings, the thatch and the dung, remain there as evidence from their own statement. The whole extent of ground connected with the estate is about 600 acres. It may be upon seven acres more or less, but I believe, from village to village, that this would be found about the number of acres which the best information that this would be found about the number of acres which Mrs Gerrard has reserved, and over which her fat bullocks may now roam, with not a solitary but to interrupt them.

He writer concludes by the extent with a list of the families, and their names, ejected on the 13th of March, from which it appears that 270 persons have been sent on the world without a home or even a shelter.

COUNTRY NEWS.

EXPLOSION OF A STEAM BOILER AT BLACKBURN, AND LOSS OF SEVERAL LIVES.

On Tuesday last, about half-past five o'clock, the boiler attached to the steam engine of the Eagle Foundry, Blackburn, exploded with a terrific noise. Several of the houses on the opposite side of the street were very much shaken, consider able portions of the wall being strewn in and all the window-frames shivered to fragments. Fragments of the building were projected as far as 500 or 600 yards. Several of the windows of the Boar's Head public-house (distant between 500 and 600 yards) were also broken. In a few minutes after the explosion an immense crowd had assembled on the spot. The first person discovered to be injured was found lying on the ground, quite insensible, and a mass of the adjacent wall. She was immediately conveyed to the Infirmary, where she died about an hour after the accident occurred. The next

LEAMINGTON.—PAST AND PRESENT.

There are few passages in "strange, eventful history," better adapted for illustration in this Journal, than the rise of towns and highly-favoured localities, from obscurity to merited fame; more especially in connection with the recurrence of Festivals, by which the prosperity of these places is constantly indicated to the public. Such is the present high position of Leamington in association with the Spring Meeting, graphically recorded in our Journal of last week.

To begin with a Great Fact. Some thirty years ago, Leamington was an insignificant village, with its humble church, a roadside inn, a bowling-green, blacksmith's shop, and a few scattered cottages. Now, it is a finely-built town, of first-class mansions; a magnificent church; pump-rooms, and assembly rooms, town-hall, music-hall, hotels, libraries; parades, terraces, and villas; and shops of metropolitan character.

To add figures to facts:—

	Houses.	Population.
In 1801, Leamington contained	60	315
In 1811	..	543
In 1821	400	2,183
In 1841	2,000	12,500

Now, at least, the population numbers 15,000; and the houses have increased in a like ratio; thus realising Drayton's quaint couplet —

A poor thatched village once, or scarcely none at all,
That could not once have dream'd of her now stately wall

The proximate cause of this high forcing has, unquestionably, been the setting-in of the stream of wealth and fashion; but, a little further examination will show the preference to be warranted by the numerous means and appliances for healthful and luxurious enjoyment.

In picturesqueness of site, Leamington takes precedence of all other Spas of England. It forms almost the very centre of the island, and is exactly in the heart of Warwickshire, styled by Drayton, "Britain's midmost region, that shire which we the heart of England well may call" it is, therefore, "the heart of hearts," "the heart's core."

The town takes its name from the river Leam, on whose banks it is seated; and derives its affix of "Priors," from its having belonged to Kenilworth Priory. This addition name has been maintained, also, to distinguish the town from Leamington Hastang, vulgo Hastings, a village about ten miles north of Leamington Priors.

Lying in what is termed "a fine sporting country," Leamington has long been attractive to the lovers of the health-giving chase. The character of 'the Warwickshire Hunt" is of olden celebrity: and the season just closing, has produced, fields, also, which, in point of numbers and high rank, were never before equaled —about fifty brace of foxes having been killed. Indeed, in addition to its varied society, varied amusements, and gay assemblies, it boasts others, of no small importance to the lovers of hunting, viz., a country unparalleled for its sporting capabilities: its abundance of foxes: the number of excellent packs of hounds within a short distance: the extensive and well-arranged Mews and Livery Stables within its limits: with ample choice of lodgings, suitable for all grades, from the noblest patrician to the veriest plebeian helper in the stable; and, what to a genuine sportsman is no mean consideration, its numerous princely Hotels, where all the luxuries and comforts of life may be had at a lower rate than at any similar place of resort in the kingdom."

Meanwhile, the steady progression which Leamington has annually made, for the last twenty years, in the number of its residents, the increase and importance of its attractions, both to the sporting and fashionable world, as well as the conveniences requisite to the valetudinarian, and the gratification of the mere seeker of pleasure, give the Spa first position as a winter residence, place, in that happy combination of local advantages, combined with its own immediate accommodations, which makes it equally desirable as a summer resort. Nor, do we believe these advantages to be over-rated by local partiality.

THE FIRST POST OFFICE.

Warwick (says a topographer,) is a noble county. Its woodlands, the remains of the wide, ancient forest of Arden, are still extensive, and a great part lies in fine natural grass. The extensive plains are so diversified by hills and rivers, as to improve the picturesque aspect of the country, and harmonise with the grand objects of art which it contains.

Should the visitor be tired of the trottoir of the Spa, he may soon escape to delightful promenades and drives in the suburbs, whilst a single glance at the map will show him to be environed by the most famed portion of the island, rich in the "Nooks and Corners of Old England," ever and anon enshrined in our colleagiate Church, and guardian Castle, one of the very few baronial residences now remaining, which are connected with our earlier history, its clustering towers and lived walls, embosomed in wood vying with its interior feudal splendour. About five miles northwards are the roofless walls of Kenilworth Castle, once the almost regal seat of Lancaster and Dudley, but now exhibiting the feudal state in decay as Warwick shows it in full glory. Northward, too, at an easy distance, lies the city of Coventry, with its fairies lofty and beautiful spires, and its projecting storied streets of the 15th century; though a very hive of industry —for Coventry has not slumbered on its antique distinctions. In this locality, too, are the Cistercian Abbeys of Combe and Stoneleigh, with their noble parks, luxuriantly wooded; besides a host of baronial remains, moated houses, and stately mansions, the seats of the nobility and the patrician landholders of the county.

But, there is still another attraction within ten miles of Leamington—a shrine to which pilgrims of every age and clime pay homage—Stratford-on-Avon, where—

"his first infant lays sweet Shakspeare sung,'
And "the last accents faltered on his tongue."

Then, in its fine cruciform church lies the dust of him

"whose name doth deck ye tombe
Far more than cost."

In this beautiful locality, too, is the fine Elizabethan mansion of Charlecote, with its bannered hall and storied windows, and proud ancestral trees.

To return to Leamington. It lies in a country distinguished by appellations, "which make us seek, in our walks, the very foot-marks of the Roman soldier." We find it, also, among the possessions of the Saxon and British Earls of Warwick; and a Saxon palace may be traced in the neighbourhood

But, we must deal lightly with the dry-as-dust records, to get to "the sources of antiquities," Camden, who first noticed the mineral spring upon which the fame of Leamington is based. But, neither Camden, Speed, Dugdale, Fuller, Blome, or Thomas, who mentioned this spring between 1586 and 1730, appear to have been aware of its medicinal properties; and the minute Dugdale "makes pretty pork of the matter," by stating that the Leamingtonians pickled their meat in the water! Drs. Short, Rutty, and Russell arrived at a better estimate of its properties though it was more used in cases of hydrophobia than any other; a remarkable circumstance in the beginning of the eighteenth century.

At length, the success of Cheltenham as a Spa, in the adjoining county, and its slow and scanty supply of water, suggested to Dr Holyoake, of Warwick, the advantages of the copious Leamington spring for saline bathing: the Doctor offered the father of the late Lord Aylesford £100 for a building-lease or grant of the site of the old cottage and spring at Leamington; but this offer Lord Aylesford nobly refused, declaring that he would not suffer the water to be locked up from the public, and more especially from the poor.

Accordingly, the popular fame of the Leamington Spa was founded by one Benjamin Satchwell, a rhyming shoemaker, who versified the cures, &c. in the Coventry and other newspapers. He had a coadjutor, one William Abbotts, who possessed a piece of ground opposite the old well, and thereupon, in 1784, discovered a second mineral spring. He then sunk a well, and raised a building, containing one hot and one cold bath, the first built in Leamington: opened June, 1786. Meanwhile, Satchwell continued to advertise the water as a nostrum; although the only accommodation for visitors was in two small inns, and three or four cottages, the rooms of which were boarded for that purpose.

The Spa now rose in character greatly by professional testimony to its efficacy. Dr. Allen is proved, (by the Coventry Mercury, Sept. 29, 1788,) to have been the first medical man who recommended the Leamington water; and he was followed by Dr. Lambe, of Warwick, who analysed the spring, and proved it to greatly resemble the water of Cheltenham, then in the zenith of its celebrity.

Visitors now flocked in space; Satchwell established a Post-Office, which is engraved in our first illustration. Still, this is a scene of many after years—1815, when Satchwell's sister was post-mistress: the London mail then came ved Warwick, arriving at half-past twelve in the day, and leaving again at two; and there are persons who recollect the letter-bag being carried to and from Warwick by a stout yeoman, armed with a regulation sword and brace of pistols; ten or twelve letters being then an unusually large delivery.

In 1790, a third spring was discovered in the high road from Warwick to Southam and London; and baths built in a superior style. In 1805, three other springs were discovered

The public and original spring, "Lord Aylesford's Well," being on waste land, near the church, belonged to that nobleman, as Lord of the Manor; it is enclosed by a Doric stone structure, and has an extra pump, left open for the use of the poor. Abbott's spring, already mentioned, is at about 60 yards' distance from the original spring, nearly in the centre of the town: the baths were handsomely rebuilt in 1815.

Thus far, the rise of the Old Town on the south bank of the Leam. In 1808, a New Town was commenced on the opposite bank, a stone bridge thrown across the river, and a spring discovered. A magnificent suite of baths was erected here at the expense of £25,900; marble superseded the old wooden dipping-tubs; and a steam-engine did a hundredfold the work of the well-windlass. This vast establishment is named the Royal Spa, and has a lawn, gardens, and shrubberies, which, with the river Leam, separate the New from the Old Town. There were, besides, erected in the former, assembly-rooms, and hotels, upon a most costly scale, and fitted for the most luxurious accommodation

Meanwhile, the public patronage did not desert the Old Town. In 1814, a small Theatre was built here. Soon afterwards, Mr Elliston, the admirable comedian, in passing through Leamington, was so struck with the beauty of the place and its capabilities, that he settled the younger branches of his family there, and speedily became the arbiter elegantiarum of the town, for which his excellent taste and spirit well qualified him. He became proprietor of the Theatre, and there gave his brilliant impersonations of the master-pieces of English Comedy; besides bringing from the metropolis, Kean, Munden, &c., in the summer season. In 1821, Elliston, not to be outstripped by the New Town, completed a superb pile, from the design of his friend Beazeley; including a library and reading-rooms, assembly and card-rooms, at a cost of more than £25,000. The exterior has a handsome arcade and colonnade.

We have not space to particularise the progress of the buildings; but must sum up. Besides the Spa establishments, which have hot, cold, vapour, and shower baths, and pump-rooms, there are upwards of thirty handsome hotels; also, lodging-houses and many spacious private houses; chiefly fronted with Roman cement. There are libraries and assembly-rooms; a museum and picture gallery; public gardens; several chapels; the old church, and a large new church in course of erection; schools and baths for the poor, &c. Nor is the great work of charity lost sight of amidst the expensive associations of the place.

The town has, of course, all the advantages of improved construction and provision. The streets are, generally, regularly laid out, well paved, and lit with gas. It has railway communication with the metropolis, by a branch of nine miles, to the Birmingham line at Coventry; the entire distance of Leamington from London, by railway, being 103 miles. (An account of the Opening of the Warwick and Leamington Railway, with views of the Kenilworth Station, the Melbourne Grange Viaduct, and the Leamington Terminus, appeared in No. 137 of our Journal.)

The Leamington water is of the saline aperient class, and is especially recommended for disorders of the digestive organs, scrofula, and cutaneous eruptions, paralytic affections, rheumatism and gout; or, as Dr. Middleton remarks: "to the sedentary and studious; to the man of pleasure and the man of business; to all who have suffered the current of life to stagnate for want of active exercise, or have driven it on too rapidly by indulgence and success, let me recommend an annual resort to these salubrious waters."

THE ENGRAVINGS.

Of the First Illustration—the primitive Post-office at Leamington—we have already spoken.

THE OLD CHURCH, AND FIRST PUMP-ROOM.

The Second Engraving shows Bath-street, with the New Post-office; and the contrast of its architectural pretensions with the rusticity of the thatched office, corresponds with the advance in the business itself. There are now two daily post deliveries in Leamington, with a transit of 40,000 letters and newspapers per week; and a Money-order office, averaging £2000 per month.

In the Third Illustration are seen the Tower of the Old Church, some cottages, &c., from a clever etching by O'Neill, in 1815.

In the Fourth Engraving is shown the west end of the cathedral-like church now in course of erection, inside the nave of which stood the Tower of the Old Church not two years since; and, so cleverly have the gradual removal of the ancient edifice and the building of the new one, been simultaneously proceeded with, that the service has not once been disturbed. To the present worthy Vicar, the Rev. John Craig, the town is mainly indebted for this great work, which, when completed, will be one of the largest and most beautiful parish churches, of modern construction, in the kingdom. Opposite the west end of the New Church, are some fine specimens of the luxurious hotel accommodations of the Spa, combining the splendour of town with the picturesqueness of rural scenery.

GOSSIP OF THE WEEK.

We sat down with a firm determination to be very learned as well as very amusing on the subject of the 1st of April and April Fools. But, unhappily for the former part of our intention, we find that nothing whatever is known of the origin of the custom of sending folks on "sleeveless errands" on this day; and, unluckily for the latter, the amusement to be got out of it seems limited enough.

Whatever be the source of the custom, it is certain that Folly is canonized, and Wednesday was her Saint's Day—when "cap and bells" are said to be in the ascendant.

The old jokes of sending boys for "pigeon's milk," and girls for "the picture of Eve's mother," are worn out. It is hard to raise a laugh even by the "Please, Sir, your shoe-string is untied," or "Please, Ma'am, there's a large black on your nose." We are becoming intolerant of ancestral fun. It still survives, however, in remote country-places, and we have no doubt that in pastoral and innocent Buckinghamshire and Dorsetshire, we have old gentlemen who look forward to the First of April as a day set apart for practical jokes, and the funniest outbreaks of elderly liveliness. But in London the glory of the day has departed. Polly's grin is ghastly-grave, and her "Macaste" works no wonders. The jingle of her bells is out of tune with the buzz and hum of earnest life, the ceaseless roar of the steam-engine, the snort and puff of the locomotive, the whistle of the boiler, and the half-heard voice of suffering humanity that rises from the bosom of the deafening clamour. So say those who look hopefully on the life we are living, and the day that is passing. Others are there—philosophers of more sardonic stamp—in whose eyes all is vanity, and for whom Folly reigns "sole monarch of the universal Earth"—not on each 1st of April only, but the whole year round; in whose ears her bell tinkles in every sound that belongs to human dealing, and in whose theory of life her bauble is the nucleus and rudimental form alike of the old man's staff and the king's sceptre, the lady's fan and the soldier's sword, the gravedigger's spade and the baby's pap-spoon.

Allow us to distribute our April commissions:—

Sweet sirs that would go look for wool,
And come back smoothly shorn,
We've errands that will fit you to the full,
This 1st of April morn.

Go, ragged Pat, fierce fever in thine eye,
Gaunt famine in thy cheek;
Unto thy Rent-fed Patriot apply,
Scantest relief to seek
Is thy reception cool?
Oh—April Fool!

Go, stout John Bull, whose word is as thy bond,
To unctuous Peel draw near;
Ask "if the Income Tax will stretch beyond
Its fixed fourth year?"
Believe his "No"—poor tool,
And April Fool!

Go, stout Scrip-holder in a thousand lines,
If not with panic dumb,
Ask a Director "when the shares will rise
To promised premium?"
And then go back to school,
Thou April Fool!

Go, thou that hast faith in the magic sounds,
"Promise hereby to pay;"
Ask certain journals for "the thousand pounds
They have to 'give away'"—
Then stand on "Dunce's stool"
An April Fool!

Ask Pennsylvania to pay her debt,
Polk to give up his airs,
Provisional committee men to get
The calls paid up on shares.
What's either ass or mule
To th' April Fool?

Look for six months in Spain that have not seen
Their awful revolution;
Ask Prussia's King if to his lands he mean
To give a constitution?
Bless his paternal rule,
Thou April Fool!

NEW CHURCH, PUMP-ROOM, &c.

Look for a Scotchman squand'ring a bawbee,
A beadle without brass,
A grainer by a suit in Chancery,
A knave that's not sans ass
Shorn, where thou look'st for wool,
Poor April Fool!

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—The present week's arrivals of English wheat having been on the increase, the show of samples of that grain here to-day was good. Even the finest qualities met a very dull inquiry, at little, if any, late rates; while the middling and inferior kinds might have been purchased at a decline in the quotations of Is per quarter. Of foreign wheat the imports have been small. Although the quantity on show from this morning was trifling, free and bonded parcels were considered somewhat lower, and a 40s duty commanded There was a fair supply of barley on offer, and what met a dull sale at, in some instances, drooping prices. We had a fair retail demand for fine malt at prev rates. The last trade was very dull, at Monday's currency other articles as last advised Provisions. The best parcels of Irish butter are in steady request, at about last week's quotations; but the middling and inferior qualities may be purchased on somewhat easier terms Dutch butter is dull, at a decline of 5s per cwt. Fine Hams, 100s to 104s; Middling, 86s to 90s; and Bacon Prices and Lard, 52s to 54s per cwt. The bacon market is heavy, at an abatement of 1s per cwt. Beef and pork are dull. Tallow, 37s 6d to 38s, Sale and tiered middle Ameixes, at 42s to 46s for the former, and 44s to 46s for the latter. Rums and hard heavy, but not sharper. Barrelled pork, beef and pork quiet, at late rates Tierces and hogsheads of fine sugar light American in the sale of English chees at full prices. Foreign steady, at 42s to 52s for Edam, 44s to 46s for Gouda, and 44s to 46s for Cheshire. Hops—There is a steady sale, at 4s 6d to 5s 5d for Sussex, and 5s 6d to 6s 6d per 120 for Kent. Coals, —, the dull, at from 20s to 40s per cwt. In other kinds of provisions little is doing.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £3 3s to £4 10s; clover ditto, £4 8s to £5; oat straw, £1 12s to £1 16s, wheat straw, £1 4s to £1 10s per load.

Potatoes.—York reds are in good request at 90s to 140s per ton. In other kinds of potatoes, exceedingly little is doing

Coffee.—Publicity, as well as by private contract, very few sales have been concluded in this article. Low in prices we have no material alteration to report.

Rice. Rather more business has been doing in Bengal, at still prices. For export, comparatively few sales have been concluded

Spices (Friday).—The sale of really fine drops continues remarkably small, such qualities are still very full prices In all other kinds, however, no little is going that is of any account nominal; and, in the way of sales, lower rates must be accepted with. Corn Exchange, Mark-lane, Monday.—The arrivals of English wheat, since last Monday, were rather large, and the show of samples of that grain here to-day was good. Even the finest qualities met a very dull inquiry, at little, if any, late rates; while the middling and inferior kinds might have been purchased at a decline in the quotations of Is per quarter. Of foreign wheat the imports have been small. Although the quantity on show from this morning was trifling, free and bonded parcels were considered somewhat lower, and a 40s duty commanded There was a fair supply of barley on offer, and what met a dull sale at, in some instances, drooping prices. We had a fair retail demand for fine malt at prev rates. The last trade was very dull, at Monday's currency other articles as last advised

A ROYAL PRESENT.

Four high-bred Arab horses, recently sent to this country as a present to her Majesty by Sir Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy, Knight, of Bombay, were presented to the Queen and Prince Albert, in the Riding-house, at Pimlico. The horses were equipped in a clothing of fine cashmere, bearing a floral crown, V.R., and other devices, richly embroidered in gold and silver, and also Sir Jamsetjee's arms.

They were, in the first place, led past her Majesty, Prince Albert, and several Officers of the Royal Household in attendance upon her Majesty, by two native and two English grooms; and afterwards mounted and put through their paces by Mr. Randall, riding Master of the Bombay Horse Artillery, who came home in charge of them. We understand that her Majesty and Prince Albert admired the animals very much, making particular inquiry of Mr. Randall as to their ages, tempers, and marks; and that her Majesty was graciously pleased to express her gratification at Sir Jamsetjee's present.

A massive gold box, highly ornamented, containing some dresses, the manufacture of the East, also from Sir Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy, sent home by the same conveyance, under charge of Dr. Duncan, were forwarded to Her Majesty on Saturday last, having fortunately been saved from the wreck of the Great Liverpool steamer.

FASHIONS FOR APRIL.

It would be impossible to describe all the wonders which fashion prepares for us day after Easter. Silent preparations are now being made on all sides, in both Houses and Gardens, for this season. At the Easter Festival, Longchamps will be the day when all these marvels will burst into view, and it is not till after then, that they will be brought forth in London. The toilettes on that occasion, it is said, will be a splendid array of Parisian taste.

The toilettes preparing for morning wear, for visiting, for dinner-parties, for balls, or Court receptions, will, probably, mostly differ in details of trimming, &c., from those of last season. The rich silks, the velvets, the brocades; the materials in a single colour; the light ramzes and variations for evening wear; the graceful flowers to ornament the head and dress, and large bouquets: all remind us of the toilettes worn last year, the principal difference being in the style in which these articles of dress are made up—the true test of fashion and good taste.

It is said that fancy balls will be numerous this year; and it is at these occasions that our fair readers will display their imaginative taste in search of costumes appropriate to the style of beauty of each.

For the promenade another revolution in the form of Bonnets is beginning to declare itself. The Chapeau de Paméla will be replaced by those of less open form, with the exception of the Paille de riz or Leghorn, which will preserve this shape, and be still more rounded and shorter at the cheeks. The favourite trimmings will be ribbons, flowers, and feathers, and the two former will be chiefly used as strings.

Bonnets made of felt have had a great vogue at Paris this winter, and will continue to be worn until Longchamps. They are trimmed with Cascar spotted with black velvet, and gold or black ribbon.

Morning Caps are made in Guipure, lined with green sarsnet and trimmed with ribbon.

Wreaths of flowers for evening wear are made with numbers of green leaves, shaded from the lightest to the darkest colours; these are all made in wax, and are often mixed with fruit or with filigranmes of silver; they are now mounted rather lower on the head than the natural flowers. The Queen of Spain displays much of the attention of the fleuristes, and they appear every day to bestow on them increased richness of colouring and excellence of imitation

Our next number of Fashions will present the principal toilettes brought to light at Longchamps. We subjoin a description of the Plates. The first represents a Ball Costume, consisting of a pink silk dress, striped with white; six flounces of pink ribbon, edged with white effets, the two upper ones being looped and fixed on front with three bouquets of flowers. The berthe is composed of ribbon resembling the flounces. A clara of jewels on the head, with flowers on each side. The hair is dressed in bands of light, and opening over an embroidered chemisette, with a double trimming of the same material down the front of the dress, and increasing in width towards the bottom. Short sleeves, and coiffure of lace and ribbon.

The figure in the second plate also represents an Evening Costume, consisting of a grey silk dress, with trimming of black lace and pink ribbon, en Tablier, down the front, rounded off at the corners, with a large bow of pink ribbon. A black lace berthe, and head-dress of black velvet and gold, with pink flowers. A white silk dress, trimmed with a deep flounce of white lace, which is headed with white and gold ribbon, and a trimming of the same down the front of the skirt. A Coiffure of green velvet and gold

TESTIMONIAL TO THE REVEREND HENRY VENN, B.D.

In January last, the Rev. Henry Venn, who for upwards of eleven years had been Minister of this District Church, resigned the office he had held with so much advantage to the parishioners, in consequence of his acceptance of the Secretaryship of the Church Missionary Society. Immediately on this announcement being made, a Meeting was held, which was most numerously attended, and presided over by one of the churchwardens, H. F. Richardson, Esq.; when it was resolved to open a subscription for the purpose of presenting the Rev. Gentleman with a Testimonial of their appreciation of his high character as a Christian Minister, and his goodness as a Man.

The subscription was prompt and large; and on Tuesday last, a Meeting was held at the National School Rooms, to present to the Rev. Gentleman the Testimonial. At seven o'clock, the School Room was crowded to excess by the most opulent residents of the district, as well as by the poorer members of the flock all anxious to participate in the gratifying ceremony.

Mr. Richardson, the churchwarden, having been unanimously called to the chair, and having explained the business of the Meeting, proceeded to describe the Testimonial, a handsome silver Candelabra; and asked the Meeting whether the figure of Charity, so beautiful a portion of the design, did not truly illustrate the character of the Rev. Divine—"One who had cheered the lonely home of virtuous poverty, lightened the pressure of old age, soothed the complaints of grief, and furnished to the death-bed a cordial more grateful than any other which could be afforded." The worthy Chairman then justly eulogised the Rev. Gentleman's qualities as a public teacher; and his high character in private life. The Chairman next stated that the armorial insignia of the Rev. Gentleman occupied another portion of the base—an escutcheon which had been handed down to him for many generations, without stain, and had been borne by the immediate ancestry of Mr. Venn, who had been benefiecd Clergymen in an uninterrupted line since the Reformation.

The Chairman then read the inscription, and called attention to the beautiful engraving of the Church on the remaining portion of the pedesal; that church in which, said the Chairman, Mr. Venn had preached the Word of God for eleven years; that church in which, on Sunday week last, he implored aid to the fund for building another consecration to the Deity in the district of Tollington Park; and thus parted with his flock without any ostentatious display of eloquence, but with an effort for the glory of God and the salvation of souls.

The Chairman then referred to the munificence of Mr. Venn in giving up his time gratuitously to the Church Missionary Society, as well as numerous other acts of benevolence; and detailed and concluded with a feeling address to Mr. Venn on presenting him with the superb Testimonial.

The Reverend Gentleman returned thanks in a speech full of feeling and Christian love; and the meeting separated after having voted thanks to William Nicholson, Esq., the Treasurer; the Secretary, T. W. Mann, Esq.; and the Chairman.

The Testimonial consists of a centre piece for the table, executed by Messrs Hunt and Roskell, of New Bond-street; it represents the figure of Charity, with her attributes, in frosted silver, and upon a tree arising therefrom rests a basket for fruit or flowers, the whole being elaborately chased. On the base is engraved the following inscription, together with the arms of the recipient, and a view of St. John's Church:—

PRESENTED TO THE REVEREND HENRY VENN, B.D.
OF ST. JOHN'S, HOLLOWAY,
BY HIS MUCH ATTACHED CONGREGATION,
To mark their grateful sense of his useful services, and to record that exemplary piety, regard for the poor, and munificent liberality which, during eleven years, have characterised him in his high calling as a faithful Minister of Jesus Christ.

THE PAYNE TESTIMONIAL DINNER.

On Tuesday, the George Inn, at Northampton, was the scene of elegant hospitality, promoted by a purely English feeling, which it affords us great pleasure [illegible]

The occasion of this "Higher Law" welcome was the presentation of a superb piece of plate, manufactured by Mr. B Smith, of Duke-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields; and highly creditable to that tasteful establishment. Indeed, the design is novel, and more than usually characteristic; consisting of a stalwart oak-tree, in the branches of which are cups for waxlights, thus forming a very elegant candelabra. Around the bole of the oak are cleverly-modelled figures, emblematic of the chase and other sports; and upon a panel is inscribed:—

PRESENTED TO GEORGE PAYNE, ESQ,
OF SILBY HALL, SILBY,
By upwards of six hundred Farmers, Tradesmen and others, of Northamptonshire, as a Testimonial of their high Esteem for him, and of their Gratitude for his unceasing efforts to promote the manly and healthful Sports of the County.
March 31, 1846.

The whole is beautifully executed in bright and frosted silver, exquisitely chased; the height is 42 inches; weight, 600 ounces.

The magnificent room at the George Inn was most appropriately and ingeniously decorated for the occasion. Over the Chairman were suspended scarlet banners, bearing Mr. Payne's crest; and above the Vice-Chairman, a scarlet banner, inscribed "Success to the Pytchley Hunt" Among the other embellishments were "Welcome," in fuzee' brushes, surmounted with a bust of the Queen, union jacks, Royal standard; emblems of cricket, hunting, racing, coursing, &c. Upon the walls, too, were suspended paintings of sporting life; and Portraits of George Payne, Esq.; the Earl of Cardigan, the Earl of Chesterfield, Lord Southampton,

About four hundred guests sat down to an excellent dinner; with Mr. Canning in the chair; and Mr. Weston, as Vice-Chairman. Among the company were Lord Bateman, Lord Henley, Sir C. Knightley, Bart., M.P., Colonel Bouverie, Colonel Cartwright, W. Payne, Esq., H. H. Hungerford, Esq., Dr. Robertson, J. Cartwright, Esq., J. Nethercoat, Esq., H. Nethercoat, Esq., B Reeper, Esq., W. THE RECESS.

In the short recess of the Legislature, the brief "curtain drop" between the acts of the political drama, there will be no lack of subjects for reflection. They are many and suggestive; and, as if to provide a topic for general consideration, the Government, at the very eve of the holidays, have put forward their proposition—for it is not yet definite enough to call it a plan—for enabling the affairs of Railway Companies to be wound up and concluded at the will of a majority of the shareholders. At last the Government has moved, and everybody is left to wonder why it did not take some such step before. At the beginning of the session, hopes were raised that it would assume some directing and controlling power over the enormous mass of railway speculation. Among so many hundreds of schemes, some must have been better than others. over these some kind of power of selection might have been exercised; but they were all thrown alike into the great lottery of Parliament, to be gained or lost on the technicalities of standing orders—the accuracy of sections and plans, and the compliance with minute regulations, not essential to the merit of the schemes themselves, but fatal to them if found not complied with, though the project might be ever so sound and advantageous.

This is the great defect of our present system; the carrying of railway bills depends not on the merit of the scheme so much as the tact of the agents and lawyers; a kind of legal jockeying is called into operation, by the aid of which the worst of the lot may get pushed past the post. A bad scheme, that has attended to all the absurd minutiæ of the orders, will "pull through;" while a far better one, by overlooking some petty error, omitting to give a notice, making a slight error in a plan, or even by such a casualty as the shrinking or stretching of a parchment, may find itself among the rejected. The great importance attached to these minor details, opens a field for chicanery and juggling; and the most perfect compliance with every order and regulation no more proves a scheme to be a good one, than a slight error should condemn another as a bad one. Then the amount of money wasted in the legal contest is frightful; and, after all, the chances are equal that the worst line of two or three is carried, and, if made, is inflicted on all future generations.

In selecting what lines should be formed and what rejected, the Government might have done great service; but the opportunity was lost: as all schemes had the same chance of succeeding, speculation increased to a dangerous extent; the collapse has arrived—all trades and occupations are suffering from the tightness in the Money Market; thousands have incurred a responsibility that they can scarcely calculate, and from which they would be glad to be relieved; Provisional Committee-men are being hunted by surveyors and tradesmen, and the Committees in their turn are pursuing allottees for the deposits on shares applied for but not received, till these same Committees found they could get nothing by keeping them themselves; while the announcement that a Company has got its Bill, is sure to cause a depression in its Shares in the Market, if depression can be said to be possible. It gives the power of making a call; and the parting with money now, upon any scheme, is almost deemed a flinging of good money after bad. This state of things has existed for some time, and it is a matter of regret that the Government did not earlier do something to extricate the community from the net of Railway difficulties in which it has become enmeshed. But a step has been taken at last; and, during the Recess, the Railway world may contemplate the outlines of a measure which will enable the shareholders in the lines which are brought to a stand-still, by the reluctance every one seems to feel to touch, in any way, anything connected with Railroad paper, to put an end to their miserable existence as a Company, rescue so much of their deposits as may remain after the payment of expenses, and place themselves as they were before, minus what they may have lost by buying at a premium what they cannot now sell even at a discount. The proposition of the Government will be readily accepted; the announcement will infuse a little hope and activity into the market and men will be glad to see something which may be considered the beginning of the end of their embarrassments.

Another matter we may ponder on during the Recess, is the failure of the well-meant haste in passing the Irish Railway Bills, to furnish any employment, as it was hoped they would, to the people of that country. Even for those lines whose bills have long been carried, not a spade has been put into the ground; no money is to be got for the purpose; this is, of itself, a sufficient reason for passing no more acts at present.

SITTING OF A JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

Political affairs are little less embarrassed than Railway matters. The Corn Bill, that seemed, a short time ago, scudding gallantly before the wind, has got under the lee of the Coercion Act and there lies becalmed, like a gay yacht deprived of the breeze in the vicinity of a huge and chilling iceberg: it cannot get on. From a rather excessive deference to precedent and etiquette Robert Peel insists on the Coercion Bill being read a first time, out of respect to the Peers. Most of the Irish, and many of the English members are strongly opposed to that bill, and the debate on the first reading, begun, but broke off in the middle, promises to be of appalling length. The Protectionists are glad of anything that puts off the evil day—the passing the repeal of the Corn-laws, and stoutly back up Sir Robert Peel once more, in giving precedence to force over food; and thus the recess finds all parties dissatisfied, business at a dead lock, and the public beginning to wonder by what singular mismanagement it has been possible to create so much embarrassment, where all seemed so smooth before.

In the meantime the Premier, with a "fixity of tenure" as far as the Coercion Bill is concerned, has little resource, save a plea to the forbearance of the Irish members, begging them to consent to suspend the English Constitution in Ireland, in order that corn may be got out of bond in England; but they cannot see that the end justifies the means, and positively refuse to do evil that good may come. They are perfectly willing to suppose the Corn Bill if it is proceeded with at once, but they will not relax or suspend their opposition to coercion, to hasten the liberation of corn. The more the determination of the Government is considered the more inexplicable appears their self created difficulty. It is the problem of the recess.

The coercion policy itself does not appear more likely to succeed, as it is more maturely considered; and recent accounts from Ireland are the reverse of favourable to the case of the Irish landowners. Confining the people of a whole district to their houses during the night is not likely to prevent outrages, the most remarkable peculiarity of which is that they are committed boldly, openly, and in the light of day; a simple increase of constabulary and military in the disturbed districts, in the nature of a preventive force would seem to be a better precaution. After having tried coercion acts sixteen times without success, it is impossible to attach any value to the present measure, which will do just as much as its predecessors, and no more. To postpone to it all other legislation, to suspend Imperial measures for such a police regulation as the suppression of outrage in a few remote Irish counties, is neither wise nor politic; but it has been done, and the Ministry must bear the consequences. While all this is pending, the accounts of the scarcity of food grow darker and darker; and yet, in the face of all the want and suffering, the Grand Juries in Ireland refuse to put in operation the late act, which enables them to employ the poor in draining and other improvements. The money that is appropriated for public works by England is eagerly accepted; but to put themselves to any positive expense they will not. The act of Sir James Graham was well meant, but it will be a dead letter: it is discretionary only when it ought to have been compulsory. It is in this direction that some degree of coercion seems required. Altogether, the Recess is likely to prove an anxious one.

THE PRIVY COUNCIL, AND ITS JUDICIAL COMMITTEE.

The hearing of an important appeal by a Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, on Saturday and Wednesday last, has suggested the present as a fit opportunity for introducing to our readers the history of this ancient Court, together with its modern judicial enlargement; premising that our Illustration does not represent any special sitting; but the usual form of procedure on such occasions.

We shall first briefly describe the Court generally.

The Privy Council is the principal council belonging to the Queen; her will is the sole constituent of a Privy Councillor; and this also regulates their number, which of ancient time was twelve, or thereabout; but the number has since been much augmented, and is now consequently indefinite. Privy Councillors are made by the Queen's nomination without either patent or grant. Any natural born subject may be a member, taking the proper oaths; but no person born out of the dominions of the Crown of England, unless denizen of English parents, even though naturalized by Parliament, shall be capable of being of the Privy Council. All Privy Councillors are styled Right Honourable.

The duty of a Privy Councillor appears, from the oath of office, which consists of seven articles, 1st, to advise the Queen according to the best of his cunning and discretion; 2nd, to advise for the Queen's honour and good of the public, without partiality, through affection, love, need, doubt, or dread; 3rd, to keep the Queen's counsel secret; 4th, to avoid corruption; 5th, to help and strengthen the execution of what shall be there resolved; 6th, to withstand all persons who would attempt the contrary; 7th, and lastly, in general, to observe, keep, and do, all that a good and true counsellor ought to do to his Sovereign Lady the Queen.

The Court of Privy Council is of great antiquity; and, during earlier periods of our history, appears not always to have confined itself to the entertainment of mere matters of State. It had always and still has power to inquire into all offences against the Government, and to commit the offenders for the purpose of their trial in some of the courts of law; but, it often assumed the cognizance of questions merely affecting the property and liberties of individuals, as is evident from complaints and recognisances very frequently recorded. During the existence of the Star-Chamber, the members of the Privy Council were also members of that court.

The encroachments of the Privy Council were finally checked in the reign of Charles I.; nevertheless, in matters arising out of the jurisdiction of the courts of the kingdom, as in Colonial and Admiralty causes, and also in other matters, where the appeal was to the Sovereign himself in Council, the Privy Council continued to have cognisance, even though the questions related merely to the property of individuals. By 2 and 3 Wm. IV., c. 92, the powers of the High Courts of Delegates, both in ecclesiastical and maritime causes, were transferred to the King in Council. The decision of these matters being purely legal, it was found expedient to make some alterations in the Court, for the purpose of better adapting it to the discharge of this branch of its duties.

By the 3 and 4 Wm. IV., c. 41, the jurisdiction of the Privy Council is further enlarged; and there is added to it a body, entitled "the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council," composed of the actual, and, if any, the retired Lord-President of the Council, and Lord Chancellor; such members of the Council as hold, or have held, the offices of Lord Keeper, or First Commissioner of the Great Seal, Master of the Rolls, a Vice-Chancellor, a Judge of the three Superior Courts, and a Judge of the Prerogative, Admiralty, or Bankruptcy Courts. To these are added two retired East Indian, or Colonial Judges, who each, while acting in the Privy Council, have £400 a year, above their retiring pensions.

Besides the matters above mentioned, her Majesty, under the 3 and 4 Wm. IV., c. 41, may refer any other matter she thinks proper to the consideration of the Judicial Committee; but no matter can be entered upon, unless in the presence of four members.

The Judicial Committee hold their sittings at the Council Office in Whitehall, a portion of the splendid Roman Corinthian pile erected from the designs of Sir John Soane, in 1824—26; and now being enlarged for Mr. Barry, so as to provide for the increased business of the Board of Trade.

The Illustration shows the Court in session, during a sitting; and, consequently, represents the official state of the occasion. The spacious Chamber, which is on the first floor, at the west end of the building, is a noble room, with a lofty ceiling, and has the appearance of a vaulted roof, the walls being divided into bays by coupled Corinthian pilasters, with capitals of gilt bronze, and the ceiling is coved, and in the centre is an elegant lantern. Altogether, this is, perhaps, the most tastefully decorated apartment of our Government offices: it is seen but by a few persons, whereas the exterior of the edifice, which is, certainly, faulty in composition, is exposed to the view and criticism of every passenger.

THE MURDER OF A PARSEE AT BOMBAY.

There have been, during the week, two sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, to consider the petition of Eduljee Byramjee, of Bombay, now a prisoner at Surat, on behalf of himself and eight other Parsee natives of India, praying for the admission of an appeal against the judgment of the Supreme Court of Judicature at Bombay, sentencing them to transportation to Singapore, for the wilful murder of Munchurjee [illegible], and Mr. L. Wigram, Q. C., for the Attorney-General, appeared to oppose the petition. The question of the jurisdiction of the Queen in Council to entertain an appeal from the Court of Judicature, at Bombay, in criminal case in which the Court had not granted an appeal, Mr Hill proceeded with his address, and said he would endeavour to satisfy their Lordships of the propriety of exercising the power, which there could be no doubt the [illegible] following an appeal. The circumstances of the case were these. It appeared that in the town of Bombay the population was divided into political parties, a person of the name of Muncherjee was a workman in the office of a newspaper, called the Chabook. It appeared he was a person of great [illegible] and had frequently been imprisoned several times imprisoned on charges for assault. On the 31st of April, 1844, a person named Burjorjee, with whom Muncherjee had frequently fought, accompanied by a body of his friends, came into the street in which the newspaper office was. Muncherjee, who anticipated their visit, was also provided with a body of his friends; a violent tumult arose, and the witnesses examined on the trial stated that Muncherjee was dragged through the street by his opponents, until he met his death from wounds inflicted by a knife or knives (that being one of the questions). It was remarkable that although the number of persons on each side was very considerable, and although the trial lasted ten days, only two witnesses were called on the part of the prosecution, and they were accidentally present and persons of indifferent character. One had been born a priest, and was then acting as a menial servant. The other was the keeper of a liquor shop, and he recently been discharged from prison for an aggravated assault; and the Chief Justice (Sir H Roper), described them as "persons upon whose testimony, when their passions or interests were involved, he could not place any great reliance." The most they gave was, that four out of the eighteen Parsees who were tried for the murder had knives, and they struck the deceased and wounded him with them. The Chief Justice expressed great doubts of the truth of that statement, as the surgeon's evidence was that all the wounds were inflicted with one knife, the knife held by Burjorjee, who was executed, having confessed that he was the only person who stabbed the deceased. The Jury found the nine prisoners guilty. There was one most important objection to the verdict arising from misdirection. The Jury, after being in consultation five hours, returned into court and asked the Chief Justice would they be justified in returning a verdict of manslaughter? The Judge answered, "Gentlemen it is either murder or it is nothing." There was also another most important miscarriage upon the trial. Their Lordships would be surprised to hear that during the ten days the trial lasted the jury were allowed to separate, and were not under the least control. The consequence was a miscarriage on their part, which in one sense was honourable to them, as it arose from their accepting the assertion of the prisoners, as the surgeon's evidence was that all the wounds were inflicted with one knife, the knife held by Burjorjee, who was executed, having confessed that he was the only person who stabbed the deceased. The Jury found the nine miles of Santa Fé, under the convoy of five vessels of war, preceded in advance by her Majesty's steam-frigate Firebrand, and the French steamer Pluton. On the afternoon of that day, whilst proceeding through a narrow pass, the ships were fired upon for several hours from the heights, which had been taken possession of by General Mancilla, with eight pieces of artillery. The shells and heavy guns from the squadron could not reach them. It does not appear that any of the vessels suffered from the cannonade.

Some of Rosetti's officers, with a small force, had been completely annihilated, near Maldonado, by a very super or force, under General Barrios, and, in consequence, Maldonado had been abandoned, and upwards of 300 of its families had taken refuge in Monte Video.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

THE LATE VICTORIES IN INDIA. The Marquis of LANSDOWNE, who was unavoidably absent when the late vote of thanks was passed, took occasion to eulogize the conduct of the officers and troops, and also that of the Governor-General.

THE LATE INSURRECTION IN POLAND.—Lord BEAUMONT, upon the authority of the accounts which had appeared in the French and German papers, denounced in strong terms the conduct of the Austrian Government during the late Polish insurrection, especially in exciting a servile war against the nobles, and setting a price upon their heads; and asked if any means had been taken to express the disapprobation of the English Government of such proceedings.—The Earl of ABERDEEN expressed a disbelief that the Austrian Government had been guilty of the atrocities which had been ascribed to it, and read extracts of communications from the English chargé des affaires at Vienna, which stated that the peasantry of Gallicia had displayed a spirit of the most determined hostility to the revolutionists, and Darnowski peremptorily refused the proposals of the lords and proprietors of the soil that they should join in it. They had in numerous instances made prisoners of many of those who wished to urge them on, and had denounced their projects to the neighbouring authorities. They attacked, resisted, and took into captivity many of the leaders.

CONDUCT OF THE EXCISE.—Lord DENMAN presented a petition from a Mr. J Smith, which stated that his residence had been entered and searched under the authority of a warrant from the Commissioners of Excise, and that the officer had behaved in a very rough and discourteous way towards the females of the family.—Lord DARNLEY explained that the individual in question had been suspended, but defended the conduct of the Excise generally. The House adjourned at an early hour.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

RAILWAY SPECULATIONS.—On the motion that the Sheffield and Crewe Railway Bill be read a second time, Mr. H. G. WARD presented a petition from certain shareholders, praying that the bill might not be proceeded with, as, in the present state of the money market, the calls would not be paid up.—Some discussion ensued, in the course of which Sir R. PEEL observed that no person could have viewed without great anxiety the railway speculations of the last autumn and winter. It was one of those speculation fevers which periodically afflicted this country—which as regularly produced great suffering among private individuals, and no inconsiderable injury to the public. The results of the last autumn of the difficulty which beset the House in interfering with the transactions of commerce generally; but he thought that, without applying a direct limitation further to the amount of capital to be invested in railroads, or to the bills to be proceeded with this Session, the House had the means of putting a check indirectly on the bills then before it. There were many schemes before the House; but these projects of profit were less, the difficulty of raising money was greater. The appetite for speculation had, in consequence, diminished very considerably. Unless those schemes were likely to be profitable to individuals, it was not for the public interest to permit them to proceed; and he, therefore, thought that it it would be for the public advantage to pass a bill with this limited object—that, where a majority of the shares to earn in a company, or a majority holding more than half the stock of the company, should represent to Parliament that they were not desirous of proceeding with their bill, they should have a full opportunity of declaring it, by petition, to either House of Parliament; and that, in such case, Parliament should refuse its sanction any further proceedings upon it. He proposed that those who originally proposed the scheme should still remain responsible for the expense which they had authorised. He thought, also, that a clause, or an additional clause, should be appended to take possession of the property of the company. In such a case, the House would be relieved from the necessity of compelling private individuals to proceed with a measure which they disliked, or which they found to be injurious to themselves, or to the public, would be unprofitable.—These suggestions appeared to meet the general concurrence of the House. The bill in question was read a second time.

THE PROTECTION OF LIFE (IRELAND) BILL.

Some obstruction was offered to the order of the day for the first reading of this bill, but the order was ultimately read. A debate ensued upon the bill, during which the grievances of Ireland were fully brought to view.

Lord MORPETH announced his intention to vote for the bill. He said that, though he was ready to admit that remedial measures ought to have precedence, or at any rate to have accompanied this measure of coercion, yet he could not maintain the responsibility of refusing to give to the Government some of the powers which they alleged to be essential to the security of human life in Ireland. Even now, when he was going to give a vote not in accordance with the majority of the representatives of Ireland, he was ready to allow that the people of that country, in honesty of dealing between man and man, and in patience under want and privation, were superior to any other people in the world. He was also ready to allow that there were in Ireland more enormous in England than any committed in Ireland; but it was not the enormity, but the system, of Irish crime, which called at present for some interference on the part of the Legislature. He considered that the bill was not calculated to gain its own ends; but that was a reason for considering its clauses in committee, especially as he could not refuse to legislate upon the subject altogether.

Mr. D. SEYMOUR said he had resisted bills of this coercive character on former occasions, and he should be consistent with himself in resisting this bill now. He wanted to see the commencement of a better system—the introduction of remedial measures. But at present the Government was preparing measures which would act like aqua fortis on the peasantry, and like milk and water on the landlords.

Lord G. BENTINCK (in allusion to a long detail of crime in England, made by Mr. D. Browne), said he did not intend to palliate the long catalogue of crime in England, which had been detailed with so much equanimity by the House; but he would let him. Member that in England the sympathy of the English people did not go along with the criminal, whereas in Ireland, or at least in five counties of it, there was a feeling for those crimes, against which the House in the new order of things must contend. It was the necessity of the case which induced him to support this measure, which he admitted to be unconstitutional in itself.

Mr. J. O'BRIEN moved that the debate be adjourned. On this question the House divided, when there appeared—

For the adjournment	.. ..	74
Against it	.. ..	120
Majority	.. ..	—46

A conversation then took place on a proposition of Sir W. SOMERVILLE, to adjourn the debate till that day three weeks. Sir R. PEEL declared his inability at present to accede to such a proposition; and ultimately Sir W. SOMERVILLE withdrew it, reserving to himself the right of renewing it, if he thought fit.

The adjournment of the debate was then agreed to.

The House sat till one o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

RAILWAY AFFAIRS.—The Earl of DALHOUSIE made a statement upon the subject of railways, similar to that of Sir Robert Peel on Monday, and announced the intention of Government to bring in a bill after Easter to enable Railway Companies to wind up their affairs. The noble Earl adverted to the Railway fever of last autumn, and remarked that at present Railways were 80 per cent much out of favour that the price of shares declined in proportion to the probability of the bills passing through Parliament. He then explained the machinery of which would be provided by the bill. Pending the adoption of such bill, he proposed that a resolution should be passed in both Houses of Parliament, to the effect that if a petition should be presented to them, signed by a majority of the holders of stock in any company, praying that the progress of their bill should be stayed, the bill should be stayed accordingly.—Lord MONTEAGLE recommended great caution in dealing with so large an interest as that involved in railroads. The evils described as having resulted from the present state of things had not been exaggerated, and it was time to arrest the further progress of the mischief. There might be a classification of the existing railroads, for example any, but giving a preference to those which were most likely to benefit the public. The proposed bill ought, he thought, to limit the application for the dissolution of companies to those which had not at the time been probably a full power; otherwise one rival company might, by the purchase of shares, obtain the means of throwing the affairs of another into confusion. He (Lord Monteagle) objected to one part of the proposed measure; namely, that which provided that a bill should be suspended on the petition to that effect of a majority of the shareholders, on the ground that Parliament would have no means of deciding on the genuineness of the signatures.—After a desultory conversation, the House adjourned on Tuesday, the 21st inst.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

NEW WRIT FOR MALTON.—A new writ was ordered for Malton, in the room of John Walbanke Childers, Esq., who has accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—In the course of the evening, Sir R. PEEL proposed that the debate on the Bill for the Protection of Life and Property in Ireland should be adjourned till after Easter. He stated, on his suggestion, arranged that the House should adjourn from Wednesday, for the Easter recess, to meet on Friday, the 17th inst., when the Coercion Bill shall be taken as the first business on the re-assembling of the House, and the Corn Bill and Tariff on the Monday following.

LEGAL EDUCATION IN IRELAND. Mr. WYSE drew attention to the present state of legal education in Ireland, and the best means for its further improvement and extension. His object was to obtain the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the matter, but when he had concluded his speech the House was "counted out."

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House met to-day at twelve o'clock. Sir Robert Peel took his seat before that hour.

THE REVENUE

Colonel SIBTHORP gave notice, that on the 21st he would move for copies of the evidence on which the First Lord of the Treasury grounded his anticipations of the amount of surplus revenue which he expected we did be increased by the present year.

IRELAND AND THE COERCION BILL

Sir JAMES GRAHAM laid upon the table the returns made to Government by the Scarcity Commissioners, the members of which are S.r R. Brown (the Commissary General), Sir Robert (Professor) Kane, Mr. Twisleton, Colonel Jones, Sir J. Donnelle, and Mr. Mackenzie. These returns exhibited unequivocally the daily increasing progress of the distress

These returns led to a conversation upon the state of Ireland and the Coercion Bill.

Sir R. PEEL expressed his satisfaction at the fact that, though some prejudices had to be overcome, the introduction of Indian corn was already effecting a social revolution in Ireland, by exciting in the people a taste for a higher description of food. The Irish people were discovering that they could work longer and better, and were, altogether, in better condition, by the use of meal, the produce of Indian corn, than by the use of that watery food, potatoes. At present, however, Indian corn was only admitted into Ireland on a sort of sufferance, under the authority of a Treasury order; the bill which would fully legalize the importation was still waiting the decision of Parliament. The guarantee of an act would inspire confidence. Let it not be forgotten, too, that we required foreign wheat to mix with our own, at a cheaper rate than the present duty of sixteen shillings permitted; and if we could get oats and barley meal at a duty of one shilling, instead of five or six, it would be a great and desirable addition to our own supply, and he had no doubt that an increased importation would follow. At present there was no Treasury order, except in the case of Indian corn; and all operations in the grain trade were in a state of great uncertainty. Under these circumstances, he appealed to Irish members to withdraw their opposition to the first reading of the Bill for the Protection of Life and Property in Ireland, and allow it, on their reassembling, to pass that stage, with a reserve as to its future progress. He felt quite certain that the sooner the decision upon the Corn-laws was come to, the more satisfied would the country be.

Mr T. DRUMMOND said the Government wanted to throw the blame of the delay in the bill on the Irish members, but the country knew that they were not to blame. The Government ought not to press this obnoxious bill. (Hear.)

Mr. P. SCRROPE said if the same delay occurred after Easter, in consequence of the Government pressing the Irish bill, the public would begin to think there was some mystery.

The Railway Deposits Bill went through Committee; and, after some unimportant business, the House adjourned till Friday the 17th inst. for the Easter recess.

RAILWAY COMMITTEES.—HOUSE OF LORDS

On Monday the Committee decided that the standing orders in the case of the London and York had been complied with. Certificates of compliance were also granted to the Dublin, Dundrum, and Enniskerry; to the Midland Great Western (Mullingar to Galway); to the Midland Great Western (Liffey Branch and Longford Deviation); and to the Templemore, Nenagh, and Shannon; all before the Committee in the shape of a second reference The Committees have passed the Wexford, Carlow, and Dublin Junction, the Irish Great Western, and the Great Western Railway Bills.

THE RAILWAY GROUPS.—HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In Group 21, the "preamble" of the London and Oxford, from the Harrow Station of the London and Birmingham, has been declared "not to be proved." The "preamble" of the Wycombe and Maidenhead branch, nine miles, and the Uxbridge branch of the Great Western, two miles, were also declared "proved."

On Tuesday nearly all the groups in operation were engaged exclusively with engineering inquiries.

The Direct Northern appears to have passed through the ulembic of standing orders to adroitly that none of the allegations against it were sustained, though the plans extended over 263 miles of line, and the number of notices served, without omission, amounted to 10,000.

On Wednesday, in Group 19, the Committee decided that the preamble of the Rugby and Huntingdon had not been proved; and that the preamble of the South Midland (Huntingdon Branch) had been proved. The Committees on that day adjourned for the Easter recess.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

FREEDOM OF THE CITY TO THE BRITISH HEROES IN INDIA.—On Monday a special Court of Common Council was held for the purpose of voting the thanks and congratulations of the Court, with the freedom of the City, in gold boxes, of the value of one hundred guineas, to the Lieutenant General, the Right Hon. Sir Henry Hardinge, Knight Grand Cross of the Bath, Governor General of India; to General Sir Hugh Gough, Bart., Knight Grand Cross of the Bath, Commander-in-Chief of the forces in India; and to Major-General Sir Henry George Smith, Knight Commander of the Bath, for the valour, judgment, and ability displayed by them in the recent battles of Aliwal and Sobraon, on the 28th of January and 10th of February last. Also, the thanks of the Court to the other officers, European and Native, for the intrepidity, perseverance, and discipline evinced by them upon both of those memorable occasions. The votes were agreed to unanimously. A similar compliment was paid to Major-General Sir George Pollock, G.C.B.

EAST INDIA DIRECTION.—On Wednesday a ballot was taken at the East India House, for the election of six directors, in the room of William Astell, Esq., M.P., William Fraser, Esq., Sir Henry Inglis, Bart., Russell Ellice, Esq., Major-General Archibald Galloway, C.B., Sir Richard Jenkins, G.C.B., and John Masterman, Esq., M.P., who go out by rotation. At six o'clock the glasses were closed and delivered to the scrutineers, who reported that the election had fallen on Sir Henry Inglis, John Loch, Esq., Charles Mills, Esq., William Henry Chicheley Plowden, Esq., Henry Shank, Esq., and Henry St. George Tucker, Esq. A Court of Directors was also held at the East India House, when the thanks of the Court were voted unanimously to Sir Henry Willock, K.L.S., Chairman, and James Weir Hogg, Esq., M.P., Deputy Chairman, for their great application and attention to the affairs of the East India Company during the past year.

ENLARGEMENT OF THE LONDON DOCKS. More alterations are about being carried into effect at this establishment, it having been decided to add another warehouse of still larger capacity than those completed last year. Workmen have already commenced excavating the ground for a building capable of holding about 15,000 tons, exclusive of the wines which will be contained in the vaults under neath. The cost is to be £50,000. The engineer and architect is Mr. Nesham, and the builders Messrs. W. Cubitt and Co.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The Registrar-General of Births and Deaths reports, that during the week ending on Saturday, 4th instant, there were registered to the metropolis 1028 deaths—a slight decrease in the mortality of the previous week; but an increase on the averages of the corresponding weeks in the last six years of 170. Diseases of the respiratory organs continue to thin the population in larger numbers than any other destructive causes; 316 persons died during the week from the above diseases, 124 of whom fell sacrifices to phthisis or consumption alone. Yet, this is much below the average, which of the last five winters was 149, and of the whole of the same years 144. The number of births registered during the week was, males 748, females 700, total, 1448

THE REVENUE.

In our late impression last week we gave a general idea of the state of the Revenue for the quarter ending the 5th inst. The official account has since been published. We regret to say that the result is a deficiency, as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, to no less an amount than £1,131,504. This deficiency occurs in the following items:

DECREASE.

Customs	.. ..	£443,588
Excise	.. ..	291,627
Stamps	.. ..	96,504

WIGAN ELECTION.—The Committee appointed to try the merits of the petition against the return of Cardale Lindsay for the borough of Wigan, sat from Monday to Tuesday in room No. 11. The case of the petitioner was opened by Mr. Cockburn, who proceeded to call evidence in support of the petition, which alleges bribery and treating. The Committee re-assembled on Wednesday, when no further examination of witnesses, came to a resolution that Captain Lindsay was duly elected.

OPENING OF THE RAMSGATE RAILWAY. The South Eastern Railway Company have fixed Monday for the opening of the Ramsgate line of railway, on which occasion the magistrates and gentry of the town and district will be entertained with a sumptuous dinner by the directors. Extensive preparations are in progress to celebrate the event, and it is expected that the company from London will reach Ramsgate about two o'clock. The opening of the Whitstable Railway for passenger traffic, took place on Tuesday last. This line, it may be recollected, was made as long back as 1832, for the conveyance of coal, the waggons being drawn by ropes and stationary engines. A few months ago it was leased by the South Eastern Railway Company, who have since had the rails replaced by heavier ones.

ROYAL THAMES YACHT CLUB.—A special meeting of the members of this Club was held on Wednesday, at the Piazza Coffee House, Covent-garden, in order to fill up the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of W. Harrison, Esq., who has, for a period of fifteen years, officiated as Commodore, and to whom the Club is much indebted for its present prosperity. Mr. Reynell moved the election of Lord Alfred Paget, as Commodore. He held in his hand a requisition to the noble Lord, signed by 59 members at the last meeting. Captain Preston seconded the nomination, and it was immediately carried. On the motion of Mr. C. Bucknell, seconded by Mr. Josiah Wilkinson, Captain Barwell was elected Vice-Commodore, in lieu of Lord A. Paget.

OUR MAGAZINE COLUMN FOR APRIL.

DINING OUT.

Strange as it may seem, "yet pity 'tis 'tis true," you cannot get a chop or a steak at a tavern in London west of Temple Bar that's worth eating. [illegible] ence of cooking chops and steaks begins at Aldgate, and ceases at the Cock and the Rainbow, by Temple Bar, where Shire-lane divides the City from the shire. Heaven knows the man (a clergyman we are told) was not far wrong who contended, in answer to questions to the new able-cook that came to him, to the simple but important one of, "Can you boil a potatoe well?" fancying, we suppose, and rightly, that a woman who could do this well had got beyond the mere first rudiments of her art, and was, withal, likely to improve. He had, however, done better, we have often thought, had he asked her, in addition, if she understood and could cook a chop or a steak to the satisfaction of one whose [illegible] delicate feeling for the gridiron at "Joe's" in the City, and the box by Le Fl[illegible] at the Cock near Temple Bar. The least hesitation had been favourable; a true [illegible] had she been, a side sig[illegible] that she knew "[illegible]" at once.

There are two things we never wish to have for dinner at home, or at a friend's house—a CHOP AND A STEAK. Chops at home are generally too tallowy, too raw, or if done over and had fire; in short, anything but what they ought to be; and then your home-cooked steaks stick in your teeth with toughness, at a time of the day for a whole evening; or they are too slowly done, or too hurriedly done, or they are "done to a turnip" from your own garden, perhaps, it was the butcher's fault, perhaps they were badly cut, or the meat was too newly killed; fresh from the back of an Abyssinian beast described by Bruce in his clever and entertaining book. In short, you seldom get a chop or a steak at home cannot have a chop or a steak tolerably cooked at his own home. Harder still, perhaps, that he cannot at a London club. Your west-end cooks confine their labours and attention, and devote the whole energies of their establishment, to the dressing of fish, to cut, and merit and demand your approbation while at table All well enough in their way; wonders in art, the result of a long life of attentive observation, but really not to be praised, any one of them, simply, to a chop or a steak at Joe's in Finch-lane, or Colnett's, at the Cock near Temple Bar.

A man may spend the period of an apprenticeship in London, and really not know half-a-dozen good taverns where he can get a chop or a steak cooked to perfection, and at a reasonable cost. We have even met with men who have lived in London for a much longer period of time, as raw on the subject as the last arrived from the fine-times of Cornwall, or the more dreary wastes of Dartmoor and Hay Tor. You cannot get a chop at Stevens's or Long's in Bond-street, equal in quality or flavour to a chop at the Cock in Fleet-street, or a steak at the Rainbow Cider or the Clarendon equal in excellence to a steak at "Joe's" in Finch-lane; or those masterpieces in their way which "Ben," mine host of the Cheshire Cheese, snatches with a cunning hand from a clean gridiron over a clear fire in the little office-court in Fleet-street.

A man may dine for very little in London. A shilling or fifteen pence will procure a dinner more than sufficient to keep body and soul together, without resorting to the potato-stands and hot cockle-stalls in St. Clement's churchyard, in the Strand, or the kidney-pies that attract attention at the Surrey end of Westminster Bridge. Many have dined, and still continue to dine, for a less amount than fifteen pence sit down. Cheaper still was the dinner of a certain grave citizen "worth a plum," of whom Colman records that he saw him at a little eating-house in a dark alley behind the Exchange, make a twopenny mess of broth into which a chop had been merely brought for a single turn. When the broth was brought him he scooped the crumb out of a halfpenny roll, and soaked it in the porridge for his present meal; then carefully placing the chop between the upper and under crust, he wrapt it up in a checked handkerchief, and carried it off for his morrow's repast. Cheaper still was the daily meal of a miserable lunzer of the time of Charles I., who contracted with a cook in London, to let him have a "mess of pottage" about noon, a draught of small beer (if required), as many chippings of bread in his pottages as he chose to put in; the benefit of the fire in winter; and in summer a further allowance of small beer; and all, so Peachum tells us, for a penny.

Certain people have cherished certain predilections. Pope was fond of warming potted lampreys in a silver saucepan. Charles Lamb preferred roast pork. Hasty-pudding and a whitpot were the favourite dishes of Sir George de Cornyn, who possessed a receipt for them (the best in England) in his grandmother's own handwriting. George III. was fond of the middle of the neck-of-mutton and Queen Anne of Byrax, who, along with Mr. Rogers, refused the roman and ragoûts one after the other, and made a meal of what? potatoes and vinegar! The late Lord Elden had a partiem ar fancy for liver and bacon. Theodore Hook, when dining after a fortnight's excess at the Mansion House, and being asked to order dinner for himself, ordered what he calls in his Diary his "old favourite pease-soup." Justice Shallow, in Shakspeare, was fond of a short-legged [illegible], was "an old Ben Jonson." The great Lexicographer, "Sam," was fond of a tripe-supper with a few wits by to assist him. "Pray give me leave, sir," said Wilkes, sitting by his side, "it is better here!—a little of the brown some fat, and I can eat the stuffing—some gravy! Let me have the pleasure of pouring you some butter!—Allow me to recommend a squeeze of this orange—or the lemon, perhaps, may have more zest!" There was no refusing. The veal was done to a turn—better it could not have been with a whole synod of cooks to superintend it; and Wilkes was irresistibly attentive. "Sir, sir, I am obliged to you!" More could not be said It was enough to have said this, and at such a time. Even the City Aldermen, in Curtis's mayoralty, over the three nights of turtle. "A fine view from the window, sir! I never saw the river look so gay before—" interrupted by his neighbour on the right with, "Is that a schooner?—No reply to the same question repeated. Something must be said—Sir—sir!—" was the angry answer, spoken in a hurried and broken manner, "when I'm at dinner, I never look off my plate!"—From a very smart paper.—Fraser's Magazine.

ASSASSINATION OF THOMAS BECKET.

Darkly over the martyr's relics came the midnight; and the murderers, having fed, in though in consummation of their infamy, rifled the chief treasures in the archiepiscopal palace, and then departed each to his own home, there to be mysteriously scourged on with the scorpion-pangs of conscience to Jerusalem, to penitence, to a premature and ignoble grave. With Thomas à Becket it was vastly otherwise: the murder was done in fruition—the dead man became an everlasting splendour.—Delmen's Magazine.

REGENERATION OF ITALY.

We believe that Italy will never be regenerate, never reach her former lofty position among the nations of the earth, till the character of her people is changed—till she feels that galvanic impulse which shall rouse her dormant energies, and infuse a new life-blood into her debilitated frame. Such a [illegible]gency, however, we apprehend, is so remote, that we judge her position would alone be elevated by the undisputed authority of a foreign lord; and would it [illegible]t to meet with a foreign master, or should Austria reign supreme over her whole peninsula, we believe that her chances of elevation would be nearer, and her ultimate regeneration less remote. In France, the frightful revolution, it is true, worked out salvation for the oppressed commonalty, and purged with fire the sins of a degenerate nobility, and a constitutional monarchy was finally established on the ruins of an effete aristocracy. But the distinction between the people of France and Italy we believe to consist in this—that the former, though oppressed by tyranny, and held down by the superincumbent weight of despotism, yet had a constitutional spirit ever ready to burst forth; while, with the latent spirit of freedom implanted in its bosom, possessed, fresh and unimpaired, the capacity for its enjoyment, who required no social regeneration, no moral transformation, but simply (granted though it proved) an external convulsion, to enable them to arise again, conquering and to conquer, a free, enlightened, and emancipated people. Italy, on the contrary, though we would fain have concluded otherwise, is, we fear, overlaid to the core: the very sources whence we might hope for social regeneration are rotten and diseased. The people, the prey of the most degraded and unholy passions—the learned, though with the light of the Church Catholic enlightened in the midst of them, sensual and immoral the nobility, dissolute and contemptible—she seems sunk, indeed, to the depths of degradation, and, trammelled with the impediments of her sins, is a by-word among nations—a beacon, to warn her kings and their subjects from the rocks on which the vessel of her liberty has been split—helpless, hopeless, wretched, and undone.—The Union Magazine.

CONDITION OF IRELAND

[illegible]ory resource of the political economist is of paramount importance in the present crisis of the country; yet do we see on every side an exhaustless store of opportunities for enterprise of the most amazing kind, utterly disregarded. There is surely something wrong in our social machinery—what it is, we purpose not to attempt to define. It has been so much a virtue, perhaps, to turn the dark and dismal of our history to view, as much from ignorance of our national characteristics, as from our peculiarities of habits and manners. We hear, it is but too true, of Irish poverty and destitution, till the terms have grown into a mere cant, synonimous—yet seldom of the many redeeming funds of our Irish peasantry; still, amid the darker shades, stand out others of more pleasing colour; without which, indeed, the picture were utterly void and imperfect—

The eventful history of the present condition of Ireland, doubtless, presents many sad and horrifying facts—a deep responsibility resting obviously somewhere; for in the Irish character is there a love of country and family, an inclinable attachment to certain religious feelings—a veneration for those mysterious legends and superstitions scattered every where around, which "speak of better days," and, deeper still, a passionate love of their leaders, good or bad leaders, and a not-to-be-disturbed good humour, which sets sum immeasurably above either of his more stoic friends at the opposite side of the Channel. Let over painted with the gloss of wealth, the pockets of the had really anything in them? And why is he always asking, like Oliver, for more, not content with what he has? He wants employment. Give him plenty of work,

POLISH COSTUMES.

THE INSURRECTION IN POLAND.

The Gazette de Vost, of the 1st instant, publishes the following letter, dated Cracow, 23rd ult.: "During the last four days we have constantly heard the sound of distant cannon from the side of Galicia, and on the evening of the 20th the horizon was red in several places, as if from the effect of an extensive fire. On the same night an Austrian corps of infantry, with eight pieces of cannon, took the road to Galicia. Other detachments of infantry marched towards Bohemia and Wieliczka. All those movements prove that the disturbances amongst the peasantry have not yet been suppressed."

According to letters from Vienna of the 28th ult., the Archduke Ferdinand had manifested the intention of retiring into private life, and the functions of Governor of Gallicia were to be confided to Baron Pillersdorf. It was also said that Prince Schwartzenburg would repair to Lemberg and replace General Castiglione, who is now at the head of the Provisional Government at Cracow.

THE ENGRAVINGS.

We annex two other Illustrations of the People and Scenery of Poland. The first presents a specimen of Polish Costume: the second, the Gate of St. Florian, a fine example of the ancient fortifications of Cracow. The entire city was originally surrounded with intrenchments and ramparts, with bastions, some of which served as entrance-gates. The Austrians commenced the levelling of these old fortifications, and their destruction was nearly completed by the Government of the Republic one gate alone remaining—that of St. Florian, shown in our Illustration.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

Parisian society, like a light about to go out, throws unwonted flashes. For the last ten days, all has been activity the most mercurial—agitation intense; and up to the present moment it increases. Betwixt the Elections of the National Guard—the conjectural speculations on the new Railroad adjudications the Conferences of Abbé de Ravignan, so fashionable—the Promenades this week at Longchamps, if possible still more so—and preparations for election visits to country châteaux, so essential at this moment—Paris at present appears to have at last attained that perpetual motion which philosophers for ages have sought in vain. As to the Elections of Officers of National Guards, they have delighted the King and Ministers: they betoken future triumphs to the Government, in the renewal of the Chamber of Deputies—they are so Conservative. At the same time they perpetuate the surest annoyance of the citizens of Paris. By the by, one of the cleverest lawyers and greatest wags in Paris, and one of the greatest enemies of the Institution of the National Guard, is now hors de combat. This gentleman, Mr. Ch. L——, was wont to put on such an unmilitary and ludicrous costume when called upon to do duty that he threw his officers into utter despair. When called upon to mount guard at night, he would call a cab before the sentry box, get into it, and go to sleep till morning. Unfortunately for him, he took a fancy lately to write a letter to a horrible monk, Frère Contrafatto, confessor to the galleys, who has recently received his pardon through some inexplicable means, "that he thought him the most virtuous and the most injured of men, and that he regretted having pleaded against him." The Order of Advocates immediately assembled under their Bâtonier, and their Benchers have suspended him from his functions (for questioning the judgment of the courts) for a year.

The affair of the railroad adjudications occupies every mind. There are seventeen companies ready to bid for that to Avignon alone. Not only the gentlemen, but the ladies are absorbed by railroad hopes and fears, and the minds even of children are filled with this hopeful subject, if we are to believe an amusing anecdote circulated in Paris for some days past. It must be premised that railway shares in French are called Actions. It is said that the Abbé La Cordaire having asked the youthful son of M. R——, the banker, what was the difference betwixt good and bad actions, the child answered that "good actions were those of the north; the worst, those of the south."

As to fashion, in no country has it served religion so much. Crowds of élégants and élégantes—above all, the latter—attend the conferences or sermons of one who was once himself one of the gayest beaux of Paris. The Count, now the Reverend Father de Ravignan, was one night at a ball at the Vicomte d'Arlincourt's, and engaged to dance with a young and lovely lady with whom the world said he was destined to form a still more permanent union. The beautiful Countess de F——, who had the reputation of being a prophetess and soothsayer, got him introduced to her by the master of the house, and she predicted to him that he would become a Priest. In vain he tried to laugh, his imagination was struck: he forgot his engagement to dance and his engagement for life to the beautiful spinster, and now he is the most exemplary clergyman and the most celebrated preacher in France; and he has more hearers than all the prima donne at the Académie de Musique. But fashion has everywhere an orthodoxy of its own, with power of dispensation in Catholic countries as great as the Pope's. Longchamps, an anniversary promenade at the Champs Elysées in the Holy Week, is as much as ever the point of general attraction. For a month past the fashionables in Paris have been occupied with preparation of dresses, carriages, horses, and liveries for the occasion. All Paris will be there on Friday, the grand day—the rich, the handsome, and the noble to be seen, and the rest of the population to see. It is, in fact, a festival which, above all others, proves the power and the absurdity of fashion, for it was a French Princess who, by going in state to pray at a shrine hard by at this season, not a hundred years since, unwittingly instituted this anniversary. Her object was to give good example: fashion has most eagerly and assiduously followed it, but in its own way, and only as regards the promenade and the assumption of grand costume and state finery. The commerce of Paris alone is benefited by it. It is here that the laws of fashion, as regards costume, are issued to the whole civilised world for the coming season. A representative of every milliner's firm, of any consequence, in Europe and America, is now in Paris, from the head of the great house of Vouillon and Lanré, in Hanover-square, London, to Mrs. Timkin, from the Broadway, at New York, and Madame Popanoff, on the Quay, at Odessa.

You will, within a week, behold in London one of the wittiest originals, and most agreeable writers in France—Jules Janin, the "J. J." of the Débats; his whose feuilletons have such European reputation. He is the literary man who first gave the feuilleton its peculiar character of individuality whilst criticising plays and vaudevilles, introducing into it every circumstance, domestic and foreign, by the remotest associations. Now, the style of the feuilleton combines the easy conversational causerie, the epistolary style à la Horace Walpole, and the anecdotical à la Talleyrand; whilst, in former days, the serious dramatic critics appeared to write as if "their hearts were frizzled in snow," to make use of an expression of Madame de Sevigné. The object of Janin's visit to England is the publishing there one of his translations of "Clarissa Harlowe," a new novel of his, in which he has condensed Richardson's interminable romance into two volumes.

ECLIPSE.—There will be an annular eclipse of the sun on Saturday, the 9th instant, partially visible at Greenwich. It will commence at 5 h. 32 m. afternoon; middle, 6 h. 14 m. afternoon; and end 6 h. 4 m. afternoon.

LONDON TO PARIS IN EIGHTEEN HOURS.—A Boulogne letter states that, although great difficulties have been thrown in the way of the Directors of the Boulogne and Amiens railroad by some of the owners of land required for the undertaking, there is every reason to believe that the portion between Abbeville and Amiens will be completed by the end of the summer, and that the entire line will be finished in 1847. The opening of the Abbeville and Amiens portion will of itself make an important change in the journey from Boulogne to Paris. Nearly twenty hours are now taken by diligence, and, consequently, night-travelling cannot be avoided, but when passengers can take the rail from Abbeville they will be able with perfect ease to perform the whole journey in twelve or thirteen hours. The Directors of the Boulogne and Amiens railroad appear to be confident that their line will be completed before the continuation to Calais of the northern line; but, looking at the rapidity with which the Directors of the latter line have carried on the works on other parts of it, the public may reasonably expect that they will lose no time with the branch to Calais.

NEW MINE OF ARCHITECTURAL AND ARCHÆOLOGICAL WEALTH.—The great fame and success of the French archæologists in Chorsabad (Assyria), have stimulated the ambition of other travellers. Mr. Layard, who had lived for some years in Chusistan, and then at Constantinople, went some months ago to Mossul, to collect Assyrian antiquities. He went first to the ruins of Nimrud, some leagues south of Mossul, where his excavations soon were rewarded by the discovery of bas-reliefs and inscriptions. But the Pacha interrupted his exertions, as another had done with Botta, and instructions from head-quarters are to be waited for. The most important late discoveries are, however, those of Botta's successor at Mossul, Mr. Ronet. He went into the mountains, and a peasant promised to show him some wondrous cavern in the tour of Shenduck. After much toil, they found no cavern—but a wall of rocks, on which four bass-reliefs, each six feet by fifteen, were to be seen. According to the drawings sent by Mr. R., they resemble those found by Mr. Texier in Kesselbaya. Each contains nine figures, of which seven stand on different animals, as lions, dogs, horses, and the like. In the middle sits the king, on a throne supported by apes. The dress is Assyrian, but as there are no inscriptions, the epoch of these monuments has not been yet ascertained. The rock on which these bass-reliefs are engraven forms an angle, and at the foot of these rocks lies a Chaldean village, called Malthai.—The Builder

THE RICHMOND RAILWAY.—The works upon this line of railway are rapidly approaching completion, and there is little doubt of the line being opened throughout in June. The line is six miles in length, and is almost a dead level from Richmond to Barnes-common, where it rises a few feet, and then a cutting commences, which deepens as it approaches Putney, under the High-street of which it passes, the old road being connected by a flat iron bridge, which is now in course of construction. Between Richmond and Putney nearly three miles of permanent way are completed, and the rails are laid down. The greatest engineering difficulty was the crossing of the outer beds, which are considerably below the level of high water mark, and a mere deposit of mud to the depth of many feet. Over these beds and the Wandle, as well as other streams, twenty-two arches were to be erected, and of these all but one have been completed. Two of the bridges are seventy feet span, and of very handsome appearance. An earth embankment succeeds these arches, and the railway is continued along it until it joins the South Western Railway, at Falcon-bridge, Battersea. This latter portion of the line has been completed some time.

ENVIRONS OF CRACOW.—THE GATE OF ST. FLORIAN.

"RAGGED SCHOOLS."

Mr. Charles Dickens, in an eloquent Letter addressed to the Editors of the Daily News, describes the places which bear the above name, as an effort "to introduce among the most miserable and neglected outcasts in London, some knowledge of the commonest principles of morality and religion; to commence their recognition as immortal human creatures, before the Gaol Chaplain becomes their only schoolmaster; to suggest to Society that its duty to this wretched throng, foredoomed to crime and punishment, rightfully begins at some distance from the Police-office; and that the careless maintenance from year to year, in this capital city of the world, of a vast hopeless nursery of ignorance, misery, and vice: a breeding-place for the hulks and gaols: is horrible to contemplate.

"This attempt is being made in certain of the most obscure and squalid parts of the Metropolis; where rooms are opened at night, for the gratuitous instruction of all comers, children or adults, under the title of 'Ragged Schools.' The name implies the purpose. They who are too ragged, wretched, filthy, and forlorn, to enter any other place; who could gain admission into no charity-school, and who would be driven from any church-door; are invited to come in here, and find some people not depraved, willing to teach them something, and show them some sympathy, and stretch out a hand, which is not the iron hand of Law, for their correction."

To these words of burning truth, we may add that this great work of reclaiming the Destitute Poor has now been in progress some three years and a half. The first systematic start was, however, made by a Society called "The Ragged School Union," formed in April, 1844, at a meeting of the teachers of various Schools, held at the St. Giles's Ragged School, Streatham-street, in Bloomsbury. During the first year, two hundred of these Schools were opened, the rent and other expences being paid, generally, by the teachers themselves; and, sometimes, by one or more benevolent individuals in the locality of the School. This was done by various denominations of Christians, without any concert or co-operation between the Schools; and the object of the Society is to create a Union between them, in order more fully and effectually to encourage such Institutions; and, by small pecuniary assistance, extend their usefulness, and increase their number.

At the head of this "generous band," is Lord Ashley, as Chairman of the General and Visiting Committee; and, according to the only Report yet printed, the twenty Ragged Schools then established showed an average attendance of nearly 2,000 children and 200 teachers: to one School, 5,783 had been admitted since its commencement; and there had been, during the winter, an average attendance of 250 children, of youths of both sexes, whose ages ranged from eight to sixteen years. In some cases, these Schools are only open on the Sabbath; but, mostly, on one or two week-day evenings as well. At the date of the above Report, the operations of the Society had been much cramped for want of funds; yet, with so small a sum as £61 9s. 6d., they had contributed towards the formation of several Schools.

We have selected one of the Society's Schools for illustration, that in Jurston-street, Oakley-street, Lambeth; a locality where the work of reclamation and prevention is much needed. The School is opened on Sunday evenings, at six o'clock; and the year's average attendance has been 250 children and 25 teachers. Several distinguished individuals have already visited the Schools in operation; amongst others Lord Ashley, Lord Robert Grosvenor, Lord Sandon, Hon. W. F. Cowper, Charles Dickens, Esq., Lady Trowbridge, and Lady Alicia Lambert.

Meanwhile, the system is rapidly extending; for, where so much good can be effected at such trifling cost, the result must be successful. We gather from a lecture recently delivered at the Literary and Scientific Institution in Aldersgate-street, by the Rev. Mr. Ainslie, that the sum of £300 was raised, in one day, at Epping to establish there a school of this description. At Windsor, a school on "the Ragged" principle, has been established by a poor chimney-sweep, "who," said Mr. Ainslie, "had himself been a bad and abandoned man, but who was reclaimed, and who now sat there, with his dirty face, teaching and doing more good than thousands of others of ten times his capacity." On Mr. Ainslie's visit to this School, there were upwards of 100 young persons present, from the age of eight to ten, boys and girls, all behaving with the greatest decorum, and tolerably well clothed—"for, educate the mind, and it immediately revolts at the body being clothed in rags."

GOSSIP OF THE WEEK.

We are glad to see that a voice has been raised in defence of the ancient trees of London. It seems hard that, in a country where vested rights are sacred things, and where a social or political nuisance has but to prove that it has annoyed everybody for a very long time indeed, to be maintained inviolate, or handsomely compensated for ceasing to be a nuisance, the old trees alone should be cut down, and carted off, without a word spoken in their behalf. Sir Frederick Trench has written a touching and urgent appeal to Lord Lincoln in behalf of the Piccadilly elms and the Chelsea chesnuts. In the name of all the sparrows in London, we thank him. It is true that the greenery of their boughs had vanished under the liberal coating of London soot, and that the daring songster who ventured to peck at a bud often expired in agonies, from the quantity of copperas and carbonic acid gas it had imbibed on coming into the vegetable world under such a sky; it is not to be denied that their heads were bare and their hearts rotten, that they had lost all capacity for giving shade to the watermen against the dog-day sun, or a screen to the cab horse against the December drizzle; that they were certainly not ornamental, and as decidedly the reverse of useful. Still, they had secured a vested right to the ground they stood on; and we are glad, we repeat, that Sir Frederick has spoken out to assert that right in his letter to Lord Lincoln.

If there were the authority of fact as well as Shakspeare for the assertion that there are "tongues in trees," we should have all the venerable and doddered vegetation in London getting up a meeting, and proposing a vote of thanks to Sir Frederick for his kindly interposition.

But these are days of levelling. We are not content with opening up new streets through filthy neighbourhoods, or driving tunnels through hills and railroads over marshes. We hack and hew at the ancient ways in which our forefathers delighted to stand, and drive the light coach of modern legislation over acts of Parliament, which those who framed them hoped would be barriers for ever.

It is hard, too, that the blow which lays low the old trees of London should come from the hand of Lord Lincoln. His worthy father, the Duke of Newcastle, will have a new pang inflicted upon him by this fresh indication of "a levelling and destructive spirit" in his degenerate scion. Not content with cutting down Corn-laws, he is cutting down the venerable chesnuts of Hyde Park and the elms of Piccadilly.

The Dryads and Hamadryads who may still linger amid the uncongenial bricks and mortar of London should present Sir Frederick with a crown of imperishable green. We offer to them a song with which to inaugurate this deserved tribute to a friend of the trees, though an assailant of the "Woods and Forests:"

A song to the elm, the brave old elm,
Who hath lived in the smoke so long,
Here's a health to his crown, tho' long done brown,
And the sparrows his leaves among;
The blacks came down so thick on his crown
Its original colour you'd doubt,
And he standeth right in the way at night
When the cabs drive fast about.
Then a song in the elm, the brave old elm,
Who in Piccadilly is shown,
And long flourish he, when by cabmen free,
His social cloud is blown.

The' oft as 'tis told, when the weather's so cold,
That the cab-horses shake o'er their hay,

THE LAMBETH "RAGGED SCHOOL."—(BOYS)

The watermen beat, to warm their feet,
The bark from his trunk away.
And tho' oft there' the day, a waggon or dray,
Endang'ring the driver's brains,
Will come bump against his side, yet tho' sorely tried,
The old elm he still remains.
Then a song for the elm, the brave old elm,
Who grows amidst brick and stone.
And ne'er an upset may a carriage get
By being against him thrown!

He knew the old time, when corn fields prime
Waved where houses now appear;
When Green Park and Whitehall, Piccadilly and all,
Were country, both far and near.
"Woods and Forests" may say that he blocks up the way,
And a nuisance no doubt is he;
But they never shall send our ancient friend
To be sawed like a modern tree!
Then a song for the elm, the brave old elm,
Though rotten his heart be grown.
Ne'er from Piccadilly, our ancient Lye,
Shall the Woods and Forests hone!

There have been terror and confusion among the stags during the week. Since they quietly dropped their branches, (as stags are bound to do in panic or shedding-time), they have been vegetating quietly; reposing, like Marius at Carthage, amid the ruins of their own projects. The case of "Woolmer v. Toby" has been flung amongst them like a bomb-shell; and they have received a report of that trial, with a polite request to pay up a trifle on their allotted shares to defray expenses, or to beware the law! Now in the present state of the law on the subject, no man knows what he may be liable or not liable to pay: and every one is waiting for the hoped-for decision of a superior Court to set aside the verdict in "Woolmer v. Toby," and reduce the threatened terrors of Provisional Committees to mere "brutum fulmen;" no more formidable than a highwayman's pistol when you happen to know it is not loaded.

Howl, unhappy allottees! We have heard, on good authority, that the sagacious Committees of certain exploded bubble lines, have paid the costs of the action and indemnified Toby on condition that he don't carry the verdict into a higher court, when it might not be set aside after all. Thus the terrors of that case will still hang over your heads, and you will be taught, to your cost, that even bubbles have a responsibility attached to them. Had we not long since learnt that speculation is an epidemic which, like the plague, may be expected to recur periodically till the moral atmosphere is purified as much as the natural one has been, and the ethics of society as much improved as its economics, we should anticipate great and lasting good from the severe lesson which has been read to all who rashly and recklessly rushed into the share-market last year and believed "Scrip" to be the true philosopher's stone that was to turn all to gold.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1846.

As long as massacre is loyal, it is praiseworthy—or, at least, excusable, and to be but slightly blamed. Such is the inference to be drawn from the answer of the Earl of Aberdeen to the question of Lord Beaumont, whether the Government had received any authentic accounts of the bloody scenes that have occurred in Gallicia, under the authority of the "paternal" rulers of Austria, and whether it had, in any way, even in the most delicate style of diplomacy, remonstrated against them. It is difficult for any Power to interfere between another Government and its subjects—that is the excuse always urged against letting the voice of common humanity pierce through the recesses of Cabinets and Councils. The difficulty vanishes, however, when the Government is a weak one, and a stronger neighbour can interfere for its own profit and aggrandisement: then interference becomes astonishingly easy. But, while the people only suffer, and the rulers are strong, and profit by the cruelty, a whole Christian race might be extirpated before the diplomatists of Europe would pen a remonstrance upon the subject.

This etiquette of statesmen, which restrains them from giving even an opinion condemnatory of each other's oppressions is often carried too far. The speech of the Earl of Aberdeen, on Monday evening, is an instance of it. It was the usual official answer—the stereotyped reply to all similar interpellations. When some very atrocious instance of cruelty is stated as having occurred, and men in office are asked their opinion upon it, they generally plead, either ignorance of the facts, or disbelief of their occurrence, or both together. In either case, it absolves them from the necessity of giving any opinion on the matter.

The press of Europe is crowded with narratives of such atrocity, that we seem to be living again in the times of the fanatic wars of the Hussites, or the Jacquerie of France. A completely organised Government, having at command one of the largest and best organised armies of Europe, cannot put down a revolt in one of its provinces without having recourse to the expedient by which our ancestors exterminated the breed of wolves—paying a price for every bleeding head that might be brought to the authorities, with no questions asked as to whether the savage trophy had been taken from an enemy or not; free license was given to murder, by a Christian and civilised power, one that arrogates to itself the titles of enlightened and paternal! The latest discovered race of savages might furnish the Cabinet of Austria with a lesson of humanity, for we cannot, in the face of so many accounts, all confirming each other, share the Earl of Aberdeen's incredulity. The reason he gives for his disbelief is most singular; he says he has long had the happiness of enjoying the intimacy and friendship of Prince Metternich, the ruler of Austria, and he is confident that Minister would, not countenance such proceedings. How, then, have they come to pass? The very extracts from the despatches of the English Envoy at Vienna, confirm the main statements in the public journals, and it is beyond all doubt that the atrocities have been perpetrated. Is it to be supposed that a Minister can countenance them, and if it is proved that they have taken place, how is the contradiction to be explained? Simply by the fact that all rulers have a double existence, and will do, or permit to be done, in their official capacity, things that, personally, they would shrink from with horror, while we must allow something for ignorance of abuses, and want of means to repress them, even in the most powerful.

Few, however, who know the stern and merciless political despotism of Austria, will be so ready to pronounce on the "impossibility" of the adoption of any measures by those who rule it, when it is thought that that political system is endangered. The whole society of Austria is rotten with the poison of political espionage; and the dungeons of Spielberg bury many a victim, murdered more slowly, but not less surely, than if his head had fallen for the political block. Of all that is coldly, meanly, brutally oppressive in the Austrian system, Metternich is the great supporter. He has almost boundless power, and unlimited physical resources against outbreak; it must have been quite unnecessary to resort to such extraordinary measures for suppressing a revolt which, is now appears, did not include the bulk of the population.

It is absurd to say, from the mere personal character of a great Minister, that the perpetration of cruelties under his authority is impossible. Those who enjoy the "friendship" of so exalted a person as Metternich, of course only see the polished gentleman, the intellectual statesman. But despotism can thrust sharp fangs from beneath the velvet. In his measures, Metternich is merciless and unscrupulous; and it is quite certain that the laws of the country he governs admit of almost any amount of barbarity, in cases of revolt. All deserters may, in Austria, be proclaimed and apprehended, dead or alive; by another statute all rebels are considered deserters: this accounts for all that has occurred in Gallicia.

Nothing is impossible when the worst abuses of a bad system are permitted. A foreign Minister, enjoying the friendship of Sir James Graham, might as boldly say that it was "impossible" he could countenance the acts of officials under his control, through whose mismanagement Englishmen were driven to gnaw the flesh from putrid bones in a union workhouse; personally, and in his private capacity, no doubt, Sir James Graham would view the practice with as much horror as any other English gentleman; yet, as a Minister, he was induced with difficulty to abolish the kind of work that led to this cannibalism. So Prince Metternich's friend may think it "impossible" that he should countenance the massacres of Gallicia; and yet, that they have occurred under the direct sanction of the Austrian Government, cannot be doubted.

CONSTITUTIONS and forms of Government seem to flourish only in the countries where they have grown up naturally: if transplanted to another soil they languish and decay. Very few of the many imitations of the English Constitution have prospered: it was, possibly, some lingering admiration of the old Republics of Greece that led the Powers of Europe to give a Constitution to that country when its independence was secured; but the change from the Turkish system to Constitutional forms was too great and too sudden to be successful. The spectacle presented at this moment by Greece is at once shocking and ludicrous: the latter aspect of affairs was strikingly presented to the House of Commons on Tuesday evening. England is mixed up with the other Powers in what is called the Greek Loan; and, in reference to this, Mr. B. Cochrane read to the House the last "Official Statement" of the Greek Minister of Finance: it reads like a burlesque on "responsible" government; nothing richer is so be found in farce or comedy, old or new: it is a letter from the Minister to the Greek Chamber, and runs thus:—

Gentlemen,—Some days ago you sent for me to give you some account of the state of our finances, and I presented myself, on the plea of having just taken office. I now come down to this House to tell you that the Finance Department is in a complete state of disorganization and paralysis; that no accounts exist either as to the revenue or the expenditure; and that it will be utterly impossible to furnish you with anything in the shape of a correct budget. In consequence of the dishonesty and incapacity of the public functionaries, the public accounts are in a state of chaos. All that M. Prevelakes and others have told you, respecting every honest man having been dismissed, and of the spoliation of the public money at Syra, and elsewhere, is perfectly true. Millions are due to the State; and we do not know who are our debtors, as the revenue books have disappeared. This is the financial statement I have to make.

Every one must feel the justice of Sir Robert Peel's remark, that, "if there is a frank and candid Chancellor of the Exchequer in Europe, it is the Chancellor of the Exchequer for Greece." They must also feel the force of his conclusion, that, under such circumstances, his hopes of the payment of the interest of our debt are not very sanguine.

In a state of society that admits of the possibility of such a state of things, the forms of a Constitutional Government must be a mockery.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Thursday Evening (From our own Correspondent).—Her Majesty and the Prince Consort, accompanied by the Royal Family, visited the Royal aviary, between nine and ten this morning, remaining there for upwards of an hour, and returning to the Castle across the private plantations in the Home Park. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty, at the Castle, this morning. Her Majesty and Prince Albert took a carriage airing this afternoon, in a pony phaeton and pair. The Royal Family, attended by the Duchess of Sutherland, Lady Lyttelton, and Lord Liverpool, took a carriage airing at the same time.

HER MAJESTY'S RETURN TO WINDSOR.—On Wednesday, the Queen and Prince Albert and the Royal children left Buckingham Palace for Windsor, where they arrived at four minutes before five o'clock.

PRESENT TO HER MAJESTY.—Mrs. John Valpy, of King-street, Jersey, has presented to her Majesty, a magnificent pincushion, worked by herself, with thousands of pearls, representing the Imperial Crown, the stars of different orders, &c., richly ornamented with gold and silver. Her Majesty has been most graciously pleased to accept the elegant present

ANOTHER ROYAL VISIT FOR SCOTLAND.—We learn that her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert will, at the commencement of the autumn, again repair to Scotland, to pass some weeks in the Highlands. It is said that, while in that romantic region of mountains, the Queen and the Prince Consort intend to visit several of the resident aristocracy. We believe the Queen will probably reside at Blair Athol, the beautiful seat of the Duke of Athol

THE DUCHESS OF MEININGEN.—Lodgings have been taken Blenheim Palace of the Duke of Marlborough, and intends residing at it. It is said that his Grace intends leaving England for a few years. It is the intention of the Queen Dowager, attended by a Suite of Ladies, to go on a visit to their Serene Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Saxe Meiningen and her Majesty's other Illustrious relative in Germany in the course of the approaching summer, and Her Majesty will proceed by the steam-vessel about Saturday, the 25th instant. It is said that his Serene Highness the Hereditary Prince of Saxe Meiningen purposes to remain in the country until the period of Queen Adelaide's departure, when the Prince will return to his paternal dominions in company with his illustrious aunt

THE ELEVATIONS TO THE PEERAGE.—The Gazette of Tuesday night contained her Majesty's letters-patent, elevating Sir Henry Hardinge and Sir Hugh Gough to the Peerage. The former by the title of Viscount Hardinge of King's Newton, in the County of Derby, and the latter by that of Baron Gough of Chaug-keang-foo, in China, and of Maharajpore and the Sutlej, in the East Indies.

SIR GEORGE MURRAY.—We are glad to hear that the statements in some of the papers as to the illness of the Master-General of the Ordnance are exaggerations. The real fact is, that Sir George Murray has for some time past been making progress towards a complete recovery, and during the whole period of his indisposition he has transacted his official business daily, the sole difference being, that he has done so at his own residence. Instead of the office in Pall-mall.

SIR ROBERT PEEL'S DEPARTURE FOR HIS COUNTRY SEAT.—Sir Robert Peel left town on Thursday morning, by the 11 o'clock train of the London and Birmingham Railway, for his seat, Drayton Manor, Staffordshire.

PRIVY COUNCIL.—Her Queen held a Privy Council on Monday afternoon at Buckingham Palace. It was attended by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Lord President, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Cabinet Ministers. At the Council, the Archbishop of Canterbury was directed to prepare a form of thanksgiving for the recent victories in the East Indies. (The prayer will be found under the head of the Church).

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

FORM OF PRAYER FOR THE LATE VICTORIES IN INDIA

The following is the form of thanksgiving to be used in the churches to-morrow for the late victories in India:—

"A FORM OF PRAYER AND THANKSGIVING TO ALMIGHTY GOD.

"O Lord God of Hosts, in whose hand is power and might irresistible, we, Thine unworthy servants, most humbly acknowledge Thy goodness in the victories lately vouchsafed to the armies of our Sovereign over a host of barbarous invaders, who sought to spread desolation over fruitful and populous provinces enjoying the blessings of peace under the protection of the British Crown. We bless Thee, O Merciful Lord, for having brought to a speedy and prosperous issue a war, to which no occasion had been given by injustice on our part, or apprehension of injury at our hands. To Thee, O Lord, we ascribe the glory. It was Thy wisdom which guided the counsels, Thy power which strengthened the hands, of those whom it pleased Thee to use as Thy instruments in the discomfiture of the lawless aggressor, and the frustration of his ambitious designs. From Thee alone cometh the victory, and the spirit of moderation and mercy in the day of success. Continue, we beseech Thee, to go forth with our armies, whensoever they are called into battle in a righteous cause; and dispose the hearts of their leaders to exact nothing more from the vanquished than is necessary for the maintenance of peace, and security against violence and injury.

"Above all, give Thy grace to those who preside in the councils of our Sovereign, and administer the concerns of her widely-extended dominions, that they may apply all their endeavours to the purposes designed by Thy good Providence in committing such power to their hands, the temporal and spiritual benefit of the nations intrusted to their care.

"And while Thou preservest to our distant possessions from the horrors of war, give us peace and plenty at home, that the earth may yield her increase, and that we, Thy servants, receiving Thy blessings with thankfulness and gladness of heart, may dwell together in unity, and faithfully serve Thee, to Thy honour and glory, through Jesus Christ our Lord, to whom, with Thee and the Holy Ghost, belong all dominion and power, both in heaven and earth, now and for ever. Amen."

OXFORD.
April 4.

To-day, being the last day of term, a Congregation was held in the morning, when the following degrees were conferred:—

Masters of Arts.—Rev. John Yatman, University; Rev. John Gray, Balliol; Rev. John O'Brien, Queen's; Rev. James Hughes, Jesus.

Mr. Henry Poole Ryder Sanford, of Balliol College, was yesterday elected to the vacant Lusby Scholarship.

ACCIDENT TO MR. HERAPATH.—Mr. Herapath, of Bristol, the analytical chemist, met with a serious accident on Wednesday (last week). While operating upon some fulminating silver, it suddenly exploded, and burnt his face so severely, that, for a time, it was feared he would be deprived of the sight of the left eye at least. He is progressing favourably.

POSTSCRIPT.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT LIMEHOUSE.

Between four and five o'clock yesterday morning a most terrific fire broke out in Three-colt street, Limehouse, near the Church. The fire was not extinguished before six houses fell a prey to the flames and eight others were severely damaged. The fire was first discovered in the lower part of the premises of Mr. Hunt, cheesemonger, 40, Three-colt-street, which, in a short time, enveloped the entire building. The inmates having escaped with great difficulty, the greater part of the building, as well as the adjoining ones, being wood, the fire spread with the utmost rapidity, and in a few minutes Nos. 39 and 40 shared the same fate.

About twelve or fourteen houses were destroyed and partly consumed, the unfortunate inmates of several of them having escaped in a state of nudity, while others were only able to save a few things, with but little of their furniture. The engines having at length been got to work, and a plentiful supply of water obtained, the firemen, by about five o'clock, succeeded in stopping the further progress of the flames.

The following is the official report of the houses destroyed and damaged:

No. 40 ... Three-colt-street, Mr. Hunt, cheesemonger, destroyed; Nos. 41 and 42, Mr. ... baker; No. 38, Messrs. Haywood, ... destroyed; No. 37, Mr. ... King's Head, seriously damaged; No. 1, Limehouse-lane, Mr. ... fishmonger, ditto; No. 2, Mr. Cocks, fishmonger, partially destroyed: No. 3, Mr. ... dinet, grocer, ditto; No. 35, Mr. Browne, pastry-cook, ditto; No. 36, Mr. Hyde, ... monger, ditto; No. 37, Mr. Deats, dealer in china; No. 38, Mr. Reeves, pastry-cook, and No. 99, empty, all destroyed. The damage done is estimated at about £2000. No information can be obtained as to the cause of the fire.

RICHMOND ELECTION.—The nomination of candidates for the borough of Richmond took place on Wednesday, when there being no opposition to Mr Rich, a show of hands was taken, and he was declared elected. The hon. gentleman briefly thanked the electors.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

SPAIN.—We have a letter from our correspondent at Madrid, which informs us of the actual resignation of Narvaez; and, what is of still more consequence, it appears that the resignation was accepted by the Queen. M. Isturiz is President of the Council, Minister of Foreign Affairs and Marine, Alvarez, Minister of Marine, M. Egaza remains as Minister of Justice; M. Mon is in the Finances.

THE WEST INDIES.—The Avon has arrived with the West India Mail. The papers do not contain any intelligence of importance. The latest dates brought by the Avon are as follow:—Tampico, Feb. 23; Honduras, Feb. 26; Carthagena, Feb. 27; Chagres, Feb. 27; Vera Cruz, March 2; Demerara, March 5; Trinidad, March 7; La Guayra, March 9; Havannah, March 10; Jamaica, March 11; Barbadoes, March 13; Grenada, March 14; St. Thomas, March 17; and Bermuda, March 24.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

LIABILITY OF PROVISIONAL DIRECTORS.—At Liverpool, on Saturday, a case was tried before Mr. Baron Rolfe, Marshall v. Southern. It was an action brought by a tradesman of Liverpool, against a provisional director, for goods sold and delivered, and work done for the Railway; to which defendant pleaded he was not liable. Mr. Wilkins stated the case. This was an action brought by Mr Samuel Marshall, an engraver and printer in Liverpool, against Mr. Southern, for a large quantity of engraving, script books, plans, sections, and maps, furnished to the directors of the Liverpool and Bolton Direct Railway, and the sum claimed was £401 11s. 11d. The defendant is a gentleman of considerable wealth, and the proprietor of extensive coal mines, and a member of the Provisional Committee and Executive Committee of the Railway. It would turn out that this gentleman embarked in this speculation with great zeal, as the line was to pass by his coal-works, and he anticipated that it would put a great deal of money into his pocket, and was then one of the most active promoters of the railroad; but, when the day of adversity came, he sought to avoid the consequences. The first prospectus of the Company was issued on the 13th of September, last year; it was to have £500,000 capital, in £20,000 shares, of £50 each; and the solicitor was Mr. Parkinson, and the prospectus set forth the shares of the Provisional Directors. The first meeting was on the 23rd of September, and almost immediately after the defendant became an agent for 100 shares, which were allotted to him; and he was asked to allow his name to appear as one of the Provisional Committee. Defendant wrote a letter in reply, stating it would give him great pleasure in promoting the success of the line, and consented to act on the Provisional Committee; and when 100 shares each were allotted to the Board of Directors, defendant received his quota for the rest. He showed an active disposition for promoting the interests of the line, and was first on the agenda of Sir Wm. Massey Stanley, W. Jackson, Esq., and J. Lard, Esq., of Birkenhead, directors of the Leeds and Liverpool Railway, to induce them to take up the Liverpool and Bolton, and it is almost needless to state that he went to Mr. Poole, the superintendent of the goods department at the grand Junction, to induce him to use every means in his power to obtain for the Liverpool and Bolton the support of that Company. In December the share market began to decline, and as the winter approached the defendant's ardour began to freeze in reference to the line. The Company eventually had to wind up their affairs, and the defendant was a defaulter, having never paid anything on his shares. Mr. W. A. Barrow, solicitor for the Company, was examined at considerable length, when Mr. Baines said that he would not trouble the Court any longer, a verdict for the plaintiff having been agreed to be taken on certain conditions. The Jury accordingly returned a verdict for the plaintiff damages £401 11s.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

A CHILD SCALDED TO DEATH WITH COFFEE.—On Tuesday afternoon, Mr. Joseph Payne held an inquest at the Goldsmiths' Arms, Southwark-bridge-road, on the body of Mary Anne Fowler, aged two years and a half. Mr. Mitchell attended on Saturday morning last, was standing before the fireplace, when an elder brother, in dressing himself, accidentally knocked over a coffee-pot, standing on the hob of the grate, and the boiling liquid fell on the deceased, who was dreadfully scalded from the shoulder to the hip. She was immediately taken to Mr Masterman's, a surgeon, who prescribed the usual remedies, but the deceased expired on Sunday last. Verdict, "Accidental death."

LOSS OF A TOWING STEAMER AND CREW.—On Saturday night the Waterwitch towing steam vessel, belonging to Leith, was lost, with all hands, by coming into collision with a schooner, at the entrance of the Firth of Forth. Since then the wreck has been discovered lying in fourteen fathoms water, within a short distance of the Oscar rock. That her crew met with a watery grave, there cannot be a doubt: they were, it is reported, six in number—Mr. Pydre, the master, who partly owned the ill-fated vessel; two seamen, a fireman, and two apprentice boys. Mr. Pydre has left a widow and children.

A SHOCKING ACCIDENT happened on Thursday morning, about half-past eleven o'clock, in West-street, Soho. As a coal-wagon, belonging to Mr. Brent, Cannon Wharf, Parliament-street, was passing, a boy, about ten years of age, in playing with the drag-chain, fell under one of the hind wheels, and was instantly killed, the wheel passing completely over his body. He was conveyed, lifeless, to Charing cross Hospital.

RAILWAY GUARD KILLED.—On Tuesday, James Sunderland, one of the railway guards on the Halifax branch line to North Dean, was killed while proceeding with the eleven A.M. train from Halifax. He had been in conversation one of the moment before the fatal occurrence with one of the passengers, while attempting to the break. Upon arriving near the bridge crossing the canal, he got out of the cart-age, and sung hold of the iron rail on the carriage, stooped down for some purpose or other, his back being turned to the engine; while thus leaning from the carriage, the back part of his head came in violent contact with the battlement of the bridge, bespattering it with his blood. He was knocked off the carriage, and falling under the wheels his right leg was terribly cut and bruised. The accident was not discovered by any one in the train until it arrived at North Dean, when the engine was detached, and sent in search of the body. Two men, however, who happened to be in the wood close by, witnessed the accident, and ran immediately to give assistance, but upon reaching the spot found that Sunderland was quite dead.

THE ROBBERY OF LORD BURLEIGH'S JEWELLERY, AT CAMBRIDGE.—At the general quarter session of Cambridge, on Tuesday, Edward Elsbury, who was indicted for stealing from the rooms of Lord Burleigh, at St. John's College, Jewellery, of the value of from £50 to £60, was found guilty, and though recommended to mercy by the Jury, on account of his previous good character. The Recorder sentenced him to seven years' transportation.

DESPERATE CASE OF AN INFANT, AND ATTEMPTED SUICIDE BY ITS MOTHER.—Sinford, about half-way on the road between Cheltenham and Northlench, has been the scene of a melancholy incident, the result entirely of domestic dissensions. At an inquest held on Tuesday, the following particulars transpired:—In the adjoining village of Sevenhampton, a labourer, named John Newman, with his wife, Jane Newman, their four children, and an infant, lived in the same house with the young man's father and family. The latter a year, or some time past, to have made the young wife's position extremely unhappy, and, about a fortnight ago, even her husband struck her a violent blow, the object of her father and brother having avowedly to drive her and her family from the house. On Saturday last, after having been entirely silent for two days, she went out, taking with her her children, all of whom she left with a neighbour, except an infant, with whom she proceeded, as she said, towards Dowdeswell. Between eight and nine o'clock, however, on that morning, as Mr. Samuel Dyer, a miller residing at Salford, was passing his mill pond, he saw a female, in an erect position, and proceeding with further into the stream. When he first saw her, she was kneeling. Reward, which she did several times, as if she was dipping something into the water, and, at length, when about ten yards from the bank, she plunged into the stream head foremost. Mr. Dyer immediately procured assistance, and, after a lapse of fifteen minutes, she was brought to the bank apparently lifeless. In the mean time one of the men perceived that the body of an infant was lying at the bottom of the stream, and on it being extricated found that it was dead. Medical assistance was procured, and, in about two hours, the mother was with difficulty resuscitated. The Jury returned a verdict of "Wilful murder" against Jane Newman, for the death, by drowning of her infant child.

THE BANKRUPTCY OF SIR JOHN ROSS.—The veteran arctic navigator has undergone his last examination at the BANKRUPTCY COURT. The case had been adjourned for the appointment of assignees, and also for the attendance of some witnesses. The latter, however, did not appear. It was clearly shown that he was entitled to be deemed a trading bankrupt. After the assignees had been appointed, &c., the bankrupt was declared to have passed his examination, and was ordered to receive his protection.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

A letter from Cracow, of the 23rd ult., states that the number of persons now imprisoned there on charges connected with the late revolt is 870, and that a reward of 4000 florins has been offered for the apprehension of Bembroski, who was secretary to the dictator, but who, according to some accounts, has killed at Podgorze.

"A magnificent fête" says Le Railway, "is talked of, which is to be given at the Champ-de-Mars by all the railroad companies, when the Havre, Verdun, and Vierzon railways shall be inaugurated. The administrators of all the lines now open or being executed, will be summoned to participate in it. It will be a sort of federal fête of industry.

John Oliver Richer, the once celebrated rope-dancer, died at Swindon last week, aged 73 years.

The Emperor of Russia, attended by Count Orloff and Prince Volkonsky, left St. Petersburgh on the 19th ult., for Moscow. His Imperial Majesty's two younger sons, the Grand Dukes Nicholas and Michael, left the Russian capital, accompanied by General Filossooff, the day previous, to await the arrival of their illustrious father at Moscow.

The Cape Frontier Times, of the 27th of January, contains the following racy sketch of her Madagascar Majesty:—"Captain Kelly, of the Conway, had received a letter from the Queen Ranavalo Majaka, in which she complains bitterly of the behaviour of both English and French commandants. The Queen Ranavalo Majaka thinks very odd of their interfering in her own affairs, and asks how Queen Victoria and Louis Philippe would take it if she were to meddle with their concerns. She asserts that she has as much right to put her enemy's head at the end of the pole, as the Queen Victoria to send her prisoners to exile. Besides, she first gun has not been fired by her, and, consequently, more than ten nations have orders, which are, that no traders will ever be admitted into her country unless they take the oath as Madagascar subjects."

Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Thomas Lovell, her Majesty's Consul at the Austrian Italian States, expired on the 24th ultimo, at Venice, in the 76th year of his age. He was appointed to the office in 1834, and had been similarly engaged previously. He held the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel on the Continent.

According to a letter from Portugal, it seems that the intrigues of the agents in the kingdom have taken a most serious character. If the Government does not promptly interfere, Portugal may become the theatre of disastrous events. It is said that the principal agents of these intrigues receive their instructions from Palmella, at Madrid. An agent is said to have arrived recently at this latter capital, charged to redouble activity.

The commencement of the works of the intended railroad from Louvain (Belgium) to the Prussian frontier, took place last week with the usual ceremonies. Amongst the authorities present on the occasion was M. De Bavay, the Secretary-General, but now Minister of Public Works. Soon after the arrival at Louvain of the train from Brussels, M. de Bavay dug up the first spade-full of earth with a silver spade, richly carved and engraved, which was presented to him by the directors.

A letter from Hamburg, of the 27th of March, says:—"The modifications in the English tariff, permitting the importation of cattle and of all kinds of meat into Great Britain free of duty, have had an effect on our market. The stores of cured hams are in consequence cleared out, and the prices of the landed classes feel the effects, and the poor can scarcely make any purchases. Merchants engaged in the Transatlantic trade also experience the consequences of this rise, for the price of salt meat is thirty per cent. higher than it was last year."

A letter from Berlin, dated March 27, says:—"We learn from good authority, that the receipts of the Zollverein for 1845 are considerably higher than for 1844. It is said that sugar, coffee, and other Colonial produce, have produced a million of thalers more than last year. However, the sum produced by sugar was considerably reduced by the amount of the premiums of export, reaching a sum of about 400,000 thalers. Undoubtedly, sugar refineries are at present the most flourishing undertakings in the whole Zollverein, notwithstanding the competition made to them through Holland of a sort of exceedingly fine candy sugar, which scarcely pays customs' duty, of 2500 sacks a day."

A letter from Venice dated March 26, says:—"The bridge over the Lagune, at Venice, and the railway thence to Vicenza are open on the Milan side. The railway has become an opened as far as Padua, and within the last month or two Government has taken the whole out of the company's into its own hands, in order to complete the line from Venice to Milan within a reasonable time. The works on the Vienna and Trieste Railway (which has been open from the former place to Graze for some time), have suddenly been interrupted by the breaking out of the typhus in a most malignant form amongst the workmen employed between Marburg and Laybach."

Accounts from Konigsberg, dated March 17, from the relatives of the late Dr. Frede ten Wilhelm Bessel, announce the decease of that distinguished astronomer. Perhaps no individual has contributed so much to the advancement of the science of astronomy, during the present century, as this distinguished and excellent man. The health of Professor Bessel had been declining for some years, and the latters state that he died peaceably, after long suffering, in the 62nd year of his age.

The ragging Duke of Saxe-Cobourg Gotha incurred some danger, on the 31st ult, at Marseilles. His horses having run away, the latter jumped out of the carriage on its way to Lisbon. Fortunately he escaped with only a contusion on the leg. The Sud of Marseilles states, that his Royal Highness is to embark in the Amsterdam steamer for Malaga, whence he intends visiting the Spanish capital on his way to Lisbon.

The portion of the Northern Railway between Lille, Arras, and Valenciennes, with a point of intersection at Douai, was opened on Wednesday (last week) to the public. The receipts of the day were to be given to the poor. The service is organised, with three departures per day from each of the extremities. The trains arrived at the same time at Douai, where the passengers exchange places. The works on the part of the line between Amiens and Arras are pushed on actively. A single way is finished between Paris and Amiens, and the second one is drawing towards its close.

A letter from Alexandria, dated March 21, gives a most fearful picture of the state of Greece. It states "that King Otho is a mere puppet in the hands of [illegible] and [illegible] are [illegible] and [illegible] and [illegible] and engaged, for reasons they best know why, in forwarding French troops. In modern days were known such cruelties and atrocities as are committed in the country. Hot eggs are placed under the armpits of women, and men are roasted alive on wooden spits to induce them to divulge the supposed or unsuspected positories of hidden treasure. All those unheard of atrocities are permitted by the Government to pass with perfect impunity; so much so, indeed, that crime is now at a premium."

We learn from Dantzic, 28th ult., that the Austrian Government has prohibited the export of corn from Galicia.

According to a recent decree of the Government of Lima, any stranger can marry a Peruvian, establish himself at Peru, and possess lands without a loss of his nationality. This annuls a former decree of a contrary nature. Many of the republics of South America intend following the example of Peru.

Intelligence has been received from the Isle of Bourbon to Dec. 25. It appears that on the 23rd some disturbances had taken place in the island. The blacks having assembled in the St. André district, and committed some excesses in the rural properties, it was found necessary to call out the gendarmerie, and sixty negroes were taken to prison. The next day the colony was on the alert, the military received cartridges, and the posts were all doubled. The fears of a rising caused the Governor to forbid the celebration of the midnight mass for Christmas Day.

A French paper states that a very lamentable occurrence took place last week at Werden, between Sarrebrouck and Sarrelouis. A ferry boat with fifty passengers, of all ages and both sexes, and two carriages with horses, used to them, returning from Market, was sunk, after having struck violently against the sunk, and only five persons were saved, the rest perishing in the Sarre. This catastrophe is added to the numerous groups of the lamentable list of the breaking of the chain, when the rapidity of the current hurries away the boat, and the shrieks of the females alarming the horses, they moved to one side of the boat, which overturned, and sunk.

A Vienna letter of the 29th ult., states that the peasants of Gallicia have refused to continue to perform the forced labours imposed upon them by the late revolt, and have joined in the insurrectionary groups.

The Independence of Brussels, of Sunday, states that M. Van de Weyer had given in his resignation as Ambassador to London, but that he had been induced by the King to withdraw it.

The Brussels Gazette, of April 4, says—"We regret to have to announce the melancholy death of the Hon. E. Astley, brother to Lord Hastings, who was found drowned, on Thursday last, in the Dyrbe."

A letter from Lemberg, of the 26th ult., says:—"Recently, 200 refugee insurgents from Cracow marched from Tschow to Tarnow with a number of the peasantry, whom, by acts of violence, when seduction was found to be insufficient, they had induced to join them; but as soon as these peasants came within view of the Austrian bayonets, they turned [illegible] them, and made the rest prisoners. With the exception of [illegible] attempts at plunder in Barnow and Frystack, public tranquility has not been disturbed."

The Havre Journal of Saturday says:—"The Prince de Joinville arrived here yesterday evening, from Caen, in the Gabriel steamer. After witnessing the Launch of the Pasce-Portout at Dantes, and paying a visit to Lorient and Brest, his Royal Highness left the latter port by a [illegible] for Cherbourg. [illegible] him to land at Cherbourg. [illegible] this morning for Paris."

A letter from Algiers gives details of the capture from the Arabs of Captain Lacoste, son the death of M. Levi, the interpreter. The writer states that when Abd-el-Kader was obliged to fly, several of his prisoners and baggage behind him, he ordered the captain and M. Levi, to be led to their horses, and an Arab was appointed to kill them both. M. Levi received several wounds, [illegible] one of which were mortal. Captain Lacoste, after being three times fired at and missed, received at last a pistol ball in the side, which broke one of his ribs, and another in the thigh. He would have been massacred, but for the timely arrival of the Goums, which cut his assailant to pieces. The captain had another escape; for, being in the Arab dress, he was for a moment taken for one of the enemy; but, happily, he made himself known by his voice. He has been attended with the utmost care, and there is every reason to hope that he will recover.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The present week is one in which neither the national taste nor the national custom give popularity to the pursuit of amusement. In keeping with this honourable breach of the ordinary observance, our present notice will be rather prospective than historic. There was, indeed, a passage of horse-racing on Maulsey Hurst, and certain pleasure parties for the purpose of steeple-chasing in the vicinity of Windsor. In the latter the guests were said to have been up to their necks in mud: in the former things did not come off on velvet either. The site of Hampton races is one of the most picturesque and rurally pretty in reach of the metropolis. It is very hard, for this cause, that the citizens of London should be required to pay for their peeping after a course no where else existing. Last week the noble stand and the fair downs of Epsom were thrown open to the public gratis: this week, for the privilege of going on the Hurst, they charged a half-a-crown for a one-horse chaise. At Epsom the sport was a treat to those by whom it was got up: at Hampton there was not a race above the average of a leather plate: the meeting, in fact, was a contribution from the officers [illegible] at Hampton Court. Unless they ease their "mulling" system, we can [illegible] the fortunes another edition of the story about the goose that laid the golden eggs.

It is the chartered season of sport and revel, will of course overflow with good things. The holiday folks will be at their wits' end for time even to taste a little of the treats which solicit them, and the lovers of sporting will have wherewithal to pick and choose from. Running, indeed, is on its last legs: the Queen's celebrate their final gala for the season on Monday, at Stoke Common. For the East-Ender, parsimoniously there may be an attempt to renovate the Epping Hunt: but, virtually, the class has brought its operations to a close, foxes no longer are in season, like oysters, during every month with an R in it. Foremost among Nations, Sports will be the run.

The Craven Meeting, at Newmarket, which commences on Monday, is the overture, properly speaking, to the serious business of the course. It comes in, as befits its April existence, with cloud and shine. For the first time for 32 years, it will be without its once famous Ruddlesworth, a stake that whilom has exercised no mean influence on the Derby. It also appears under an accession of patronage that augurs well for the future. New names—when those of good men and true—are most welcome to the Newmarket lists. This year, as subscribers to the principal stakes, there are "among the superlatively good"—Sir Gilbert Heathcote, Colonel Wyndham, Sir W. W. Wynn, Sir R. W. Bulkeley, and Mr. Fiddlemore, first appearers, in that character, or nearly so. There can be no doubt but that racing is in the ascendant. At this meeting there will be between twenty and thirty races, and although, in some instances, the fields will be short, the sports, from the unusually forward state of the stables, must be over the general average. It will bring out a good many Derby nominations, and is certain to affect the betting. Beside the Newmarket Craven, during Easter week, Catterick Bridge Races take place; one of the lions of the northern turf season, in the spring of the year.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The betting took a very comprehensive range this afternoon, and as the Newmarket Handicap had the effect of elevating Corranna, who many thought would be kept for Chester, to the premiership, Arturo, Beaumont, Spur, the Nile Boy, being also in good estimation; as many others were fancied, we may anticipate a brilliant field at the starting post. Very little was done on the Chester Cup; and not much on the Derby, with the exception of The Traverser and Tom Tulloch, who were in great demand. We have to submit an unusually full list of prices:—

THURSDAY.—The length of our quotations will show that the subscribers were numerous. As a formidable a field as has appeared for some time, nor one, perhaps, so much calculated to give an erroneous idea of the extent of the betting. To prevent this, we should state that, although nearly every arrival mentioned was backed, only three or four for the Derby, and as much in the Oaks, were taken. The leading favourites were in considerable estimation for the Newmarket Handicap Sweetmeat, Best Bower, Vitula, and Pedometer, for the Chester Cup, and Tom Tulloch (an immense favourite), The Traverser, and Hamilcar, for the Derby. Bresaroto went back to 16 to 1, but was backed in quarters that incline us to suspect that he is destined to see a much better day. The following were the averages, at the close of a very long afternoon:—

THE WINDSOR STEEPLE CHASES —TUESDAY.

The ground chosen by the Stewards (Viscount Naville, Hon. R. N. Lawley, and Albert Records, Esq.) to be ridden over this year, was in Buckinghamshire, and the start in a meadow about a quarter of a mile from Eton College, the booths and carriages of Calvey's Hill, which, on account of its being selected as the spot for coming in, commanded an admirable view of the whole line of country. The fences to be taken were sixteen in number, in addition to the Chalvey Ditch, and another brook at coming in.

Notwithstanding the heavy rains had rendered the ground exceedingly heavy for the horses, and disagreeable to the spectators, the company was more numerous than any former occasion. The first race was—

SCENES IN THE PUNJAUB.—(FROM SKETCHES BY G. T. VIGNE, ESQ.)

RIBERSEE FORT, IN THE PUNJAUB.

The pair of Engravings of what is termed the Alpine Punjaub, are from two spirited sketches from the portfolio of Mr. Vigne, the traveller. The first represents a strong Fort at Ribersee, in Gholab Singh's country, with the snowy range of Koksur, in the distance. The second Illustration shows the fortified Palace of Bisuli Rajah, and the Lower Himalaya range.

PALACE OF THE BISULI RAJAH, AND LOWER HIMALAYA RANGE.

NEWSPAPER

The first presents a fine specimen of the native Hill Fort, which, by its natural position, appears fitted to defy all the strategies of siege. The Castle-Palace of the Rajah occupies a less favoured position. Let us, however, hope that it be long ere the capabilities of the first of these structures are called into requisition.

'Tis Peace!.... Along the thousand plains
Where the Five Rivers roll their tide
Through the fair Punjaub, "Order reigns;"
For crush'd has been her warrior pride.
The Lion Chiefs,* whose iron manes
Boldly confronted Britain's pow'r,
Now vanish'd, gnaw their galling chains,
And 'neath the yoke of conquest cow'r.

'Tis Peace! "Men make a solitude,
Then call it peace!"† Along the banks
Of gory Sutlej may be view'd
The havoc of the hostile ranks.
Five thousand turbans press the ground,
Five hundred British hearts are cold,
Beneath the tête-de-pont's red mound,
Whose guns the knell of bravery toll'd.

Oh! yes, 'tis peace, and dearly bought:
The gay, the witty, and the brave,
Who yesterday but little thought
Of death, have found a bloody grave.
The grey-haired chiefs, whose darling hope,
Long cherished, was "to die at home!"
For there, no yearning arms shall ope,
No toast resound, nor goblet foam.

When will this end this deadly strife?
There's peace—but not within the hearts
Of the dark Sikhs, who grasp the knife
E'en now for vengeance. 'Tis the marts
Of commerce—not the reeking sword;
'Tis the soul-ividing arts,
Which the best guarantee afford
Of Peace; and, until Earth departs,
Where'er the sword has hew'd its crimson path,
No peace is there, but fierce and smouldering wrath.

* The word Singh means Lion. This word is always attached to the names of the Chiefs as Lal Singh, Singh Sunal &c.

SIR HENRY SMITH.

The speech of the Earl of Ripon, who moved the vote of thanks in the House of Peers to Sir H. Smith, gave an able sketch of the operations he conducted during the march upon Loodianah, to effect a junction with General Wheeler. The Duke of Wellington added the weight of his testimony to the tribute paid to the military talents of this gallant officer; but his past career was but briefly alluded to on that occasion. We give a portrait of Sir H. Smith, derived from the most authentic source, and add a sketch of his past services.

Sir Henry G. Smith is descended from an ancient family, that has been settled for the last two centuries at Whittlesea (Isle of Ely). In 1805 he was, under the auspices of the late General Sir William Stewart, appointed to a second lieutenancy in the Rifle Brigade (then the 95th). To enumerate his services would be to name almost every battle that has since been fought by British troops in every quarter of the globe, for he has had more practical experience in war, and passed through more fire, perhaps, than any man living.

MAJOR-GENERAL SIR HENRY GEORGE SMITH, K.C.B. FROM AN ORIGINAL PAINTING.

His first campaign commenced in South America with the storming of Montevideo and attack on Buenos Ayres; next at the capture of Copenhagen under Lord Cathcart; thence to the Peninsula, where he was present in every battle fought by the main army (Talavera excepted) from the beginning to the end of that war. We next find him at the capture of Washington, under General Ross, and for his distinguished conduct on that occasion, he was honoured by being made the bearer of the despatches to England. His next battle-field was, in the capacity of military secretary, in the attack on New Orleans, where the good, the gallant Pakenham died in his arms. And he returned to England in time to partake in the glories of his last European battle, as Assistant Quartermaster-General of the 6th Division under Sir John Lambert, on the field of Waterloo.

Sir Henry Smith's career as a staff officer commenced in 1811, with his appointment as Brigade-Major in the celebrated Light Division, in which he was ever conspicuous alike for his dashing gallantry in the field, his frank warm-hearted bearing to his brother officers, and his unwearied attention to the comforts and the wants of the soldier.

Those only who have served under a good and an indifferent staff-officer can estimate the immense value of the former, and Smith was one of the very best, for his heart and soul were in his duty. His light wiry frame rendered him insensible to fatigue, and no matter what battle or march might have occupied the day or night, or what elementary war might be raging, Smith was never to be found off his horse until he saw every man in his brigade housed, if cover could possibly be had. His devotion to their comforts was repaid by their affection, which was shown in a manner most gratifying to him when, in 1827, at Halifax, Nova Scotia, he was appointed Deputy-Adjutant-General in the West Indies; the voluntary attendance of every officer and soldier, from the Governor downwards, made his embarkation triumphal.

Though engaged in active service throughout the war of the Peninsula, he has only been once wounded, which proved a singular advantage to him in more respects than one, for the chiefs of his brigade proving not so invulnerable, it brought him as commander, successively, to several of the most brilliant warriors of that age—Kempt, Barnard, Beckwith, Colburne, &c.; for, while he was honoured with their friendship, he profited largely by their experience. In 1837, he was appointed Deputy-Adjutant-General in the West Indies. In the year following, he was transferred in the same rank to the Cape of Good Hope, and, in 1839, appointed Deputy-Adjutant-General in India, where he has remained ever since, and was engaged in that rank in 1844 in the battles of Gwalior and Maharajpore.

The battle of Aliwal speaks for itself; as the despatch of Sir H. Smith would alone proclaim that he had been trained under Sir John Moore, and finished under the master-mind of Wellington.

The news arrives! the glorious news!
Recalling England's pristine fame;
With honest pride the land reviews
Both Wellington's and Marlborough's name
But Waterloo and Ramilies
Cannot excel the trophies bright,
Won from the ruthless enemies
Who wildly dared the Britons' might.

Behold Old England's Grenadiers!
The hoary chief and drummer-boy
Welcome alike, with triumph cheers,
The news that fills their hearts with joy.
How eagerly their ears they feast:
Smith, Gough, and Hardinge - household words! -
Recount the glories of the last,
Achieved by Britain's stainless swords.

Ay! stainless - and therein consists
Our greatest fame—there rests no blot
Upon our banners where the lists
Of warfare peal the shell and shot.

READING THE DESPATCHES OF THE INDIAN NEWS, AT THE WELLINGTON BARRACKS.

Not captive's cause nor conquest's lust
Led on our men to glory's goal,
They proved themselves the brave and just
And sway'd by mercy's blessed control.

'Tis this which renders Britan's rule
To India's millions so endeared;
From Ganges to the swart Cabool
Our name is honoured and revered.
The sword is sheathed; the arts of peace,
Commerce, and Truth will soon prevail;
The fratricidal strife shall cease,
And joy succeed to sorrow's wail.

Honour to England's Grenadiers,
For their's is now the bravest trade;
To guard their land from hostile spears,
For this they draw the victor blade.
Each is a soldier-citizen
Who fondly loves his native home;
Hence have they been the first of men
On tented field or billows' foam.

TRACTS FOR THE TRAINS.

BY ALBERT SMITH.

No. II.

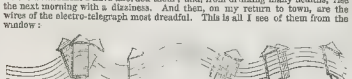
ROM a number of communications which have been sent to us, relative to our scientific information connected with the electro-magnetic wires, we select the following:

"SIR,

"I am a musician, and, though I say it who perhaps ought not to, one of no ordinary talents. I have lately started some entertainments on my own account. My 'Lays and Legends of Everywhere,' have been most favourably received; so also has my 'Wee Hour wi' Bunn,' and my Lecture 'On the Music of Newington Butts.' My descriptive songs, in imitation of Mr. H. Russell, including 'The Fourpeuny Boat aground,' 'The Old Turn-up Bedstead,' 'I'm a Bore!" 'The Gambler's Grandmother,' 'The Shop on Fire,' and others, have created a great sensation; and I have challenged Mr. John Parry to make the piano sneeze, laugh, and whistle as well as he can, but he is afraid.

"Well, Sir, you see my opinion is of some value; and therefore I must protest against the plan of teaching the cornet-à-piston from the telegraph wires, mentioned in your letter. The great objection is that the notes once passed could never be taken up again, and especially the high ones for, before the pupil could get his lips to the necessary embouchure, he would be a mile beyond the bar. A non-musical friend, given to sensuous vitality, suggests that fugues should be chosen for the music; because, as he says, those compositions never appear to have beginning, end, middle, or anything else, and may be commenced or left off anywhere, with equal effect. But, herein does he show his lack of common-sense, and overplus of absurd irreverence.

"It would be better, Sir, for you to confine yourself to practical improvements, than ingenious, but futile schemes. There is a point of far greater importance to railway travellers connected with the electro-telegraph wires, to which attention ought to be called. It is this: after my entertainments given in the country, I am usually asked to supper by certain of the leading inhabitants, in gratitude for the amusement I have afforded them: and, from drinking many healths, rise the next morning with a dizziness. And then, on my return to town, are the wires of the electro-telegraph most dreadful. This is all I see of them from the window:



So they go on —up and down, down and up, for miles and miles; until, at last, seeing nothing else, I begin to think that they are stationary, and it is the carriage which is undulating. And this has such an effect, that I am as indisposed upon arriving at the terminus, as if I had just crossed the Channel.

"A little care on the part of the directors can remedy this. Why cannot the wires be tuned up tight, like those of a piano? Pray recommend this, and oblige

"Your constant reader,

"COUNTERPOINT.

"N.B. The ignorance of the rustics down the lines is dreadful. They cannot be persuaded but that the electro-telegraph is a set of wires, which the clerks in London pull to ring bells at Slough."

CHARADE THE SECOND.

Lady Amy Arlington beyond a doubt was very fair,
Long and sweeping were her tresses, soft and rippling was her hair—
Not the undulating bands in which young ladies now delight,
By hot irons falsely waved, or plaited very tight at night.
But long dewy tresses falling o'er her cheek and bury shoulders,
Darkly cluster'd a raven, and driving frantic the beholder's.
Lady Amy Arlington was followed by a dangling train,
But my first to their discomfort could alone her favour gain.

He was ever at her side,
With her daily used to ride;
In her boudoir he intruded
When all others were excluded;
And the crowd of lovers mutter'd, fairly distanced in the race,
"What a lucky dog he is, and would that I were in his place."

Harry Vane—so on dits tell—
Lov'd the Lady Amy well.
But he sigh'd, "Ah! woe is me!
Sooner than myself, I see,
Aught can her my second be."

Whether it was her canary, hanging in the gilded cage,
Or the tiny cup of china, part of a small equipage;
Or the prancing Arab horse, that in the Park she lov'd to ride;
Or the little coral bauble that the charm against the evil-eyed;
Or each other watch-chain trinket—gifts of which her desk was full;
Or the sleep-inducing brioche, worked in rainbow Berlin wool;
Or aught else amongst her things to which she gave the loving name,
Harry mark'd, and said, lamenting, "Would she'd call me just the same!"

Sober philosophic friends
Tell us "Perseverance ends
In perfection!" So it proved;
Lady Amy's heart was moved;
Harry no more vainly loved.

How he changed! He gave up Folking, which he did beyond compare;
Never went to any parties, if his Amy was not there;
Never, even to his club, except to see about his letters;
Left off smoking, sold the meerschaum, cut the company of setters;
("Betting-men," I should have said, but then the other makes a rhyme;)
Came in always to his slumbers at a reason-able time.
So it is; submitting to a pretty woman's sole control,
In her hands, without exception, every man becomes MY WHOLE.

RAILWAY TYPES.

THE JOLLY MAN OF THE SECOND CLASS.

We never yet travelled for any distance on any line, without meeting a jolly man: and he was always in the second-class carriages. We never encountered him amongst the aristocracy of the train; for jollity and assumption of position are incompatible

By the way, apropos of second-class carriages, some good excuse ought to be invented for those people to avoid the impulse of, who are very sensitive about being thought unable to afford any thing. When stage coaches were in fashion on a folks said that they always rode outside not because it was cheaper—but, because "travelling inside always made them ill." And yet, oddly enough they were not affected by the interior of a private carriage. Formerly, the same excuse held good in a second-class carriage: they patronised it "for the sake of the air." But now the cars are all closed they do not know what to say. They cannot prefer a thorough draught or rattling windows; and, therefore, something must be hit upon to relieve them from their present embarrassment.

Now! We know the Jolly Man the moment he enters the carriage. He looks round and smiles at the passengers as though he had done something facetious in getting in. And then he says he likes to sit with his back to the horses," and laughs again. He never has any luggage; possibly this to some measure contributes to his hilarity. When the train moves, he says "Now we're off," which assertion being incontrovertible provokes no reply; but he still laughs, and upon the engine squealing, he says "Oh, dear! you're very bad—that you?" which evidently his pet joke, for then he absolutely chuckles. If the train stops at the station longer than he thinks proper he puts his head out of the window and shouts to the guard "Now John! all right." And at one of the stations he knows the clerk, to whom he cries "How about that spanell?" which is presumed to relate to some jocular dog transaction, embodying circumstances of great mirth.

For the clerk, in all the confusion of way-bills, time-keepers, and late passengers, has still a moment to laugh and reply. "Ask the gent as was here on Sunday," upon which the Jolly Man winks, points his thumb over his shoulder, and says to the passenger, as the train goes on, "I know'd I should have him." At which, a tit-a-tit of feeble, but complaisant mind, smiles from courtesy. But he seeth not the joke.

The Jolly Man has certain funny things to launch at every point of the journey. When the Engine first goes off, gasping and panting, as it does on the up-rail from Kingston,) he invariably says, "Bellows to mend." And in the Tunnel, he soothes the fears of the lady opposite by saying "Never mind, mum; it'll soon be over, as the man said:" but who the man was, and under what circumstances he expressed his conviction of an approaching denouement, nobody is told. But he must have been a wag in his time, whoever he was: for the Jolly Man laughs again.

We must confess we like the Jolly Man. His jokes are certainly mild: but we are sure that he is uncommonly good-tempered; and would sit with his back to the engine, or his face, or shut all the windows, or have them all open, or anything that the passengers wished. And he certain when he arrives at his station, which is always an intermediate one, that, if you are going his way, he will be hurt if you do not take a seat in the compromise between a private cab and a tax-cart which is waiting for him. And then, also, he sure that he is known all along the road; and most especially as the "Crooked Billet," where he laughs as he lets you into the secret, that the host "draws the best glass of old ale in all England."

EASTER AT ASTLEY'S, FIFTY YEARS HENCE.

The ultimate uses to which steam will be applied are beyond all imagination. Comic literary gentlemen and artists have for some time past furnished diverting sketches of locomotive engines put to the ordinary purposes of promenades and riding; but as horses gradually become extinct, which they will soon do, the most extraordinary results will be produced. The first shadow of these coming events has been cast by the challenges of speed on the broad and narrow gauge, between Brunel and Stephenson. Beyond a doubt this sporting principle will be carried out before long. All the lines will become race-courses. We shall have the "London and Southwestern Spring Meeting," the "Dover Derby," and the "Direct York St. Leger," and steple-chases for two-year old engines, will take place upon unfinished lines begun at several places at once, the intervening gaps forming the "rasers," and unbridged viaducts the "purling" brooks. But upon our favourite Astley's we expect this change will fall most heavily. Locomotives will fill the stables, coke the racks and mangers. Mr. Widdecombe will lay down the whip for the fire-shovel, and Mr. Barry will give up the Clown for the comic stoker. Every thing will be altered.

We shall no longer see the "Courier of St. Petersburgh" showing the British public in what a hazardous manner despatches are conveyed in Russia, or how clearly "riding over the poles," peculiar to that Government, is demonstrated No: the "courier" will ride two engines at once, guiding them by stop-cocks and safety valves upon circular rails, and increasing the excitement of the finish, when the drums and trumpets always play fast and loud, by letting off the steam, and flying round in a cloud of vapour. And Camille Leroux, Caroline, or Louise Tournaire will no longer cling to the extreme edge of the horse, as slightly but securely perched, as a boy on the back springs of a carriage. They will perform their graceful scarf evolutions upon a ladies' engine, and the jokes of the Clown will be such as "Now, John, put some gin-and-water into his boiler to make him go fast;" or he will make some allusion to his "always being in hot water," and, speaking of the accompaniments, he will say—"You don't want a saddle, and the poker will give you a stir-up," with other established facetiæ

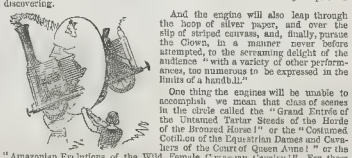
There will be no more clever horses, to run after the Clown, pick up handkerchiefs, fire pistols, uncork bottles, and the like; but Mr. Batty will introduce his "Trained Locomotive Bursters," which will fill its own tender, take its supper of coke, stop at "the lady who's wishing to be married before Easter," or "the young gentleman who prefers robbing an orchard to going to church," or any other idiosyncracies which learned animals evince such remarkable perception in discovering.



And the engine will also leap through the hoop of silver paper, and over the slip of striped canvass, and, finally, pursue the Clown, in a manner never before attempted, to the screaming delight of the audience "with a variety of other performances, too numerous to be expressed in the limits of a handbill."

One thing the engines will be unable to accomplish we mean that class of scenes in the circle called the "Grand Entrée of the Untamed Tartar Steeds of the Horde of the Bronzed Horse!" or the "Continued Cotillon of the Equestrian Dames and Cavaliers of the Court of Queen Anne!" or the "Amazonian Evolutions of the Wild Female Circassian Cavalry!" For these would require such a confused mass of rails that the "setches" would not possibly be kept in order, and the audience might be startled at the sudden frenzy of an engine flying off the rails over the heads, and finally creating great confusion, to say the least of it, in the pit, by its whistle, and fiery verrukle behaviour

That all these things will happen we firmly believe. But on the first night we shall take our place as high up and out of danger as we can.

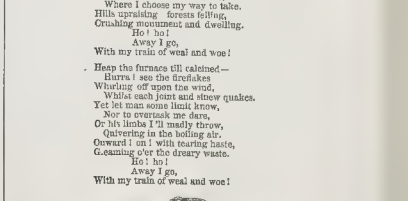
LAYS OF THE LINE.

THE SONG OF THE ENGINE

Roaring o'er the trembling land,
Mountains piercing, valleys cressing,
Rushing on either hand,
Glowing embers madly tossing:
Like some fettered fiend of Hell
Speed I on my reckless way,
Shooting aye, to weed and fell,
My infernal roundelay.
Over moor and pasture screaming
Whilst the tired world is dreaming,
Ho! ho!
Away I go,
With my train of weal and woe!

What to me is park or tower,
Cottage or ancestral hall?
Be it needed, mine the power
From the earth to sweep them all.
For wherever I go, you see
Desolation in my wake;
All the world must bow to me,
Where I choose my way to take.
Hills upraising forests felling,
Crushing monument and dwelling.
Ho!
Away I go,
With my train of weal and woe!

Heap the furnace till calcined—
Hurra! see the fire-flakes
Whirling off upon the wind,
Whilst each joint and sinew quakes.
Yet let man some limit know,
Nor to pursue me dare,
Or his limbs I'll madly throw,
Quivering in the boiling air.
Onward I on with roaring haste,
Gleaming o'er the dreary waste.
Ho! ho!
Away I go,
With my train of weal and woe!



ANSWER TO CHARADE THE FIRST.

1. Tick. 2. (Eton, Tennyson) Et.—TICKET.

We have received several answers to the above, more or less ingenious. We beg, however, to inform our Correspondents, that we cannot afford space for their communications.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

On Saturday night took place the last performance before Easter, and on this occasion we heard, with still renewed gratification, Verdi's chef d'œuvre, "Nino." Of this opera we have spoken so much since its first production here that it needs no further commentary at our hands: but the other entertainments of the evening were as numerous as the most exorbitant lover of variety could desire. To commence, as in duty bound, with the lyrical part of the performance, Madame Castellan's impersonation of Amina, in the last act of the "Somnambula," both on Saturday and Thursday, gave us a better opportunity than "Linda" of judging of the improvement in this charming artiste, which we had remarked already in the last mentioned opera. In the slow movement preceding the awakening of Amina there was a dreamy wildness in her tones admirably appropriate to the state of half consciousness of the Somnambule, while the plaintive melancholy of her accents expressed the instinctive feeling of woe which pursued her even in sleep. Such an intimate blending of action and feeling with music is essential to the perfection of lyrical art; and, were it only on this account, Castellan's performance of this scene would be worthy of study: but the fantastic sweetness of her voice, and the art and knowledge of effect she displays in bringing out her notes dwelling upon them till they die away to the faintest whisper—add to it a threefold effect

The contrast to these melancholy strains, of the joyful and triumphant "Ah! non guinge!" which follows, is rendered still more striking by the decision of rhythm with which the prima donna gives the latter, and the bold originality of the fioriture she introduces. Let us, however, plead guilty to a yearning towards the simple execution of the air itself, or the introduction of those passages only which, by long habit, have become identified with it. This, we opine, is a point on which many of our readers will not agree with us. Madame Castellan's performance of this scene, in another respect, is worthy of remark. She keeps up the illusion from without. Instead of stepping forward and addressing her aria to the audience, it is to her lover that she seems to express the joy with which her heart is overflowing; and at one moment she turns round to him with a movement of confiding tenderness, which is extremely expressive, and gives an air of truth to the reality to the scene.

The minuet de la cour, danced by Grahn and Louise Taglioni; the "Cracovienne," executed by the former; a new pas de trois, and the revival of "Eoline;" have constituted the choregraphic attractions of the past week. They have been sufficiently numerous, as will be seen; but in all these the great novelty has been the dancing of Louise Taglioni, who has made rapid advance in general favour. To commence with the minuet. The new danseuse is, certainly, a far more appropriate representative of a dignified lady of the old court than her fair predecessor, Cerito, whose bounding movements are somewhat incompatible with the stately gravity of the dance. Louise Taglioni is graceful and quiet; her costume also appeared to us better chosen than any we have hitherto seen in this part. That of Grahn as a cavalier is perfect. The new pas de trois, executed by Taglioni, Petit Stephan, and Perrot, is rendered remarkable by the power and agility the former displays, especially when, revolving upon herself in the air, she comes to the ground with an entrechat of the most truly marvellous; and, added to this, there is a grace and poetry in her movements, without which no dancing can be worthy a moment's attention. The applause bestowed on her efforts in this new pas was most vociferous. Perrot's wonderful lightness and grace also won for him loud plaudits, while to Petit Stephan, on Thursday, was accorded a loud encore.

The "Cracovienna" is too well known to our readers to need any comment. A national dance like this is certain to be effective, especially when executed with a grace, spirit, and abandon like that of Lucile Grahn. In this dance, the fair Dane is truly inimitable. Her every movement, her speaking face, her precision and ease of motion, and the variety of character with which she invests the different portions of the dance, are worthy of all praise. No wonder, then, that it should always be encored.

During the past week the theatres, although closed to the public, have unceasingly echoed with the hammering of the carpenters, the shoutings of the stage-managers, and the repetitions of the orchestra, in preparation for the Easter Holidays, which form one of the three dramatic harvests of the year.

At DRURY LANE the ballet of action of "Faust," or the Desolate Island," will be revived, with new scenery and appointments, forty-six years after its first representation, which took place at Covent Garden, and is said to have been founded on Kotzebue's drama of the same name. The curious in dramatic coincidences may call to mind a parallel between the situations of Omba, Madame Pevrose, and Peruse, in this ballet; and of Miami, Geraldine, and Connor O'Kennedy, in the "Green Bushes." The ballet will embrace the services of Messrs. W. H. Payne, Wieland, Howell, T. Mathews, Madame Giubelei, and Mdlle. Louise. A new and original ballet, by M. Barrez, is in daily rehearsal.

At COVENT GARDEN, Mr. Anderson, the "Wizard of the North," will erect his magic temple, for the performance of his legerdemain experiments, introducing several novel and surprising experiments; one of which, we believe, is to be the substitution of a cannon for a musket in the celebrated "gun trick."

At the HAYMARKET, Mr. Planché quits the stores of the Countess d'Aulnay and Mother Bunch, and goes back four hundred years before the Christian era for his subject, taking "The Birds" of Aristophanes. All writers have found some difficulty in explaining the plot of this play, and we are curious to see what Mr Planché's ingenuity will convert it into. It is supposed that its principal situations have reference to the famous Sicilian Expedition from Sicily. The bill is short, but sufficiently humorous. The "Bird's-eye view of the City of the Birds," is called, "A flight of fancy, designed by A. Crowquill," and the music is "selected from a number of bird-songs, and arranged expressly for a lark." The principal characters will be supported by Mr. James Bland, Mr. Rhodes, and Miss P. Horton.

At the ADELPHI a new drama of domestic interest, involving several new effects, will be followed by a burlesque on "Peter Wilkins," in which the adventures of that renowned voyager will be shown under new circumstances by Messrs. Leman and Rochett, the latter gentleman, we believe, writing the piece, and the former superintending its arrangement and construction.

The LYCEUM, content with the attraction of "Hop o' my Thumb," produces no novelty at Easter Monday. A burlesque is, however, in preparation, called "Robin Hood," by Messrs. Stocqueler, Shirley Brookes, and Charles Kenney. Miss Mary Keeley, we believe, will play in it, as well as Miss Fortescue.

Mr Macready is announced to appear at the PRINCESS'S as Hamlet, on Monday; but when he will play this is not decided upon. After this, a fairy extravaganza, called "Peeping Tom of Coventry, or Lady Godiva," will be produced, in which Messrs. Oxberry, Compton, Granby, Gilbert, Fitzmore, Miss Emma Stanley, Miss Marshall, and Miss Dallas will appear. The piece will have the advantage of some of Mr. W. Beverley's beautiful scenery; and is said to be written by Mr. Moncrieff. A new two-act drama, called "Ernestine," is in rehearsal, and will be brought out in a day or two.

The Surrey puts forward three new pieces for the holiday-makers, the first being "A Grand, Heroic, Anti-dwarfish Extravaganza, founded on events narrated and over-rated in the well-known History, called 'Jack the Giant-killer; or, the Knights of the round Table.'" Then comes a new farce, called "On the Tiles; or, a Night at Greenwich," by Mr. S. Stirling; then, a necromantic ballet of action, entitled "Der Chamois Tager; or, the Enchanted Crossbow;" the Duke Pu, and then, the National Tableau of the Grand British Victory, and, lastly, a drama, called "The Hats of Rats' Castle; or, the Three Feathers," which satisfactorily closes the inordinate pleasure-seeker.

The Olympic will open for a series of twenty-four performances, under the management of a Mr Bolton, who has written a five-act comedy, and a burlesque address, for representation on Monday evening. The support of the legitimate drama is Mr. Bolton's avowed object; but we fear that the legitimate drama is not likely to be much benefited by the efforts of amateurs, or the performances of third and fourth-rate comedians. We do not wish, however, to prejudge the speculation; on the contrary, we shall be glad to see it turn out successful.

PROFESSOR RISLEY AND HIS TWO SONS,

whose very graceful exercises we have had occasion to speak of so frequently, have appeared, with immense success, at Bordeaux. From a recent No. of the Courrier de la Gironde we take the following notice, which, apart from serving to chronicle the triumph of the very active family, may afford the reader some amusement, as a fair sample of French newspaper criticism:—

"Grand Theatre.—First representation of 'A Midsummer Night's Dream'—Professor Risley and his children. Shakspeare has very little to do with 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' which we saw on Saturday at the Theatre. It is simply a fantastic divertissement an ingenious and charming pretext which M. Simon, our clever ballet-master, has invented to serve as a vehicle for the exercises of Mr. Risley and his sons. It resembles, however, a dream, inasmuch as we believed ourselves to have been dreaming the other evening, when present at these wonderful exercises; and, we may say with Prince Albert, after he had attended one of these performances with Queen Victoria, at the Theatre Royal, of Drury-lane 'I must see Risley a second time, to believe what I beheld the first.'

"Mr. Risley is the type and the creator of these exercises, which he has elevated to the ideal of their kind. As always happens, a crowd of imitators have sprung up after him in France. Imitation is, in the arts, what opposition is in commerce; but Risley is, and will be always, the king and the master of all, because he has originality, which alone makes great artists, whether they call themselves Horace Vernet, Victor Hugo, Mabbran, Paganini, or Risley.

"The stage represents a forest, a carpet of moss and flowers entirely covers it. From all sides — from the rocks, the trees, the bowers—fairies come forth, and dance in the soft moonlight. Prosperity, Titania, their Queen, arrives in company of Ariel, Oberon, her husband, has left her, to prosecute his affairs of gallantry, and Titania, from the bottom of her soul, desires something to divert her. We know what things a jealous and wearied woman is capable of doing. Cleopatra Risley and her slaves for amusement. Thesee is less cruel; she is content in calling her page Puck to her side, and telling him to provide some spectacle against her husband's return. Directly, a trap opens, and a graceful little being—slight, fair, aerial—an elegant sylph, an airy sylphide, a gnome, a love of a child —frail and rosy as those of which the Keepsake Anglais has given us the type—comes out. He has scarcely appeared—scarcely has he bowed, leapt, and gambolled about the fairy, when another is seen to appear, from the top of a flower: if he was not a little larger, you might take him for the same, seen in a mirror, as Théophile Gauthier has said. After the children comes the father, and then commences that incredible, marvellous, and fantastic exhibition, at which we were present on Saturd-y.

"To relate what we saw is impossible. Mr. Risley uses his legs as a racket player does his bat: and the two sons, John and Henry, are the balls. These two charming little beings—sparkling with spangles light as a feather, as the wind, as a bird—graceful as grace itself and with limbs apparently made of india-rubber and steel—bound, and resound, and twirl in the air, to the floor down, in all kinds of imaginable positions, upon the soles of their father's feet. Father and sons rival one another in grace, elasticity, and energy; they are so quick, so ready, so aerial, that the dazzled eyes have all the trouble in the world to follow them. All Bordeaux will go to see the Risleys."

MUSIC.

Passion Week has not been free from Concerts, although a kind of compromise has been effected in some of the entertainments, by combining with profane music sacred compositions. Covent Garden Theatre has been opened every morning (Good Friday alone excepted), with "Sacred and Miscellaneous Promenade Concerts," the speculation of a musiceller—a Mr. Alcroft who has acquired notoriety by introducing the "Monster Concerts" at Exeter Hall. Mr. Fuller's prices of admission have been retained, the attendance has been of a nature to pay for the outlay, although the schemes contained an odd mixture of the severe and gay — from the sublimities of Handel and Haydn, down to the trivialities of polkas, waltzes, quadrilles, &c., with an orchestra, conducted by Signor Negri, of nearly eighty players, for overtures, &c. The great gun of this affair, in the instrumental way, has been Signor Sivori, and the vocal line Mr. Stanley Russell. We must avow that we should have preferred a series of oratorios to these curious exhibitions, at such a period of sacred history.

The Beethoven Quartet Society.—The third meeting was on Monday last, when the fourth Quartet of Op. 18 in C minor, Op. 74 in E flat major, and Op. 132 in A minor, were executed by Sivori, Sainton (alternately), Hill, and Rousselot. The fourth concert will be on the 27th inst.; and on the 30th of April, the sixteen Quartuors for two violins, viola, and violoncello, will have completed the series.

Mr. Dando's Quartet Concerts.—The fourth performance in the Throne Room, Crosby Hall, on Monday last, opened with Spohr's Quartet in B flat major, No 2, Op. 74, executed by Dando, first violin; Gattie, second violin; W. Thomas, viola; and Lucas, violoncello. The same players performed Mozart's Posthumous Quartet in A minor, Op. 132, in excellent style. One of the most attractive items was a full Concerto (Da Capella) in A major, for four violins, viola, violoncello, double bass, and organ, by Mr. W. Holmes, one of our best pianists, distinguished himself in Mozart's Quartet in E flat major, assisted by Messrs. Dando, W. Thomas, and Lucas. Mr. Pratten was much applauded in Müller's introduction and variations upon Himmsell's song of "Alexis," for flute and double bass. This artist has been lately added to the Philharmonic band, and is in every point of view an executant of the first class. Miss Duval sang Handel's air, "O Lord, whom we adore," and Miss Dalby a couple of sacred airs by Mendelssohn both effectively The fifth concert will be on the 27th inst.

Sacred Harmonic Society.—Handel's "Messiah" was performed on Wednesday night at Exeter Hall, Miss Birch, Miss P. S. Hawes, Mr. Braham, and Mr. Phillips, being the principal singers, whose execution of this noble work has been frequently noticed in our columns.

Miss A. Newton and Mr. G. Case.—Mrs. A Newton, the vocalist, and Mr. Case, the concertina player, gave a Concert at Crosby Hall on Monday, assisted by Miss Rainforth, and Miss Dolby, Messrs H. Phillips, Sporle, and John Parry; with Miss Ward, Messrs. Richardson, Lazarus, Giulio Regondi, Sedgwick, and Master J. Case; Mr. C. Severn being the conductor.

Mr George's Concert.—Mr. George, who has a beautiful tenor voice, gave his Fourth Annual Concert, on Tuesday night, at Crosby Hall, assisted by the Misses Williams, Miss Poole, Miss Steele, Miss Thornton, Mrs. Weiss; Messrs. Harrison, Sporle, Gaubler, Allen, Weiss, Mr. F. Smith, and Mr. John Parry. Mr. Tully officiated as conductor, and Master Thirlwall played on the violin, and Mr. G. Case on the concertina. There was a select choir for Glees, Madrigals, &c.

Mr. E Sturges's Concert. Mr. Sturges, the organist of the Bounding, gave his Annual Concert at the Hanover square Rooms, when Haydn's "Creation" was performed, and a selection of new sacred music. The principal singers were Miss Birch, Miss Rainforth, Miss Hawes, Messrs. Atkins, King, Lefler, Phillips, Genge, and Bennett. Mr. Sowman was the leader, and Mr. Perry first violin. The band and chorus amounted to nearly 200 performers.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

Private letters, as well as the journals, all agree as to the complete failure of David's "Moïse au Sinai." Our readers, who may recollect the notices of his "Desert," when produced here, will not be surprised at this result. Liszt said a good thing at the Bonn Festival, respecting the criticisms on David, which has not yet been in print. Some one was asking Liszt what David was doing on the Rhine. "Il fait mon Désert" replied the wit. "Il ne sait pas combien de temps le Bonn restera pour se prosterner et adorer." Bernhard Romberg's death has deprived the world of a musician of the first class. He was a violoncello player of the old school, and Master Dragonetti was worthy advocated in the speeches. At the Concert, prior to the banquet, Beethoven's C Minor Symphony and Mozart's "Idomeno" overture were played, and Herr Engels executed one of Spohr's Violin Concertos; but the most curious piece was Beethoven's Grand Sonata in G sharp, arranged for full orchestra by Herr Ess, the conductor of the Society

The six Concerts of Liszt, the pianist in Vienna, have been highly successful. He was enthusiastically received, and the Emperor of Austria has presented him with a diamond ring.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"W."—The positions are deficient in constructive power, and the board unnecessarily crowded with pieces. Try your hand at some of a less complex description.

"Horsham." Derby.—The diagrams accompanying your note were overlooked last week. Upon referring to them, we find that, in 77, mate may be accomplished in one move. There must, therefore, be some clerical or typographical error in the position of the pawn. In that numbered "18," we agree with you that there is a fine, and that the mate cannot possibly be given in so few as three moves.

"Apodidraskus."—The positions in question, if published at all in this paper, must have appeared prior to the present management of the Chess department. We have no knowledge of them, and for the sake of the gratuitous information.

(a) Mr. Staunton's want of practice in over games for the last two or three years, places him at an immense disadvantage in those openings with a player so thoroughly versed and practised in them as Mr Horwitz. OLD FISH SHOP, TEMPLE BAR.—(SEE PRECEDING PAGE.)

men employed there to have an eye upon such matters as may occur among the rubbish; things which, but for a little scrutiny, might be dismissed as mere shards or worthless crockery. For this has been the site of habitations since the days of King Ethelred, and a Saxon pipkin is not a thing to be overlooked with contempt, even if it happen not to be filled with gold and silver coins. ZIGZAG THE ELDER.

THE LISBOA PLATE.

This superb group, of highly characteristic design, has been admirably executed in silver, by Messrs. Hunt and Roskell, for presentation to M. Lisboa, the Brazilian Envoy to Great Britain.

It consists of candelabra for nine lights, upon a triangular plinth of burnished silver, supported by three Wyverns, the symbol of the House of Braganza. Between, and above them, are festoons of the cotton plant; and upon the three panels or faces of the plinth, are the dedicatory inscription, the arms of M. Lisboa, and the arms of Brazil. The stem of the candelabra is entwined with the tobacco and coffee plants; and around it are three figures: a Negro, with a sugar-cane; a Peruguese, with a lasso for taking wild horses; and one of the Mongolian race, with a rake, bowl, &c., used in washing for gold. Surmounting the candelabra is a figure of Commerce, murally crowned; emblematic of the trade carried on between the Brazils and civilised nations. The height of the entire group and pedestal is 48 inches.

MODEL LODGING-HOUSES.

It is curious to observe what various impressions different persons are apt to receive from the progress of the improvements of our Metropolis. The visitor to the great town, at this gay season of the year, rejoices in the widening of streets and the cleansing of roadways, for personal convenience. Another, by aid of the last published map, and the recollection of paragraphs in the newspapers, picks out the lines of new streets in progress, and is almost lost in self-glorification at the sweeping away of so many vile courts and alleys—"rookeries" of vice and crime—to make room for architectural displays of sumptuous character, though intended only for commercial purposes. Then, perchance, arise reflections of the vast sums of money expended in these improvements, calculations as to their investment for profit, and other speculations of a mercenary class.

It has, probably, occurred to few such observers to inquire what has become of the poor persons who have become unhoused by these great changes? On the other hand, it appears to have suggested to an excellent Association, "The Society for Improving the Condition of the Labouring Classes," a very interesting experiment, in building a certain number of houses as models of the different kinds of dwellings which they would recommend for the industrious classes in populous towns. For this purpose, they have taken, on reasonable terms, an eligible plot of land, on the estate of Lord Calthorpe, and thereon they have erected a model street. In the arrangement of the buildings, the object has been to combine every point essential to the health, comfort, and moral habits of the inmates; reference being had to the recommendations of the Health of Towns Commission, particularly with respect to ventilation, drainage, and an ample supply of water.

The Committee of the Society, in a circular of recent date, show the importance of their design, by reference to the exceedingly bad, and exorbitantly dear accommodation provided for the poor, in houses let out in lodgings. The lower-priced apartments are, for the most part, positively unwholesome, from the want of drainage and ventilation, and frequently from positive dampness and exposure to the weather. The rent usually demanded in such unhealthy situations, is from three shillings to six shillings for a single room, weekly—a price which usually compels the mechanic to be content with one—in which parents and children, boys and girls not only dwell during the day, but sleep during the night. So common is this practice, that in the closest contiguity to some of the principal streets of the metropolis are courts and lanes, the houses of which are filled with mechanics six, eight, or even ten, of whom sleep in one room nightly!

It is obvious that such a state of things is equally destructive to health and to morals. Hence the Committee of the Society have been induced to make this experiment, and have, accordingly, built a double row of small houses, divided as follows:

Nine houses of three rooms each, let at 6s
Fourteen houses of two rooms each, let at 3s. 6d.
One house, containing 30 rooms, for widows or single women, to be let at 1s. 6d. per week each.

Of these houses, one half have been occupied since the month of July last; and the other portion has just been completed. The Committee, being desirous of submitting this their first attempt, to the judgment of the public, invited them to view the buildings; and the interest excited by the subject has been abundantly proved by the large number of persons of high rank and distinguished character who have visited the spot, during the week of "public view." In the list, we find the Marquis Cholmondeley, the Marchioness Dowager of Westminster, Earl Fortescue; Viscounts Ebrington, Morpeth, Fielding, and Strangford; Lords H. Cholmondeley, Robert Grosvenor, John Manners; Ladies Goldsmid, Raffles, Harry Inglis, and Hamilton; the Bishops of London and Chester; several of the metropolitan clergy; and other distinguished persons. The result has been such unqualified approval of the design as, we trust, will induce the Committee to commence their projected work of the same kind, in the very heart of St. Giles's.

The following are the details of the annexed plan:—

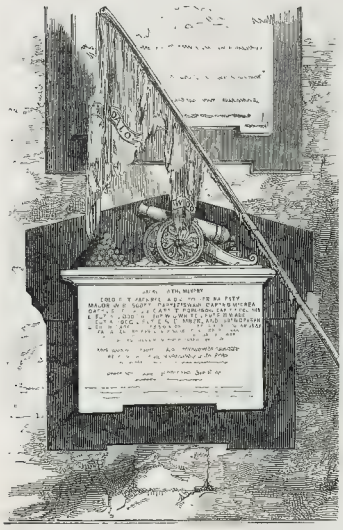
The six houses, Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5, 10, and 11, are intended for the residence of twelve families, each occupying a floor with two rooms; the larger 13ft. by 10ft., the smaller 10ft. 6in. by 7ft. 6in. All requisite conveniences are provided separately for each family, with distinct access to the upper floor.

The eight houses, Nos. 6, 7, 8, 9, 12, 13, 14, and 15, are intended for the residence of eight families, each having on the ground-floor a living-room, 13ft. 6in. by 12ft. 6in., with a lobby, enclosed recess for beds, closets, and a scullery under stairs, with a small court yard: the upper floor, as shown by Nos. 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15, is divided into two bed-rooms; the larger 12ft. 6in. by 10ft. 6in., the smaller 13ft. by 7ft. 6in.

The house, No. 3, is intended for the residence of thirty widows or aged females, each having a room, 12ft. 6in. by 8ft. 6in., approached by a corridor, to be lighted and ventilated in the centre and at both ends. A sunk wash-house, for the use of the inmates of this house, is provided at the back of No. 4, and one adjoining it, for the occasional use of the other tenants.

Additional houses to accommodate three families have been built on the east side of the ground, towards the entrance, which are not shown on the plan.

THE AFFGHAN MASSACRE.



TABLET TO THE MEMORY OF THE 44TH REGIMENT, IN ALVERSTOKE CHURCH, NEAR GOSPORT.

To die upon the battle-field
Where neither foe will shrink or yield,
Till one, the favorite of Death,
Resigns his lingering, struggling breath!
Thus this were glory! but to be
Assail'd by triple enemy
Of climate, want, and treachery;
Oh! 'tis enough to chill a Hero's fire,
And make him coldly—cowardly expire!
But no! they did not thus—the Brave
Who sleep within a far-off grave,
In time of need left desolate,
By Man not conquer'd, but by Fate—
With sword in hand they stood they fell!
Oh! who that dreadful hour can tell
When Life, to accident a prey,
Bids farewell ever to the Day,
And plunges in Death's dreary Night,
Without one parting blessing's light
Of mother—sister—father—friend,
Or dearer one, to kindly lend
The lamp of Hope, to dying eyes,
And bid them close their memories
For brighter visions in the skies,
Where in communion once again
For aye they'll blissfully remain!
Alas! no tender rites like these
Assuag'd their bitter destinies
With heart-strings torn they sank to rest
But "by their country's wishes blest"
They'll live remember'd ever here:
Fiery shall weep as warm a tear
Upon this empty tomb, as though
Their dust were consecrate below.
The flag that like a willow waves
Above their monumental graves,
Shall yet to unborn ages tell
How heroes fought—how heroes fell! W.

The annexed handsome Tablet has been erected in Alverstoke Church, near Gosport, to the memory of the soldiers of the 44th Regiment who fell in the Affghan war. Above hang the colours of that ill-fated regiment. The following is the inscription:—

Sacred to the memory of Colonel T. Mackrell, A.D.C. to her Majesty; Major W. B. Scott, Captain T. Swaine, Captain R. B. M'Crea, Captain F. B. Leighton, Captain T. Robinson, Captain F. C. Collins, Lieutenant W. H. Dodgin, Lieutenant W. G. White, Lieutenant W. G. Wade, Lieutenant H. Cadett, Lieutenant S. Swinton, Lieutenant F. J. C Fortye, Lieutenant A. W. Grey, Paymaster T. Bourke, Lieutenant and Quartermaster R. B. Haldan, Surgeon J. Harcourt, Assistant Surgeons W. Balfour and W. Primrose, and 645 non-commissioned officers and soldiers of the 44th Regiment, who fell upon the field of battle in the disastrous Affghan war of 1841 and 1842. They sank with arms in their hands, unconquered, but overpowered by the united horrors of climate, treachery, and barbarous warfare; their colours saved by Captain J. Souter, one of the few survivors, hang above this stone, which is erected to their memory by the officers of the 44th Regiment.—June, 1844

"And if Thy people Israel be put to the worse before the enemy, because they have sinned against Thee, and shall return and confess Thy name, and pray and make supplication before Thee in this house, then hear Thou from the Heavens, and forgive the sins of Thy people Israel." 2 Chronicles, vi. 24, 25.

The name of the sculptor affixed is "Bacon Manning, London" In the design the gun placed on the monument has been objected to, and naturally so, at first sight, as appropriate for an artillery regiment, but not for a foot; whereas, it is so placed to represent the last gun belonging to the regiment—a six-pounder mountain gun, in the defence of which the greater part of the men fell.

Although only one set of colours has been placed here, the other was not taken by the enemy: it was torn (the Queen's colours) from the staff by a non-commissioned officer, who wrapped it around him, but who is supposed to have perished in the field or by the cold.

The only reasons assignable for the above tablet being placed in this church are the new 44th having been raised here, or that the churchyard is the resting-place of the body of the father of the Colonel, who was a Captain in the same regiment.

Captain Thomas Mackrell (the father) was a labouring man, and enlisted at Twyford, in Hampshire, under singular circumstances. One day, while working in a field, he heard some one call to him, "What are you slaving there for; why don't you come with us?" He turned round, and saw it was a recruiting party; he, accordingly, left his work and followed them. When a corporal, with the regiment at Freshwater, in the Isle of Wight, he related that he was born in a barn. He went as Sergeant-Major with Sir Ralph Abercrombie to Egypt; there his wife went into the field with him, and they fought back to back—she using the musket. He was then presented with an Ensign's commission, and rose by his own merit.

The following is related as the cause of his retirement. He and his son were both Captains in the 44th; in the war time there were two battalions—1st and 2nd: the son was appointed to the 1st, the father to the 2nd. This being done, he retired; and, being asked why he had done so, he replied, "It was hardly right the son should be above the father."

MDLLE. SANCHIOLI, AS "ABIGAIL," IN THE OPERA OF "NINO," AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

WORSLEY HALL.

This noble edifice has just been completed for the residence of Lord Francis Egerton, M.P. It is finely situate about six miles north-west of Manchester; commanding a most extensive view of the flat country known as Chat Moss; whilst in the middle distance are seen the Bridgewater Canal and the Liverpool and Manchester Railway; the view terminating with the woodlands of Cheshire.

The building of the mansion (of fine stone) was commenced in 1840, from the design of Mr. Edward Blore. It is of the latter period of the Elizabethan style, with an admixture of "the Revival." It is, consequently, highly enriched throughout; and its embellished chimney-shafts and gables, with the balustraded terrace-garden, render it a fine architectural group in the prospect. To quote an old writer, is is "the proper house and home" of a munificent patron of the arts, such as the noble owner of this splendid pile has ever proved himself.

Mr. Blore, the architect of this new mansion, is, at present, building a church, of handsome design, in the vicinity of Worsley.

WORSLEY HALL, THE NEW SEAT OF LORD FRANCIS EGERTON, M.P.

MDLLE. SANCHIOLI.

The débût, at Her Majesty's Theatre, of the young artist with whose portrait we this day present our readers, is to lovers of music an object of interest, independent of that which is usually attached to any lyrical novelty. She belongs to a new school of Italian theatrical music—that school of which, as regards composition, Verdi is the head, while the prima donna Frezzolini is, perhaps, in all respects its most competent representative on the stage, and our new soprano presents us with a type of its chief attributes. Dramatic passion and energy—a severer simplicity of style than that so lately fashionable amongst Italian artists are imperatively required for those who would excel in the Young Italy of Song, and those qualifications Sanchioli possesses in no common degree. To please the ear, without addressing the mind or feelings, is, by the purer taste which now begins to gain ground in the musical world, left to other departments of the art: lyrical music must become the tangible expression of a sentiment or an idea; and it is on this account that the compositions of the new school have attained such supremacy, and threaten to banish the other styles of theatrical art.

The Conservatoire of Milan is the most favoured nursery of this school. There the voices of young artists, like Corbari, just issued from thence, are trained, strengthened, and improved; while the more tonic atmosphere of Milan appears to be more favourable to the acquirement of energy of style and dramatic power than Naples, where the Conservatoire is daily falling into disrepute, despite the exertions of Mercadante and Crescentini, and the fact that the first singer of the hour, Labadie, and one of its first dancers, Cerito, were sent forth from thence. It was, however, at Naples that Sanchioli appeared after her first engagement at Rome, where she was heard and judged previous to the sole imprimatur of Her Majesty's Theatre. These are the only two theatres at which she has appeared before her arrival here, therefore she is truly a novel acquisition to the lyrical stage.

Mdlle. Sanchioli is a lady by birth and education. She is the daughter of a physician, who spared no expense or pains to cultivate her natural gifts—not only as regards music, for we learn the ultimate destination of her parents was not at first thought of—but as regards the powers of the mind, which have been well developed, and now will no doubt assist her in her theatrical career. The few facts we have mentioned are the most interesting passages in Sanchioli's life. The career of an artist is truly full of interest, but it would require more space than we could afford to bestow on this subject, to make the "filling up" of a life which has no doubt been chequered, even though as little advanced in years, not only with the "his that flesh is heir to," but the peculiar hopes and fears, adverse and prosperous circumstances, of this arduous and anxious profession.

Mdlle Sanchioli is twenty-five years of age; she is of the middle height, and though not handsome, her countenance has that fire and intelligence perhaps still more essential than beauty to dramatic effect. We have already mentioned her impassioned acting. Besides this she never fails to please by her ease and slowly, and prima have been with difficulty supported. In oats, owing to the limited arrivals from Ireland, a full average business has been doing, at late rates. Beans, peas, and flour dull, but not lower Anglesea.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 48s to 48s; ditto, white, 5s to 67s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 46s to 56s; ditto, white, 52s to 64s; rye, 31s to 32s; grinding barley, 22s to 23s; malting, 25s to 28s; malting ditto, 32s to 34s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 51s to 52s; brown ditto, 44s to 46s; Kingston and Ware, 54s to 56s; Chevalier, 56s to 58s; Scotch and Lincolnshire feed oats, 22s to 25s; potato ditto, 26s to 30s; Youghal and Cork, black, 21s to 24s; ditto, white, 25s to 27s; tick beans, new, 30s to 32s; old, 34s to 36s; Harlings, new, 32s to 34s; maple, 32s to 35s; white 36s to 38s; boilers, 39s to 42s, per quarter. Town-made flour, 47s to 48s. Suffolk, 44s to 45s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 37s to 39s, per sack. Wheat, 10s 6d to 11s 6d; barley, 6s to 6s 6d; oats, 5s to 5s 6d; beans, 6s to 6s 6d; peas, 6s 6d. Arrivals from Ireland, 1,140 qrs. wheat, —s to —s; ditto, flour, —s to —s; barley, —s to —s; beans, —s to —s, per quarter. Flour, Arrivals, 20s to 30s, Baltic, 28s to —s per sack.

The Seed Market.—Both red and white clover have been in steady request at full prices. In all other kinds of seeds, as well as cakes, exceedingly little is doing.

Linseed, English, sowing 56s to 57s; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 44s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 42s to 43s. Hempseed, 34s to 36s per quarter. Coriander, 11s to 13s per cwt. Carraway, Mustard-seed, 10s to 14s. white ditto 10s to 12s. Tares, 7s 6d to 8s 3d per bushel. English Rapeseed, £24 to £28 per last of 10 quarters. Linseed Cakes, English, £7 10s to £8 per ton; ditto foreign, £7 5s to £8 0s per 1000. Rapeseed cakes, £5 5s to £6 5s per ton. Canary, 54s to 64s per quarter. English Clover-seed, red, 30s to 38s; ditto, new, 36s to 42s; white, 40s to 60s; extra, up to 66s. Foreign, red, 40s to 46s; extra, 50s; white, 56s to 62s. extra 72s per cwt

Bread. The prices of wheaten bread, in the metropolis, are from 8½d to 9d; of household ditto, 6½d to 8½ per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 55s 9d; barley, 30s 7d; oats, 22s 6d; rye, 34s 7d, beans, 34s 10d; peas 34s 2d

The Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 54s 11d; barley, 29s 10d; oats, 21s 11d; rye, 34s 9d; beans, 34s 8d; peas, 34s 6d.

Tea.—Privately, a steady demand has prevailed for most kinds of tea, and prices have been well supported. At auction, on Thursday, 4,320 packages were offered at public sale; but only a small quantity was disposed of, at barely previous quotations

Sugar.—West India sugar has met a very slow inquiry this week, and prices have declined 6d per cwt. Several large parcels of Mauritius and Bengals have changed hands on speculation, and the rates have fallen 6d per cwt. Most other kinds of raw sugar are a slow inquiry. Refined goods are rather cheaper. Grocers' lumps selling at 63s to 63s 6d, and standard ditto at 62s 6d to 63s per cwt. English refined yellow, at 54s 6d.

Coffee.—West India moved off slowly, at late rates, but Mocha continues to may be purchased on somewhat easier terms. All other kinds of coffee are very quiet

Rice. Bengal is heavy, and may be purchased on somewhat easier terms. Cleaned rice

Spices. [illegible] prices are unaltered. Pepper is quiet, at 4½d to 5d per lb for Sumatra, and 5½d to 6d for Penang. Cassia lignea, prices are nominally unchanged. Cloves, 3s 3d to 3s 4d per lb. Cassia buds, 1s 6d per lb. Nutmegs, 2s 6d to 2s 8d per lb. Ginger, 1s 6d to 1s 8d per cwt. Jamaica, fine, 1s 6d to 1s 8d; ordinary, 1s 4d to 1s 5d; Cochin, 1s 3d to 1s 4d; Bengal, 1s 2d to 1s 3d; Barbadoes, 1s 4d to 1s 5d per cwt.

Oils.—Linseed oil is steady, at 34s 6d to 35s on the spot. Rape dull, and somewhat lower. In other kinds of oil, very little is doing

Coals.—Hartley, 15s; Holywell Main, 15s; Original Tanfield, 12s 6d; Tanfield Moor, 15s 6d; Hilda, 15s; Hetton, 15s 9d, Lambton, 16s 3d; and Hartley, 15s per ton

Hops and Stereos.—Monday, Aug. 23 3s to 3s 6d; Sept. 3s 6d to 4s; Saturday, £1 12s to £1 15s: wheat straw, £1 14s to £1 16s per load

Hops.—Ten parcels of hops are coming to hand, and a dry sale, at full prices In all other kinds, [illegible] rably good, exceedingly little is doing, and the quotations are with

Potatoes.—[illegible] wood is very dull, and somewhat lower; while foreign and colonial qualities command very little attention.

Potatoes.—The arrivals of potatoes exceeding the wants of the dealers, the trade is very dull, and prices are still drooping

Smithfield Friday.—For the time of year the supply of beasts on sale here to day was moderately extensive, owing to which the beef trade ruled dull, and Monday's prices were with difficulty supported. There were in the market from Scotland, 200 from Norfolk, and 200 together with 40 sheep, from Holland. The number of sheep was small, hence the mutton trade was dull, at previous rates were scarcely maintained. This being the great lamb market the supply of that description of stock was good, though not equal to that at some previous corresponding periods of the year. The veal trade was steady, at an advance in the quotations of 2d to 4d per 8lb. From the Isle of Wight 273 lambs came to hand. Calves moved off steadily, at an improvement of 2d per 8 lbs. In pigs and milch cows very little was done.

Per 8lb, to sink the offal.—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; second quality ditto, 2s 8d to 3s 0d; prime large oxen, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime Scots, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 10d to 4s 2d; second quality ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 6d; prime coarse-woolled ditto, 4s 8d to 5s; prime Southdown ditto, 5s 2d to 5s 4d; large coarse calves, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime small ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 6d; large hogs, 3s 2d to 3s 4d. neat small porkers, 4s 6d to 4s 8d; lambs, 5s 6d to 6s 6d. Suckling calves, 24s to 30s; quarter old store pigs, 16s to 20s each. Beasts, 840; cows, 120; sheep and lambs, 4930; calves, 170; pigs, 268.

Newgate and Leadenhall Fridays.—Lambs sold steadily, at rather higher rates. Otherwise the demand was in a sluggish stat

Per 8lb, to sink the carcase.—Inferior beef, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; middling ditto, 2s 8d to 3s 0d; prime large ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 2d; prime small ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; large pork, 3s 4d to 4s 0d; small ditto, 3s 8d to 4s 4d; middling ditto, 4s 10d to 4s 8d; prime ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 8d; small pork, 4s 6d to 4s 8d; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 8d; lamb, 5s 2d to 6s 8d.

The sale being a holiday, there was no business transacted at Mark-lane, or in the Borough

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Corr-spondent.)

The English Market has exhibited considerable depression during the week. The state of the Revenue, and the general stagnation of all description of commercial affairs, begin to excite apprehensions of a gloomy character. The provincial failures was announced on Wednesday, which is only one added to those which have so rapidly followed each other, and will doubtless bring more in its train. The dividends were in course of payment at all the banking houses, and not produce the customary Advance in prices. Consols opened on Monday at 89¾, and have scarcely varied, closing at that price for money and time. Exchequer Bills have slightly rallied, closing at 24 to 26. Bank Stock has attained a turn on Thursday, quoting 206¾ ex div. New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents are 97 ¼ reduced, 99¾ ⅛ India, 261½ India Bonds, 2?

The Foreign Market has been nearly inanimate, and business confined to the most limited transactions. Brazilian closed on Monday at 80½ ex div. Mexican quotation is 80¾. Danish has been, and remains about 87½. Mexican, on Monday, was 29¾, at which price it remains. Spanish Five per Cents have fluctuated between 25¾ and 24¾. The latter depressed price is the result of the intrigues discovered by Narvaez against his proposed Ministry, coupled with the probability of a general insurrection. The Three per Cents close at 30¾ for account Portuguese Five per Cents are 81; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 59¾: Four per Cent. Certificates, 92¾, ex dividend.

There has been no improvement in the Share Market, notwithstanding the intentions of Government to interfere in favour of winding up such Companies as afford good evidence of the majority of the scrip holders being disinclined to proceed. A mass of valuable suggestions are in progress of arrangement, to ass.st the Board of Trade in deciding firmly, but fairly, upon what principle the bill had better be framed. Until this is known, no great alteration in any description of Railway Shares can be anticipated. In the meantime, heavy sales, on account of the provincial markets, continue to depress things here, as the following list of closing prices will demonstrate:—Bristol and Exeter, New, ¼ Caledonian, 7¼; Ditto, Half Shares, ¼; Ditto Extension, ¼; Chester and Holyhead, 17¼; Chester and Manchester, ½; Ditto Cornwall and Central Devon, ¼; Direct Manchester (Rastrick's), ¾; Direct Northern, ¼; Dublin and Belfast Junction, ¼; Dublin and Galway, ¼; [illegible] Ditto, 21¾; Ditto New, ¾ pm.; Ditto, Perpet., ¾ Cent., —; Ditto York Extension, ¼; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 72; Goole, Doncaster, and Sheffield, 8c., ¼ dis; Grand Union (Nottingham and Lynn), ¼; Great North of England, 210; Great Western Quarter Shares, 16¾; Ditto, Fifths, 3¼; Guilford, Farnham, and Portsmouth, ¾; Hull and Selby, 101; Ditto, Half Shares, 24; Leicester and Bedford, ¼ dis.; Liverp. and Leeds Direct, 2¾; London and Birmingham, 223; Ditto, Thirds, 6¼; Ditto, Quarters, 2?; London and Brighton, 62¾ Ditto ditto, Fifths, 2?¼; London and Croydon, 21¼; London and South-Western, 76¾; [illegible] ons, 50¾; London and York, 14; London, Warwick, and Kidderminster, ¼; London, Salisbury, and Yeovil, 1; Londonderry and Coleraine, 4; Lynn and Ely, 7, Manchester and Leeds, 190; Ditto Half Shares, 54¾; Ditto, Quarters, 19; Manchester and Birmingham, 75¾; Ditto Quarter Shares (B), 9; Ditto, Quarter Shares (C), 7; Manchester, Bolton, and Bury, ¼ dis; Midland, Half Shares, Ditto, Fifths, 1¼; Ditto, New, 29; Midland Great Western (Irish), 2½; Newcastle and Darlington Junction, 43; Ditto, New, 7?; Newcastle and Berwick, 17¼; Newark, Sheffield, and Manchester, ¼ dis; Ditto, 24¼; Ditto, Half Shares, 8; Ditto, Carlisle Extension, 1¾; Northern and Eastern, 57; Ditto Scrip (issued at 5 dis.), 5½; North Kent and Direct Dover, 1¼; North Staffordshire, 2 pm.; Norwich and Brandon, New, 2; Nottingham, Leicester, and Silverstone, 3¼; Oxford and Inverness, 1¾; Portsmouth Direct, 1½; Rugby and Huntingdon, 1; Scottish Central, 13¾; Shrewsbury and Birmingham, ¼; Shrewsbury & Hereford, 1¼; South Eastern and Dover, 24; Manchester, Buxton, &c. at £33, 1¾; Do. ROMAN VILLA DISCOVERED NEAR OXFORD.

The last published Number of the Archæological Journal (8) contains a very interesting Notice of the discovery of a Roman Villa, at Wheatley, near ROMAN VILLA: CISTERN FOR BATH.

Oxford, a short time since. We are aware that the circumstance has already been recorded in the newspapers; but, we believe the present to be the first accredited professional, or rather antiquarian account, of this valuable illustration of the Roman colonization of Britain.

The Archæological Journal, it may be as well to state, is published quarterly, under the direction of the Central Committee of the Archæological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland, for the encouragement and prosecution of Researches into the Arts and Monuments of the Early and Middle Ages; and, if proof were wanting of the well-directed energies of the Association, we might find it, generally, in the excellent Number (8) of the Society's Journal; but especially in this discovery of the Roman Villa near Oxford, corrective of the first account,—copious in its details, and most satisfactorily illustrated with clever engravings.

We rejoice at this valuable contribution to our Anglo-Roman history; and we trust that this and similar illustrations of our early civilisation will not fail to impress upon the Directors of what is somewhat anomalously termed "the British Museum," the necessity of providing a department for the reception of British Antiquities; in which, by the way, our great national Museum is singularly deficient. Rich, almost beyond comparison, in the art-treasures of Egypt, Greece, and Rome, we in vain seek in its saloons such an assemblage of objects as shall educate the public eye in the artistical progression of this great country, or shall show its advancement in art—from the rude Celtic heap of stones to the classical combinations of the exhaustless genius of Sir Christopher Wren. "The architecture of a people," says a popular writer, "is an important part of their history. It is the external and enduring form of their public life; it is an index of the state of knowledge and social progress."

If the above augmentation of the "British" Museum be carried out, it will be one of the good results of the formation of the Archæological Institute, and similar Associations, which, by encouraging antiquarian pursuits amongst those accustomed to a life of leisure, has caused them better to appreciate the good policy of extending to the people these scenes of recreative intellectuality.

Returning to the Journal, we find that the first indications of a Roman Villa having been discovered in a field called Castle Hill, between Wheatley and Cuddesdon, near Oxford, Dr. Bromet proceeded thither on the 31st of October last, accompanied by Mr. J. H. Parker, of Oxford; with a draughtsman, to investigate the remains. We quote a portion of the results:

"Having first laid bare some rough walling, 2 feet thick, which enclosed a quadrangular space, measuring internally 14 feet by 12, they, by careful digging, exposed the inner face of the western wall, where, at a depth of 3 feet from the surface, they arrived at an ovolo base moulding, and a plaster floor 2½ to 3 inches thick, composed of lime, sand, and broken brick. It was situated over the entrance to a furnace from the præfurnium described hereafter.

On clearing away the earth in the north-east angle, they found that this floor had been laid on solid flat tiles 2 ft. square by 2½ in. thick, the whole being supported by uniform and regularly disposed pillars, about 1 foot 10 inches high, built up of flat tiles 7 inches square by 1¼ thick, set in beds of mortar ⅝ of an inch thick.

The lowest, or plinth tiles, being about 11 inches square, and laid on a natural bed of yellow sand. These pillars were distant from each other about 16 or 18 inches, but the upper portions of the intervals were filled with earth, and the lower part with a stratum, about 6 inches thick, of soot and ashes, lying on the sand-bed before mentioned, under which they feared to dig, lest they might injure the stability of the pillars. Here and there, among the earth between these pillars (earth which had probably been laid there soon after the demolition of the villa), were found fragments of coarse pottery, and pieces of stucco, painted red, yellow, green, and black, but not sufficiently large to show their patterns. The greater number of the lines on the stucco are straight, the others are curved and waved.

"The fire-place which was used for heating this hypocaust is an opening from the præfurnium through the western wall, about 3 feet high, built of brick, and covered with large 2 feet square tiles like those before noticed, placed on different levels, the highest being outermost. Under this cover, were found coarse ashes and many bits of charred wood.

"Adjoining to the south-eastern part of the caldarium (the chamber above the hypocaust), but lower than its floor, is a rectangular enclosure, 8 feet by 4, which was, no doubt, a bath, its waste-water gutter still remaining in the eastern wall. This gutter was formed of two concave tiles, one within the other, set firmly in cement, so as to render it efficient.

"About 116 feet further north, they uncovered the south-western angle of another portion of the villa; but nothing was found there except a few fragments of fine pottery, and the foundations of other walls. Several tiles of various forms were likewise found. Remains of instruments and nails of iron, and several bones of oxen, deer, sheep, and hogs, were also found, with the shells of common garden-snails, helix asperes, which were probably eaten, like the helix pomatia; and oyster-shells, like those found at many Roman stations in the centre of England, e. g., in a Roman camp near Northampton, and a Roman station at Aldworth, near Wallingford.

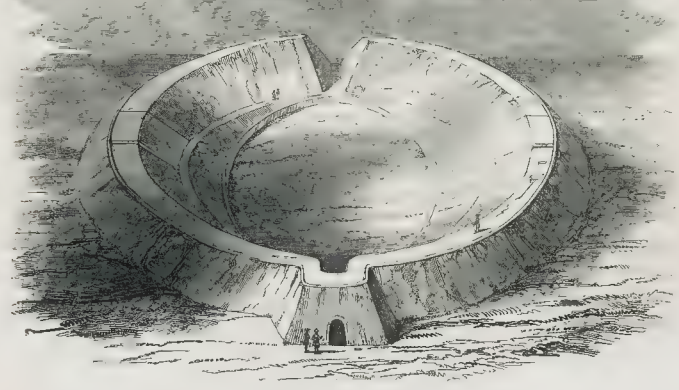
"In the space between the hypocaust and another room, since discovered, 29 feet north of it, another stratum of 'sooty matter' was found, at the same depth, as in the hypocaust, resting upon the 'natural sand bed,' whence we infer that the villa was destroyed by fire.

"The excavations were continued by the Bishop of Oxford, with Dr. Buckland and Mr. Parker, on a subsequent day, when a cistern or boiler (measuring 4½ feet by 2½) was found over the south-west angle of the hypocaust. This boiler or cistern had the lower part of its floor and some height of the sides perfect, with the same moulding at the angle as the one first discovered. It was lined inside with fine stucco or plaster, 1½ inch thick, and outside this were 2 inches of mortar. It rested on large tiles, like those before mentioned, supported by pillars of smaller tiles, similar to those before described, but not at such regular intervals. Further heat from the furnace was communicated to this boiler by rows of vertical fine-tiles or pipes, behind the stucco of its sides: these are quadrangular, and measure 8 inches by 3½; they are smooth and blackened with soot in the inside, but scored on the outside to make them adhere to the mortar. Many of these are entire, and remain in situ. On the south side a leaden pipe, quite perfect, passes from the bottom of this cistern, through the outer wall. This pipe probably conducted the hot water to the bath at the east end of the caldarium. The boiler had its stucco lining more perfect than the bath at the south-east end of the hypocaust."

We are happy to learn that the remains have been protected by a building.

The site of the Villa is about 10 furlongs from the Roman road between Asha Castra (Bicester) and Dorocina (Dorchester). The bath and hypocaust show it to have been a luxurious mansion, which was, probably, burnt on the retreat of the Romans. Among the fragments of pottery and tiles, Dr. Buckland recognised several pieces of black cellular lava, containing, in some of its cells, small crystals of the blue mineral Haüyne: these must have come from the mill-stone quarries near Andernach, from which large mill-stones are now sent to England and all parts of the world; and from whence, also, the Romans might have brought their mill-stones (probably hand-mills) to the villa at Wheatley.

We have left ourselves but little space to speak of the other articles in the Journal: the proceedings of the Committee form a very attractive report. The number throughout is most profusely illustrated with wood-cuts, alike distinguished by their spirit and fidelity; and its production is as honourable to the Committee of the Institute as it must prove satisfactory to the subscribers.



ROMAN AMPHITHEATRE, NEAR DORCHESTER.—(SEE PRECEDING PAGE.)

THE VESICA PISCIS OF THE EARLY CHRISTIANS.—Professor Cockerell, in a lecture recently delivered at the Royal Academy, gave it as his opinion that the origin of the Vesica Piscis is greatly misunderstood, and that it was invented solely for the geometrical purpose of erecting a perpendicular upon a straight line. Although this reasoning taken per se may appear plausible, it is in variance with a great amount of argument on the other side. The occurrence of the form as a symbol in the earliest ages of the church, its constant recurrence in places where it had evidently a symbolic meaning, and a want of accordance in the motive and use of the Vesica, inclosing the figure, and that which was drawn at the feet, lead us to retain the old opinion, viz., that the fish was the ancient symbol of Christ, and that the letters of its Greek name were those which were afterwards abbreviated to I.H.S.—The Builder.

SPAIN.

FROM every successive change in the Government of Spain, men are compelled more and more to wonder who is the real ruler of that country. The political affairs of the Escurial seem a mighty maze, but we hardly believe they are quite without a plan, though the clue is hard to find. Minister after Minister falls; a Government that lasts over a year is a phenomenon; recently, the existence of Cabinets has been counted by days. But Narvaez had held the reins long enough to produce the impression that in him Spain had found a ruler. Now he, too, has fallen, and has followed his predecessor, Espartero, in the path of Exile. The man of energy and action has fared little better than the idler, whose adherence to constitutional forms was as much the result of indifference and dislike of change as honest or determined approval. Narvaez had a soldier's contempt for Constitutions and Charters; but he worked, he acted; he organised the army, established something like police, and took a few steps towards casting out the devils of neglect and sloth that possess the whole system of Spanish Government.

How is it that two men, so different in character, have met so identical a destiny? They both ceased to do the work of that secret influence that surrounds the throne of Spain, and have fallen a sacrifice to that refusal. Then comes the question, "What is that influence?" Whatever it may be, it is evidently the real Government of Spain, for it crushes all attempts to control it, either through the forms of the Constitution, as attempted, for some time successfully, by Espartero, or by the strong hand and the power of the army, as by Narvaez. That all this breaking down and setting up of Ministers is the work of the individual mind of Christina we do not believe: she is rather the instrument than the power: all that can be called her own in her career is her shameless profligacy, her avarice, and hypocrisy. Still less is the source of change to be sought in the will of Isabella, her daughter, who is said to inherit all the stupidity and animal grossness of the Spanish Bourbons, without the passionate quickness of the Neapolitan blood. The greatest object of the contemplations of the Queen of Spain is said to be her dinner and bon bons. Whose, then, is the influence that destroys so completely, so suddenly and effectually, the political power of such men as Narvaez and Espartero? The masterical power of such men as Narvaez and Espartero? The master-cal power of such men as Narvaez and Espartero? The master-cal power of such men as Narvaez and Espartero? The master-cal

'Twere long to tell, and sad to trace,
Each step from grandeur to disgrace.

The decay of the Aristocracy of Spain was not the work of sudden political convulsions; it was a slow, gradual, but constant rotting from within. The land has never been without a Monarch, and that from the most "legitimate" of races—the Bourbons. Joseph Bonaparte was only the military commandant of his brother Napoleon; for though he assumed the title of King, the nation never recognised him. Spain has never been revolutionised, like France; in all her changes she has not seen a Republic or a Democracy. Aristocratic birth has never there been made a crime, punished by exile and death without regard to the merits or demerits of the individual. The Spaniards, as a people, are proud of their Monarchy; by natural disposition they are not averse to an Aristocracy; the corruption and worthlessness of the class must be thorough and complete, when, in such a soil, it cannot maintain even the semblance of life and vigour. In the evil days of Monarchies, when the great oversetter of Thrones made Spain no exception to the rest of Europe, the men most ready to desert their King and sell the Crown to the invader were the Nobles. The privileged class was the weakest in its defence of the fountain of honour; the Crown and the independence of the nation were rescued by the peasantry, the bulk of the people, and an army of foreigners.

The history of Spain since that period records many changes, but none of them have raised the nobility either in power or credit; deeply is this to be regretted, for the existence of a wealthy and ruling class would be a benefit to the nation, if it could keep itself level with its age, and possessed an average amount of talent and knowledge. Energy of any kind is a good where all is blank inaction and paralysis; but camps and armies are, after all, if not the very worst, certainly far from the best school for the rulers of a people. The men of the sword mostly delight in the exhibition of strength rather than wisdom, and their sway, such as it is, is too personal; like all things that depend on individual qualities it passes away, leaving little or no impression behind. What nations want are systems and institutions, that may outlast the men who found them; laws that may survive their makers, founded upon the necessities that are almost universal.

The rule of the sword is a blessing compared with the miseries of anarchy; but something more than force is wanted as soon as the first essential of Government, a preponderating power, is restored. Then is felt the necessity of creating some system, possessing some innate force, to keep it working; for nations cannot be always ruled like regiments, and set going by word of command. This creation for Spain is yet to come; and we fear the day that will see it is yet far distant. Were it again divided, as of old, into several kingdoms, we believe the people would be better governed: the country is too great, the interests of the people too divided, for any but a very strong and very settled Government to have effectual control over them. And a Government either strong or settled is the last thing that can be hoped for. The Spaniards have not that spirit of nationality which makes the power of France, whatever may be the differences of language and interests among its population, "one and indivisible."

But, beyond the Pyrenees, all is disunion; the Royal title which makes the Sovereign, Monarch of "the Spains," is, most unfortunately characteristic of the people; they are provincials, who have not yet acquired the spirit that bends men into nations of common feelings and interest. The Andalusian, the Biscayan, and Castilian, are, in effect, men of different nations. A Government like that of Germany, with many centres of political power, would far better suit Spain than Germany. With a weak, changing, and almost bankrupt authority at Madrid, it is impossible that it can be either felt or respected as the centre of a vast country, where the means of communication are just as they were two centuries ago. Of what other kingdom of Europe can it be said that the bulk of its trade is in the hands of smugglers, and that the people buy and sell in defiance of the law?

The same inconsistencies run through everything in Spain. Laws have remained, but the power that enforced them is gone. titles are left, but the wealth and worth of the nobility have departed: immense dockyards are still to be seen, but there are no fleets, sailors, or workmen; immense charitable institutions survive, but their revenues are destroyed, perverted, or embezzled; the magnificent collegiate establishments of former times, have neither professors, learning, nor scholars; and in this most Catholic of all countries, the revenues of the Church have been seized as the property of the nation. All is decay, inaction, dilapidation: the people live in the ruins of a mighty monarchy, like the Arabs who pitch their tents among the pillars of Palmyra, shadowed still by a greatness they can scarcely comprehend, much less imitate. The history of Spain belongs to the past; we wish we had a better hope of a future.

We despair of Constitutions; the elements of political government seem wanting; absolutism in such a country as Spain would require the hand of a giant, and the race of great Kings is extinct. We must descend upon Ministers, and they pass like the shadowy kings in Banquo's glass; Espartero went long ago, and now Narvaez follows him. We confess we had hoped more from him, and see his fall with regret. He has done much, and might have yet effected more.

We must give to him what he deserves—credit for having opposed the unnatural marriage that will be forced upon the Queen, a mere puppet in the hands of her Mother and her Mother's advisers. The people of Spain seem to have taken no part in the displacement of Narvaez; if he had few attached friends, his vigour had certainly gained him many supporters: his departure from Madrid seems to have been a kind of ovation; he does not go unregretted or unbefriended.

The first consequence of his departure is the revival of what he had suspended; the Decree against the Press is annulled, and the Cortes with re-assemble. How long it will last is another matter; Spain is the last country in the world in which to indulge in predictions. The only thing certain is, that the unnatural and disgusting ambition of Christina is calculated to shock every feeling of decency, and bring Royalty itself into contempt; and it is remarkable enough to find that Legitimate Monarchy and Aristocracy, as institutions, should have received their most destructive blows in France and Spain, where both existed in their most complete predominance.

ABANDONMENT OF RAILWAYS.—The Southampton, Manchester, and Oxford Junction Railway Company will, on the 18th inst., pay the £2 12s. 6d. paid. The scheme has failed for the present, and the Directors will at once confer with their universal and shareholders. The Cornwall and Devon Central line is to be "wound up," and the deposits returned, less the legal and necessary expenses. A Committee has been appointed to carry out the resolution passed.

THE FEVER OF SPECULATION IN 1845. A lucky but interesting document has been published, in the form of a report from the Registrar-General of Joint-Stock Companies, of the number of such companies formed in 1845. The list consists of fifty-three pages, and contains the titles and specifications of 1520 schemes, the offspring of 1845, the majority being for railways, water-companies, banks, insurance, mines, and an immensity of other joint-stock corporations. The year opened with a mere handful, but as the days rolled on and the fever became denser, they doubled, trebled, and quintupled in quantity, until, in September, October, and November, at the same quickly increasing ratio, at the rate of from 100 to 200 and 300 a month, and an average in September—the most prolific of months—of from 16 to 46 each day, or 467 in the month, as will be seen by the following analysis of the return. In December, when the panic rang the reason of alarm, and the excitement was gradually subsiding, the characteric was 31. The following shows the number of projects registered each month, with the aggregate totals for the year:—In January, 64 in number registered were; in February, 36; in March, 25; April, 92; May, 81; June, 99; July, 91; August, 178; September, 237; October, 261; November, 86; December, 51. Total schemes registered from January to December, 1520.

PRESENT ERUPTION OF VESUVIUS.

(From a Correspondent.)

Naples, April 2, 1846.

Our giant of the old Elysian coast has, during the last six months, displayed considerable activity; and, within a few days, emitted a river of lava, unequalled since the grand eruption of 1839. Those who have visited the volcano since that period will remember its enormous amphitheatre of scorize, cinders, and stone, walled in by the cones. In the arena of which, from time to time, the lofty hills were thrown up, gradually filling the vast cup. The lava, finding no longer any cavity for its deposits, has burst its sulphurous barrier, and overflows with terrible fury, threatening the inhabitants of Resina and Portici.

I visited the volcano a few days since, with a party of friends. We ascended by the newly-cut road, which is now accessible for carriages, as far as the Hermitage, more than half way up the mountain, where an observatory has long been erected. The vast plain of amalgamated cinders immediately surrounding the cone is singularly interesting. A starved and sickly vegetation is seen, here and there, struggling between the masses of scorize, which, in barren wildness, spreads its broken and waved surface over an enormous space. I can compare it to nothing but a troubled sea suddenly petrified. As we walked over this desolate scene the ash-covered tread-wheels of the vetturi bounded on our ears like retiring artillery. The red fiery stream of lava has nearly reached the level plain above-mentioned, and continues to crawl slowly downward on the side facing old Somma, the mother mountain of the present volcano. On arriving at the top of the cone (see the Engraving) we neared a fiery fountain. The effect was terribly grand. A hill of liquid fire was raised in the centre of the exhausted cup of an old eruption, from whence the molten matter flowed in an awful, hot, and sulphurous stream. Occasionally large stones were thrown up into the air, amid a column of smoke, that curled in round masses up to the blue and boundless sky, forming the great source of shadow to two or three lesser gorges, emitting lava with a pale vapour. The broken edge of the cup, illuminated with a red glare, produced an effect which at once reminded us of Dante's Hell circle.

The view of Vesuvius from Naples, by moonlight, is now unusually interesting. Fire and smoke issuing from the beautifully formed mountain, is reflected in the water below, pending its waves with red light, and animating the solemn repose of the looming mass of Apennines.

It may not be uninteresting to give your readers the dates of Eruptions. Diodorus of Agyrium, an ancient Sicilian Greek, both mention the nature of the soil evidently very different from that which now presents itself to the eye, both speak of its sterility and "tormented fire." Pliny's letters give us the first account of an Eruption (79) in his well-known epistles, after which, sometimes meagrely, and record those of 203 or 4, 472, 512, 685, 993, 1036, 1049, 1139, 1306, 1500, 1631, 1660, 1682, 1694, 1701, 1704-8, 1712, 1737, 1751, 1754, 1760, 1765, 1770, 1779, 1790, 1794, 1804, 1810, 1813, 1820 to 22, 1831, 1834, 1839, and the present. Thus, we have thirty-four recorded Eruptions, when have, from time to time, wrought no small changes in the form of the mountain. As Sir William Hamilton observes, speaking of the Eruption of '31, "In a thousand men, working for a century, could not effect such an alteration as was produced by the hand of Nature in a few hours."

Speculations of the ultimate results of this Eruption may be futile: it is, however, generally supposed here that no grand display will take place like those which have occurred, when fire and smoke have been thrown up more than a mile into mid-air. The general conjecture is, that the mountain will exhaust its accumulated matter, as it is now doing, without further agitation. Hundreds of our countrymen have visited the scene, to the joy of cicerons and gendarmerie; in fact, the Eruption is looked on by all with much interest, excepting those who possess lands at the foot of the mountain, where:—

> The ripe vines' intertwisted boughs of long festoon
> Or woven wreath, all heavy with hanging grapes;
> The many-tinted leaves, with the fruit and with them,
> Fall down in showers half rose-colour and half gold—
> Down whom the vine-dresser, in fear and in haste,
> Pours into wains and baskets, grasso-shaped,
> With his red hands the Resinian-hot fruit.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

ARMY MOVEMENTS.—The 30th Regiment, on arrival in Dublin Garrison from Castlebar, is to be stationed in Ship-street Barracks. The 67th Regiment, in Limerick, has received a letter of readiness for Cork. The 85th Light Infantry, on landing at Cork this month, from Barbadoes, will, it is understood, move on to Limerick.

Mr. Paul Mr. Edward Lewis Lewis, who was recently tried at Winchester, and acquitted of all participation in the death of the late Mr. Seton, who fell in a duel, has been restored to his former rank in the Royal Marine Artillery, were principally in the civil department of the navy. He died a Vice-Admiral of the White.

OXFORD AND RUGBY RAILWAY. The first turf was turned at Cropedy, in the formation of the Oxford and Rugby Railway, on Wednesday (last week).

TAWELL'S CONFESSION. At the meeting of the Bucks magistrates in quarter session last week, a statement was received by the Clerk of the Peace from Tawell, calling on the chaplain, the Rev Mr. Cox, to give up the document handed him by Tawell just before his execution. Mr. Cox, who was in court just before the vote was taken, said, "I have made up my mind from the first that an earthly power shall extort from me that which was committed to my custody, let the consequences be what they may. I do not hesitate to say that, standing up in Aylesbury Gaol-yard, instead of the fourth, or fifth, or sixth hour, as explicated by him, I consulted to hold as private and confidential that which was committed to me. I did give that promise."

EARTHQUAKE IN MALTA. Letters from Malta announce that on Saturday, the 28th of March, at 1 45 p.m., an earthquake was felt in that island lasting about a second, which, and of several seconds, and, after two minutes, another very violent shock, which was of longer duration. Several people were carried off their feet and fell, whilst others were attacked with vomiting and all the nausea of sea-sickness. Divers stone dwelling-houses, the archives of the Inquisition, and some out-houses, have suffered damage in their walls and foundations; and general panic and consternation prevailed throughout the night from apprehension of other shocks. Such an event has not been known at Malta since 1695. A mercurial regulator in a watchmaker's establishment stopped at the moment of the second shock, and some candlesticks on the high altar of St. Paul's Church were thrown down. In the night, lightning was perceptible in the direction of Mount Etna; but subsequent accounts from Catania only mention the shocks as having been felt there, without attributing the same to the volcano. At Mytelene and Smyrna shocks were felt on the 11th ult.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS

" C. L. P."—The opening diagram at page 101 of this month's "Chess Chronicle" is printed correctly, but the propounder has erred in the conditions: instead of "White to mate in two moves," it should be "White moves."

" Bon Mass," Paris. Too simple for any but very young players. Your first, that on the diagram requires two moves only instead of four. 1. R take Q P (ch).

" C. R. L." " A Johnian," Cambridge, " Spinx,"—and " A Fellow of King's."—Not quite up to our standard: try again.

" Vega Valley."—Thanks for your suggestion; for it is not at all clear, upon the White King's going over to the Queen's side, that Black can take the Pawns in detail.

" Amateur."—A very pretty juvenile problem.

" Sautar Johnny" will find the Economic Chess-board mentioned in another part of our paper. The price, we believe, is only half-a-crown.

" A. F. W."—Mr. Jaenisch's move of Kt to Q Kt 6th, in the Scotch Game, is the reverse of "weak." It is an excellent stroke of play, and completely foils the attack which the second player was supposed to gain by playing Q to K R 5th. The reply of K B to Q B 4th is very memorable.

" Terpsichore."—We have always heard that, despite his amazing powers of combination in the field, Napoleon was an indifferent Chess-player. Your solution is the true one.

" Fair Play."—A Problem is valueless that can be solved in less than the prescribed number of moves. You are altogether in error respecting No. 114.

" C. R. L." and " D. C." Huntley. Received with thanks.

" J. H." Richmond-buildings.—You are quite correct; there is but one way of solving either of the problems. Your attempt last week was not a mate in four moves against the position you present, in fact, is equally unsuccessful.

" Mira."—You will find about twenty spasmodical positions in Hooton, Bone, Horwitz, Klug, &c., in this month's Number of "The Chess-Players' Chronicle."

" Jonathan."—We have been perusing the interesting games between Stanley and Rousseau as on its route to England.

" Jasenia."—We shall commence a series of progressive problems for students in Chess, the moment the games between Messrs. Staunton and Horwitz are concluded.

" Regnmar."—We shall be glad to render you any assistance in our power.

" R. M. L."—You may assign Mr. Brown's entertaining collection of Problems at Hastings's of Carey-street.

" Lex." Clonmel's Inn.—The President of the Brighton Chess Club is Captain Kennedy of the Liverpool. Mr. Mongredien (Mr. M is also President of the Old London Club); of the Bristol, we believe Mr. Williams. The Secretary of the London Chess Club is Mr. Perigal; of the Liverpool, Mr. Spreckley. As players, there is not a guard to choose between them. To your last query. Write to Mr. Longbottom, Secretary of the St. George's Chess Club, Cavendish-square.

Solutions by "Automaton," "Mrs. T.," "Marveion," "J. G.," Dublin, "Chapel Jack," "R. H.," "Kriegs," "Wilfrid," "Louis," and "F. W. G." Rice Divan, are correct. Those by "M. S," "J. S. W.," "J. H. W.," "P. W.," "B. M.," "F." "F. P. C." "P. H." "P. C." Great Yarmouth; "W. H.," "J. W." "Sea Weed," "Mica," and "Philip," are all wrong

SOLUTION TO PROBLEM NO. 116.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. Kt to Q B's 7th (ch)	K to Q B's 5th
2. Q P one (ch)	K to Q 5th
3. Q to K B 5th	Q to K 4th (best)
4. K Kt to K 6th (ch)	Q takes Kt *
5. Kt mates

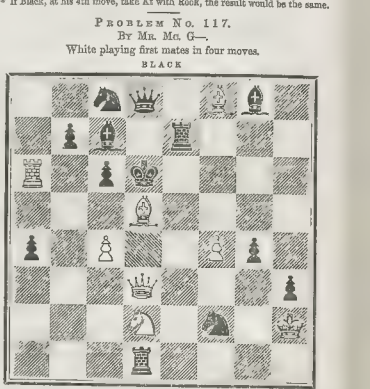
* If Black, at his 4th move, take Kt with Rook, the result would be the same.

PROBLEM NO. 117.

BY MR. MC. G—.

White playing first mates in four moves.

BLACK



WHITE

MATCH AT CHESS

BETWEEN MR. STAUNTON AND MR. HORWITZ

GAME THE EIGHTEENTH.

WHITE. (Mr. H.)	BLACK. (Mr. S.)	WHITE. (Mr. H.)	BLACK. (Mr. S.)
1. K P two	Q B P two	20. B takes Kt	P takes B
2. K B P two	K P one	21. Q to K P takes P	K Kt to B 2nd
3. K Kt to B 3rd	Q Kt to B 3rd	22. Kt takes Kt	B takes Kt
4. Q P two	Q P one	23. K P takes P	K P takes P
5. Q Kt to B 3rd	K Kt to B 3rd	24. K to R 2nd	K R to Q Kt 2nd
6. K B to K 2nd	K Kt P one	25. R to K sq	R to Q K 7th
7. Q P one	K B to K Kt 2nd(a)	26. B to B 2nd	Q to K 8th
8. Castles	Q R P one	27. Kt to K Kt sq	Q takes Q (c)
9. K R P one	K B P two (b)	28. K R takes Q	Q R to Q K sq
10. Q B to K 3rd (c)	Q Kt P one	29. R takes R	K to B sq
11. Q R to her 2nd	Castles	30. B to Q Kt sq	Q R to Q Kt sq
12. K to K B 2nd	Q R to Kt sq	31. R takes R (f)	R takes R
13. Q P two	Q B to Q 3rd	32. Kt to K 2nd	K P one
14. K Kt to B 5th	Q to K P sq	33. K R P one	K B to his 3rd
15. Q R to K B sq	Q Kt to Q 5th	34. K to K 3rd	K to B 2nd (g)
16. K to K sq	B to Q B 3rd	35. K to Kt 3rd	Q B to Q Kt sq
17. Q Kt P one	K R P one	36. K to K B 3rd	Q B to Q Kt 2nd
18. Q R P takes P	R P takes P	37. K to Kt 3rd	K B to Q sq
19. Q Kt to K 2nd	Q Kt P takes P (d)	38. K to B 3rd (h)	B to Q K 4th
		And white resigns.

(a) This deviation from the customary moves in the present opening deserves consideration. We are much mistaken if, hereafter, it will not be found a great improvement on the old style of carrying on the game.

(b) One of the chief advantages arising from Black's variation is its enabling him to advance the Pawn with safety and thus effectually preventing the formidable attack which the opening generally obtains by throwing forward the Pawns on this side.

(c) With the object of pinning the K's Pawn when Black castles, and then, if P takes P, of taking Q P, attacking K's Rook.

(d) Kt takes Kt (ch), would have been stronger play.

(e) Had he taken the Bishop with Rook, White would have gained the exchange by first taking Q with Q, and then R with R.

(f) B to Q Kt's 2d would have [illegible]

(g) Black might have [illegible] K to K B's 2nd, and if K to K Kt's 3rd, then Black could not play to Kt's 4th, and we cannot see how Pawns could be won by Bishop, [illegible] Kt's 3rd, and Pawn with his Kt.

(h) This hastens the catastrophe, but best move to take the K's Pawn with his Kt.

GAME THE NINETEENTH.

WHITE. (Mr. S.)	BLACK. (Mr. H.)	WHITE. (Mr. S).	BLACK. (Mr. H).
1. K P two	K P two	19. K takes Kt	P takes Kt (ch)
2. K Kt to B 3rd	K Kt to B 3rd	20. K to K 2nd	R takes P
3. K Kt to Q B 4th	K Kt to Q 4th	21. Q to Kt 3rd	B to K 2nd
4. Q B P one	K Kt to B 3rd	22. K to K 4th	Q to K B 4th
5. Q P one	Q P one	23. K to K Kt 5th	K R P one
6. Castles	Castles	24. Kt takes P at K B 3rd (d)	Q takes B P (ch)
7. Q R to K 3rd	K Kt to Q Kt 3rd
8. Q Kt P one	Q B P one	25. K to K sq	Q to K Kt 4th (ch)
9. B takes B	P takes B	26. K to B sq	B takes Kt
10. K R P one	Q P one (e)	27. K to R 2nd	R takes Q
11. P takes P	K Kt takes P	28. Kt takes Q	R to K R 6th
12. K Kt to K sq	K Kt to K sq	29. K to K R 2nd	B takes Kt
13. Q Kt to Q 2nd	K Kt to K B 6th	30. R to K sq	R to K 8 sq
14. Q Kt to B 3 sq	Q B to K B 4th	31. Q P one	K to K 2nd
15. K R to K 3rd	Q to K B 3rd	32. Q P one	K to K Kt 3rd
16. Q to K sq	K to Q sq	33. K to K 4th	K to R 3rd (ch)
17. Q P one (h)	K P one	34. K to Kt sq	B to K 5 6th (e)
18. Q Kt to K Kt 3rd(c)	Kt takes K Kt P	White resigns.

(a) The advance of this Pawn at this proper moment always appears to turn the tables on the opening player of the Gioco Piano.

(b) White has now again got somewhat the best of the position, as Black cannot take the Pawn.

(c) This inconsiderate move loses the game. By playing the Q Kt to K R 2nd, or to Q 2nd, he would have [illegible] followed by Kt or B to K B, would have lost a piece.

(d) The terminating moves are finely played in the usual style by Mr. Horwitz.
